Germany, 1894--1926

I saw Germany in 1894 and in 1926. In 1894 I knew it well for two full years, in every part, in many cities, in many homes and hearts. In 1926 I flew by, glancing here and there. I saw but little and yet I had a fleeting basis of comparison. I set it down for what it is worth.

1926 (?)

THE RADICAL

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

In theory, the radical is the "root and branch man"; the social philosopher, who believes that things as arranged at present are so fundamentally wrong, that they must be either distroyed root and branch, or so entirely changed as to make a really new world. Now in truth, there are few people that really desire as much as this, who are really absolutely radical. What we in reality denominate as radical is the program of the man who proposes to make a fundamental change in our own lives. Radicalism which does not affect us personally in this way is a thing that does not greatly concern us, except as a matter of curious speculation or smiling comment. A radical change in the conception of the forces of the universe by an Einstein, does not even interest most people; it calls for no new laws or new arrangements of police power; but, on the other hand, a proposal that the land of Manhattan Island should have its title of ownership fixed in the State rather than in the individual who happened to seize it first and his descendants—a proposal of that sort calls for heated comment, the mobilization of the militia, if not the regular army, the curtailment of freedom of speech and organized social coercion to such an extent that men rather submit to ignorance than voice knowledge in Carnegie Hall.

Radicalism, therefore, has always to do in practice with dominate interests; and dominate interests today are matters of property and income. There is, to be sure, talk of radicalism in religion; but even there the opposition to radicalism is not at all a matter of what men actually believe as rather the way in which this belief will affect present and material interests.

Given then, these deminant economic privileges and interests today, the radical is the man who stands for change and for that reason he stands in opposition to state and society. He must be looked upon as the enemy of the present "good" order. He is regarded and is dangerous to the Powers in the world; if his ideas are spreading, he must be warned, harassed, locked up or killed.

The greatest indictment of modern culture is that we have evolved apparently no civilized method of doing the job which the radical must do. Given an organization of men by which, as a result of human thought, effort, work, and service, the goods of the world are distributed, so that a few get more than they can use and most people feel poverty or see it in the future; there ought to be some rational way by which the necessity and advantages of change in this situation could be placed fairly before the reason of men. In spite of theory, there is no such method today. We merely talk and write and agitate about minor and unimportant changes; or so long as our voices are low and do not carry far, we may advocate tremendous changes and even revolution; but when it comes to reaching the real audience of the thinking world, we find that the newspapers are acting, like the New York Times, in the case of Russia and the British strike, deliberately spreading misinformation concerning the facts and the causes. Or that they are quite silent, as is the case of most newspapers and magazines concerning the plight of the American Negro. Or they are violently biased and abusive, as in the case of most organizations of public opinion towards divorce and birth-control.

Now since we cannot, by rational and logical method, advocate change in present organizations, and since a change in present organization is the thing that has saved the world in the past, and will save it in the future, we must have the radical and the radical must come forward in the guise as fool, martyr, or super-man: as fool, because most of the things which most men propose to better the world are wrong or partially wrong in practice. Man never was a good Prophet! If the world were free to speak and think this wrong could be easily proven without disaster; coerced as the world of thought is today, underground propaganda which is foolish and wrong stands an even better chance of being heard than propaganda which is far-sighted and wise, and both are treated the same way by the powers that be. So again the radical faces either open or that infinitely more devastating martyrdom which most educated evangelical ministers are going through when they think they are compelled to say that they believe what every human being knows they do not and cannot believe. Finally, the radical may be a super-man: the seer who hurls himself against the enemies of change and progress with such unheard of force that they must yield. But, alas, super-men are always rare and usually despite their triumph they are crucified.

The radical, therefore, is the man who seeks change and believe thereby uplift the world and push it tottering and drunkenly forward; but at the same time there are other Radicals who are not called by the name or thought of as comprehended in the term: they are first those who try to push the world backward and secondly those who would hold it eternally still. They are both Revolutionists—"root and branch" men, who succeed only by uprooting and killing progress. And yet the rewards of the three are far different.

The man who worships present conditions—holds to them, defends them with life and property is rewarded and be-medaled, knighted and made rich and powerful. The radical who looks backward may gain small following but he is not feared: we know or think we know the past. We entreat its advocate and defender with toleration and vast pity.

But the future we fear and it is well that we do. We punish the poet who would make his fantastic dreams true; or the miner who wants a sure income of $1500 a year. Why? Many people receive $1500 a year and some get that much a month. But we all know that if 700,000 miners are to get such an income, then a large number of bankers, brokers, manufacturers and professional men will get less than they now receive. And that this kind of revolution beginning with miners might utterly change the face of present society. What shall be done? Well, first do not allow the matter to be discussed because the majority of people receive less than $1500 a year and if they think they can get more by their votes what will happen?

,To all this there are ramifications: we need cotton, palm oil, cocoa, spices, tea, sugar—a thousand things which are raised by black, brown and yellow labor. We pay huge sums for these and similar tropical and semi-tropical commodities. But these huge sums are not paid to Negroes and c and such. They are paid to merchants and ship owners and bankers and they in turn by the help of armies and navies pay for these commodities prices so low that the colored laborers are practically slaves. Hence the enormous profits of imperialism, banking and foreign trade.

Suppose now a colored "radical" arises with the simplest of programs: conference of colored peoples; inquiry into facts; education of Negroes; away with the Bolshevist and Revolutionist; discredit him; laugh him out of court; silence him and prove to colored folk that Christianity and love are the roads to inter-racial peace!

Such men are not in truth real radicals. They are merely inquirers--seekers after knowledge. But the world forces them into extreme radicalism; makes them revolutionists; they find no ears or sympathy save among the socially disfranchised, the outcasts and the bitter. A caste of radicals is thus created of men whose only common thought or protest is against the suppression of ideas. Left to itself this radical mass has no logical coherence; but whipped by the same rod they appear as a Radical Party. And unless Civilization finds a way to reform itself openly and reasonably, it will stagger on by secret and sudden upheaval fired by radicals.

The Economic Advance of the Freed Men

Armed with some political power, limited as it was, and helped by the economic ruin of the South and the consequent cheapness of land, the Negroes began about 1870 to develop. There was a great demand in Europe and in the northern part of the United States for the products of his labor:-cotton, sugar cane, rice and other things. There was some competition too for his labor between the old slave-holders and new capitalists from the South and the North. The black man used his own political power, small as it was, to insist upon education. He did not know enough likewise to insist upon land although he continually made the proposal that each head of a family be given 40 acres and a mule. But in those days of 19th century philosophy this seemed paternalistic and even his friends did not encourage him. His advance under these circumstances can best be studied by taking one typical state, Georgia, where today more than a million Negroes live.

The Negroes began working the land on shares. They worked under the same conditions as in slavery days and most of them received no wages. But a few, by managing to sell their labor in the highest market, accumulated a little capital and began to rent land. Then some began to buy. By 1874, the 550,000 Negroes of Georgia owned 340,000 acres of land. This increased to 600,000 in 1880, 1,000,000 acres in 1890, 1,100,000 in 1900, and today 1,500,000 acres worth, with improvements, $46,000,000. In the United States today Negroes conduct as owners and tenants 1,000,000 farms of which they own 220,000 with 15,000,000 acres of land valued at $56,000,000.

But all this has been accomplished under all sorts of diverse surroundings, in the midst of competition and lawless oppression. The Negroes have had inadequate protection of life and limb. Since 1880, 5,200 of them accused of crime have been lynched by mobs, without trial. And thousands of them who were not even accused, have been killed in riots. They have been systematically insulted by law: compelled to ride in separate cars on the railroad; compelled to live in segregated parts of cities; their women subjected to unpunished aggression on the part of white men; compelled to go to separate schools and these schools given inadequate funds and inadequate encouragement. Three fourths of their voting population has by fraud and unjust administration of the law been deprived of their right to vote.

The center of all this oppression has been, naturally, the former slave states. As the Negro has begun to move North - and something like a million have migrated in the last decade - their freedom and economic chance has been increased, although even in the North they are more or less segregated and form at least spiritual units cut off from the mass of the population.

Nevertheless their advance despite all hindrance has been marvellous outside of agriculture. Two thirds of their adults today can read and write. They are represented in the professions. They have 18,000 clergymen, 6,000 lawyers, 3,000 physicians, 30,000 teachers and in addition to this, 650,000 working as common and skilled laborers in manufacturing and trades, 275,000 working in transportation, 130,000 in business and 1,000,000 as public and private servants. Their more prosperous individuals have accumulated wealth, and control perhaps 2,000,000,000 in property and capital.

At the same time the mass of the black people of America are poor and ignorant and fighting a hard battle. The mass of white laborers recognise their needs and abilities only when compelled to, and against his exclusion from trade unions the Negro is compelled to fight by underbidding his fellow white worker. In this way he has forced some of the unions to admit him to membership and he is joining today in larger numbers than ever before although even inside the union he is discriminated against.

In a peculiar way the fight of the American Negro laborer is the fight of labor all over the world. Just as long as Negroes in America and the colored races of Africa and Asia can be exploited and compelled to work for low wages for the owners of capital and controllers of credit throughout the world, just so long the attempt of white labor to emancipate itself and achieve real industrial democracy will be in vain. Black labor in America is fighting in the van of all colored labor to obtain the same rights and the same political power that white labor is beginning to attain.

The Emancipation of the Slaves

The agitation against slavery in America began almost with this institution back in the 17th century, and slowly gathered head. It became a real living force when Negroes like Frederick Douglass stood side by side with the white Abolitionists and pleaded for the recognition of manhood. They organized, with the help of their white friends, systematic methods by which the slaves ran away from the South and took refuge in Canada or in the swamps of Florida. This system was called "the underground railway".

Then finally there came to the help of these agitators the fact that the competition of slaves in industry was being felt by the white working men. And they began to realise that no modern industrial state could be raised upon a basis of slavery. But there was hesitation. What would be done with the slaves? Because taught by long experience to despise black men and think of them as slaves, few American could envisage them as free American citizens. There were already a considerable number of free Negroes. In 1860 there were nearly a half million free black men in America as contrasted with 4,500,000 slaves and this free black population had increased from 100,000 at the beginning of the century to 300,000 in 1830.

The first proposal was that the colored population be transported to Africa, but the slave holders leaped in and got control of the so-called Colonization Society and used it to get rid of the free Negroes and bind the shackles more closely upon the slaves. But their efforts were in vain. A few free Negroes went to Africa and founded Liberia but most of them stayed in the United States.

And then the whole matter came to a head in a dispute over the ownership of the free, rich Western land. Should this land be seized by rich slave holders and worked by slaves or should it be kept open for free white farmers. This dispute led to civil war and in that struggle 200,000 black soldiers and at least 300,000 black civilians helped 800,000 Northern soldiers conquer 700,000 Southerners. Of course the nation did not like to acknowledge that they were fighting about Negroes and so the Northerners called the war a war for preserving the integrity of the United States and the Southerners called it a war to preserve their local autonomy. But the only reason that there was danger of disrupting the nation was the fact that the South wanted slave labor and the North did not, and the only invasion of local rights by the national government was threatened interference with slavery.

The result of this war was to stop the slave trade, to destroy the legal title of the owners in their slaves. Outside of this it did nothing for real emancipation. The slaves were given no land; they were given no capital; they were given only rudimentary rights in the courts and in public places. In reality they remained slaves in practically everything except legal designation.

However, the North was compelled to go a little further than this. Otherwise they would have had the war to fight over again. Missionaries and philanthropists began to educate the mass of slaves in newly organized schools and when the North found that it could only reorganize the Southern states and keep them as an integral part of the nation by using the potential political power of the slaves, they tried to enfranchise the slaves. This again was only partially successful because the slaves were poor and ignorant and under the economic domination of the whites. But nevertheless it forced the Southern whites into a political battle rather than a purely economic battle. While this political battle to keep Negroes from voting and holding office was going on, the slaves began to take such steps toward education and economic freedom that the advance of the Negro has not been stopped even to this day.

PAN AFRICA, 1927.

The Fourth Pan African Congress was held in New York City August 21 to 24, 1927. It comprised over two hundred delegates from twenty-one American states, from nearly all the West Indies Islands, and from South America, Gold Coast, Nigeria, Liberia and South Africa on the continent of Africa.

While the Congress was meeting the colored Elks held their annual convention in Harlem. Near a hundred thousand of Negroes from all over the country poured in to see their colorful and impressive ceremonies. Harlem was decorated from 125th to 145th Street, and probably never before has a great northern city entertained so large a number of Negro visitors, and with so quiet and pleasant a welcome.

Despite, however, all the distractions and interesting ceremonies of this fraternal organization, the Pan African Congress attracted intensely interested audiences for four successive days. Probably a larger amount of precise and catalogued information concerning the Negro groups of the world was brought together at this Congress than ever before. It was exhibited in charts and maps at their headquarters, and it was explained and elucidated by many speeches during the Congress.

What now is the comparative situation of these various groups? The Congress first stressed the fact that Pan Africa today consists of 50 million Negroes under the British flag, 25 million under the French, 11 million in America, 10 million in Abyssinia, 9 million in Brazil, 8½ million in the Belgian Congo, 8 million in Portuguese Africa, and from 12 to 15 millions scattered elsewhere.

The varied problems that met these people were brought out in the resolutions of the Congress. These resolutions start with a strong demand for the withdrawal of the United States troops from Haiti. The delegate from Haiti, M. Dantes Bellegarde, former Haitian minister to France and commander of the Legion of Honor, has a world-wide reputation from his work in the League of Nations where he say for several years as delegate. It was Bellegarde who brought to the attention of the world the outrageous booming of the Bondel zwarts by officials of the Union of South Africa and he also sat upon the League Commission on Slavery. M. Bellegarde's story of present conditions in Haiti was moving. He assured us that more Haitians were killed in one year under the American Corvee System than had been killed previously in all the revolutions that had taken place in Haiti!

British West Africa has seen improvement since the Third Pan African Congress in that the beginning of popular elections has been made in the four colonies. All of the legislative councils now have a small elective element, although it is a minority and the official element still predominates. The economic situation of the cocoa farmers is not, however, satisfactory. Chief Amoah III appealed for Negro American trade and capital and trained guidance.

In Kenya and Southern Rhodesia the natives are still being dispossessed of the land, although there are proposals in Rhodesia for some limit to this outrageous policy. They are given no voice or consideration in government.

The reactionary efforts of the Herzog Government in South Africa to give no real relief to the natives deprived of their land; to keep them out of skilled labor and make them landless laborers of the lowest grade; and to maintain and even increase their present disfranchisement was a matter of great complaint in the Congress; and in all British Africa "it is lamentable to note how little is being done to educate the natives".

French Africa has its scheme of native education but this has not been extended as widely or as fast as it ought to be; outside of Senegal there is very limited participation of the natives in their own governments. The exploitation of Equatorial Africa principly for the benefit of French investors goes on at a rapid pace.

In the Belgian Congo there has been an increase in the appropriation for education but it is still far below the need; and there is no evidence of any movement to restore land ownership to the natives or to let them have any real voice in government. The Congo is still regarded mainly as a profitable investment for Belgian trade.

The various West Indian Islands were especially well represented in the Congress and many interesting matters brought out. For instance, there was shown that because of lack of federated government in the British West Indies that the expense of governors and judicial establishments for each island made the cost of government outrageously high. To govern a little over two million Negroes in the West Indies, costs $175,000 a year in salaries for British governors alone, not to mention colonial secretaries, judges and other officers. Perhaps the total cost of white officials from abroad reaches a quarter of a million dollars a year in salaries. At this rate the President of the United States should receive a salary of about $10,000,000. Educational facilities, while good as far as they go, are far below the demand, and the exploitation of workers by corporations and landholders breeds wide unrest, poverty and migration. The Congress urged united political action against that grievance and went on to say that the "first step toward this to be an utter erasing of that color line between mulattos and blacks, which sprang from slavery and is still being drawn and encouraged by those who are the enemies of Negro freedom".

Lack of popular education in Abyssinia was deplored as well as the threat of Italian agression and the increasing and growing power of the Firestone rubber concession in Liberia was a subject of warning to the Liberian Government and to colored voters in the United States. The financial power which holds Portugal in its grip was declared to be the reason for the practical impotence of her liberal colonial code. Her colonies are largely in the hands of concessionary companies who are exploiting the natives to the last degree.

Of missions, the Conference said: "We believe in missionary effort but in missionary effort for health, morals and education and not for military aggression and sectarian superstitions".

The Negroes of the United States were advised to use their political power for helping to solve international problems of the color line, as well as national problems in America. Independent voting regardless of party was advised. To improve the economic situation, the Negroes were urged to enter trade unions and to rely upon consumers' cooperation.

Finally, the Conference said:

"Upon matters that lie outside our own problems, we must also express our thought and wish, because the narrow confines of the modern world entwine our interests with those of other peoples. We desire to see freedom and real national independence in Egypt, in China and in India and we demand the cessation of the interference of the United States in affairs of Central and South America.

"We thank the Soviet Government of Russia for its liberal attitude toward the colored races and for the help which it has extended to them from time to time.

"We urge the white workers of the world to realize that no program of labor uplift can be successfully carried through in Europe or American so long as colored labor is exploited and enslaved and deprived of all political power."

The Congress voted sympathy and cooperation with the Brussels Conference of Oppressed Peoples and appointed a committee to call a Fifth Pan African Congress two years hence.

RUSSIA AND THE RACE PROBLEM

Whatever we may think theoretically of Russia's revolution and the Soviet government two things are certainly true - first, the economic system based on private capital which is prevalent in the world today is imperfect and is and has been widely criticised. There is scarcely a student of the system past or present who does not regard it as a makeshift which can and must be improved. Whether the dictatorship of the proletariat as exemplified in Russia will bring the needed improvements or not, only time will tell. But certainly this second proposition can not be controverted: we must judge Russia by what she does and not simply by what she says and certainly not by what other people say about her. We must remember that private interests both economic and social wish the failure of the Russian experiment and we must listen to their voices in books, speeches and the public press with reserve.

To us as Negro Americans, the chief question is: What is Russia's attitude toward the world problems of race? We include in this, her attitude toward Negroes in America and Africa and toward the colored peoples of the East. This is not all. Most Americans do not know that within Russia are numerous race problems. The territory of the union of the Soviet republics consists of over eight million square miles, or one-sixth of the land surface of the earth and of one hundred and fifty million people of different races and languaged, including five varieties of Slavs, two sets of Lithuanians, five of the Latin and Teutonic races, seven Iranians, ten varieties of Finns, twelve groups of Turks and Tartars, two sets of Monguls; besides Jews, Gypsies, Chinese, Japanese, Koreans, and five or six other races. No such tremendous mixture of race under one government has been seen elsewhere in the world, not even in the United States of America.

Here then, above all, is the place to ask: How does the new revolutionary government of Russia face the question of race? And the answer is clear and unequivocal. Russia stands for absolute equality of races - political, social and civil. She recognizes on the one hand the rights of her constituent peoples to maintain their own language and their own culture and to have schools, teachers and literature to sustain these. So far as practicable, she gives all the different nations local governmental autonomy. Russia consists of ten autonomous soviet socialistic re ublics; and within these republics, are various partially autonomous governments based on race and language.

On the other hand, Russia does not force racial segregation. A Tartar may send his child to a Tartar school or to a Russian school, just as he pleases. In the Tartar school, he learns Russian. Every inducement is held out to make the different groups acquainted with the language and the culture of the leading races in Russia. But they are not forced to this. They are invited.

I visited in Moscow the state printing office where Russia is printing books - textbooks and general literature, pamphlets and placards, for the peoples of Russia. Books were being printed in thirty or forty languages. A school of apprentices with an attendance of about one hundred - Jews, Chinese, Tartars, Arabs - boys and girls from a score or more different peoples, was making new alphabets, printing placards, doing all sorts of things in black and white and in color. Students are chosen and sent in by trade unions and supported either by the unions or by public expense. This year three million dollars will be spent in equipment and this, the manager assured me, is only ten per cent of what is needed.

What will be the result of this experiment in the encouragement of races and nations, groups and languages, within a great nation? Usually nations have tried to suppress variant groups. They have hammered and pounded them into submission and disappearance as the Germans sought to do with the Poles, as the Hungarians treated the Slavs and as England, France and Spain have treated numerous smaller groups. Here in America, we are trying to make Germans, Irish, Hungarians and Italians ashamed of the race that gave them birth, unwilling to remember their languages and claiming only English descent. Russia has set her face in the opposite direction. For the first time in decades, the Ukraine can be proud of its literature and language; the Poles can talk Polish, the Armenians can have their own little government, the Jews can not only be free in their own Soviet republic, but everywhere they wish to go in Russia.

This is not all. The colored peoples of the East - the dark Tartars, the Chinese and the Monguls within the bounds of theRussian republic,-are given every encouragement. In Moscow there is a university for the Eastern peoples with a thousand students, with everything - clothes, food and tuition - free. There is a Chinese university with about five hundred students giving a course of two years.

And finally in all public celebrations, the importance of the different racial elements in Russia is given free and frank encouragement. I saw the tenth annual celebration of Youth Day in September, 1926. Two hundred thousand children and youth marched in the public square. There were not only Russians of all sorts and kinds but over one hundred Chinese and many Tartars, Caucasians and people from Turkestan and two or three Negroes. I have never seen a greater variety of human types.

Not only in Russia but outside of Russia and in her general diplomacy and relations in the world, Russia has taken a firm stand for racial equality. She has demanded decent treatment for Africans and persons of African descent throughout the world and has gone out of her way to treat Negro visitors with courtesy.

Above all, today Russia is the hope of Asia. She is the backbone of the present Chinese revolution andthe hope of nationalism in India. This is the reason and the sole reason for the recent attack upon Russia in England, America and Italy and to some extent in France. The solidarity of white Europe toward the colored world has been broken by Russia and the white world, led by England, is determined to punish Russia at any cost.

All this is quite outside of questions of economic policy, of political trend and of debt settlements. The attitude of Russia on the race question within and without her boundaries is of tremendous significance to us and of such significance to the races of the world that it bids fair to overshadow other and in many respects, lesser questions.

The Negro in American Life

There were perhaps five thousand Negroes in all the Americas in the 16th Century. They had come as body servants and laborers, a few being free, most of them being regarded as slaves. They took part in exploration: they were with Balboa and De Soto, and one of them, Estevanico, led the expedition from Mexico that discovered the Southwestern part of the United States in 1539.

Negroes were permanently landed in what is now the territory of the United States in Virginia in 1619. They were the answer to the problem of new free land which America had thrust upon Europe. This land called for labor, and the labor was supplied by stealing white men in Europe and black men in Africa. The supply of white men, however, was lessened by the needs and labor laws of Europe. The supply of black men was practically unlimited by the disintegration of African life ~~which~~ begun by the Mohammedan invasion and increased by the slave trade ~~caused.~~ itself.

The result was that by the beginning of the 18th Century, large numbers of Negroes had been brought to the West Indies and some fifty thousand to the United States. This importation of slaves became profitable in two ways: It furnished labor for a new and widely demanded set of crops. And, on the other hand, the carrying trade was tremendously advantageous to the sea-faring nations.

Fierce rivalry began for the monopoly of this trade in black men. The Dutch secured it in the 17th Century, but in 1713, the crowning triumph of the end of the war between England and Spain was the securing of the monopoly of the American slave trade by the English. The result was that by the middle of the 18th Century, the fifty thousand Negroes in the United States had increased to two hundred and twenty thousand and the crops of tobacco, sugar and rice began to cross the seas and to appeal not simply to the rich and privileged, but to the mass of middle-class buyers. The demand for these crops and the extension of their culture, led to vigorous activity in the slave trade during the latter part of the 18th Century, so that by the beginning of the 19th Century, there were 900,000 Negroes in America and a fourth crop had been added to the other three, destined to become the greatest crop of all, and the foundation stone of a new modern economic kingdom. This crop was cotton. The United States raised eight thousand bales of cotton in 1790. By 1820, it was raising 650,000 bales, which began the economic foundation of a new American labor problem.

At the same time, there were various indications that the slave system was not securely established. From the very beginning, there had been serious slave revolts, like that of the Maroons in the West Indies, and early revolts in Mexico and Virginia. This culminated in the great revolt of Haiti, where after spasmodic fighting between mulattoes and the white masters, suddenly on August 22, 1791, the black slaves arose and eventually succeeded in driving out the whites and taking charge of the country.

In the United States, 5,000 black soldiers had been used in the Revolutionary War, and others were used in the war of 1812. These facts, coupled with the new humanitarianism of the 19th Century, brought efforts at slave revolt in South Carolina and Virginia, and the abolition movement in the North. The abolition movement began to be successful when it secured actual slaves, like Frederick Douglass, as personal exhibits of the injustice of slavery.

At the same time, the two rapid expansion of the cotton kingdom brought an economic crisis in the decade 1850-60 which led to a demand for more slaves and more slave territory and met the opposition of Northern labor and Northern humane feeling.

By 1850, there were 3½ million Negroes in the United States and this increased to over four million at the time of the Civil War. After the war, there came a reconstruction of Democracy in the United States and in this the Negro played an important part. Through his vote, it was possible to restore the South to the Union; to establish in the South a public school system, and to begin a new social legislation.

The Negro paid the penalty for helping the nation in this way by suffering disfranchisement and caste, so that by the beginning of the 20th Century, he was unable for the most part to vote, to travel [illegible] to live, to frequent public places, like other American citizens. Today, in the second quarter of the 20th Century, there are between 12 and 13 million Americans of Negro descent, and we must regard them not simply as a class of Americans, a degree physically separate from the mass of Americans and forming a separate series of problems, but as persons, who because of their long connection with American life, are a part and an important part, of American civilization.

Democracy in America, for instance, has been developed because of the pressure of the slaves for freedom and recognition. The status of women has been changed greatly because the Negro woman was a working woman before she was a housewife, and her example and competition has spread among white working women. Education, particularly in the South, has become popular, and the public school is an accepted institution because of the insistence of Negroes on free education.

But above all, in two fields, the Negro has made his great contribution to American culture, and that is in art and in labor. We do not usually connect these two things. The more or less open ambition of every American is to become so rich that he will not have to work, and the only native American art is ~~Negro and~~ Negroid, and consequently has not been highly regarded by most Americans. But the hard manual labor of the American Negro has helped to develop America, ~~has furnished a tremendous laboring force,~~ and some time when we have a greater respect for work, it will be recognized as a great contribution. Beyond this the Negro has helped in skilled work and invention

On the other hand, we are already beginning to see the beauty of Negro Art in ~~American music~~ (in American literature, in music and dancing and such moral ideals as good will and sacrifice;) and we shall come to see beauty in other lines to which the American Negro has contributed. We can, therefore, well think of the Negro element in America as an integral part of American life and as having made a permanent contribution to American civilization.

BREAKING THE BUSINESS LINE

Mr. Daniel G. Monroe Opens a New Avenue

Mr. Daniel G. Monroe, who, on the first of November, opened the Monroe Insurance Agency, Insurance Underwriters, at 1216 U Street N. W., is a man of high integrity and good business standing. He is worthy of the trust imposed in him by officials of the great insurance companies. His wide experience in insurance matters gives him ample knowledge of the writing of insurance policies. In so far as we are aware, he is the only man of our group who has reached this height in the matter of general insurance.

Residing here for twenty-four years, Mr. Monroe has gained the confidence of the wide range of people with whom he has had contact. He has worked for, and contributed to, all such worthy movements as the Y. M. C..A., the N. A. A. C. P., the Howard University Medical School Endowment Fund, and others. He has held position as bookkeeper and clerk in the civil service of the United States government for more than twenty years. Some of us still remember him as fullback on the Howard University varsity football teams of 1903-04 and '05 and as a star track athlete of those days.

Mr. Monroe is deserving of 100% cooperation from the public in the effort he is making to open to our group this avenue in general insurance. Such cooperation will enable him and his associates to prove to the world that we are ready to branch out further in the business world and also that we have worthy men and women ready to serve efficiently.

There will be a big vote in the South this year. No matter how large the anti-Smith vote is, the regular Democratic vote will be larger. For many years the South has trained itself to count out opponents at the polls — black opponents, white opponents. They beat the Populists and the Progressives this way and they can beat the Republicans and the Progressives this way and this year they will beat the Republicans. And who is to blame for the South this?' The Southern Christian church, the white women & immorality, white secrecy & hypocrisy & lawlessness have forged the chains that make effective political reform or protest impossible in S.C., Ga., Fla., Ala., Miss., & La., & intolerable anywhere south of Mason & Dixon's line. They've disfranchised the Negroes. They've got a White Man's Government & it's the most murderous mess in the U-S-A.

THE CRISIS is now entering upon the 20th Year of its existence, having been founded November 1, 1910. At that time, the dominant philosophy of the colored world and of its friends inculcated insistence on the duty of Negroes to be thrifty and hard-working, and to seek elementary and industrial education, and to insist as little as possible on political, civil and social rights, and above all, not to complain. When the N. A. A. C. P. grew out of the Niagara Movement of 1906 and the New York Conference of 1909, there came a new program of insistence on full wanted rights, exposure of the evils of lynching and disfranchisement, and the widest encouragement of trained ability in all lines.

We who had for many years studied the race problem in the United States, felt strongly that unless ~~that~~ this new program was carefully and continuously explained and popularized and unless the facts of race discrimination were exposed in detail and their results made clear, the N. A. A. C. P. and its program would be handicapped if not smothered by misapprehension and misinterpretation.

On the other hand, many earnest friends from long experience in philanthropic work, advised against the publication of an organ and pointed out that official organs were invariably a drain upon the resources of the organization which the new N. A. A. C. P. could ill afford. One tried friend expressed it: "Magazines as thick as the flies of Egypt. If you are not committed to this new venture, for heaven's sakes drop it."

Nevertheless, others insisted that without defense facts and answers to inevitable attack and misrepresentation, we could not survive. We argued the matter from August through October, and in November, printed the first number of The Crisis, ~~with the understanding that the N. A. A. C. P. treasury would meet deficits up to but not exceeding~~

~~$50. a month.~~ The first number of The Crisis laid down this platform:

> The object of this publication is to set forth those facts and arguments which show the danger of race prejudice, particularly as manifested today toward colored people. It takes its name from the fact that the editors believe that this is a critical time in the history of the advancement of men. Catholicity and tolerance, reason and forbearance can today make the world-old dream of human brotherhood approach realization; while bigotry and prejudice, emphasized race consciousness and force can repeal the awful history of the contact of nations and groups in the past. We strive for this higher and broader vision of Peace and Good Will.
> The policy of THE CRISIS will be simple and well defined:
>
> It will first and foremost be a newspaper: it will record important happenings and movements in the world which bear on the great problem of inter-racial relations, and especially those which affect the Negro-American.
> Secondly, it will be a review of opinion and literature, recording briefly books, articles, and important expressions of opinion in the white and colored press on the race problem.
> Thirdly, it will publish a few short articles.

The magazine will be the organ of no clique or party and will avoid personal rancor of all sorts. In the absence of proof to the contrary it will assume honesty of purpose on the part of all men, North and South, white and black.

The subsequent history of the Crisis is well known. We have in 19 years sold 8,591,979 copies all over the world and received in subscriptions, agents payments and advertising, $768,210. Our expenses have been about $780,000, leaving January 1, 1930, an indebtedness of approximately $10,000, against this indebtedness $12,000 of debts due us. Perhaps half of this is uncollectible, leaving a net debt of $5,000, which must be met by future profits.

The result of 19 years of business has been that from a position of dependence where our editor was a paid officer of the N. A. A. C. P. and we shared their offices without paying rent, we advanced in five years to complete financial independence and had good hopes of gradually accumulating a working capital for expansion. The workdwwar dashed these hopes. Suddenly, increased costs of publication necessitated a fifty percent advance in our subscription rates, while the field of advertising remained narrow.

Then, too, we began to feel now the results of two decades of successful teaching and agitation. We are no longer ~~to live~~ the lone herald on the walls preaching a radical and unpopular doctrine. On the other hand, with a unanumity quite remarkable, the essential program of the N. A. A. C. P. and The Crisis has been accepted throughout the Negro world and largely by the whole world. All American Negroes stand today for political rights, civil freedom, educational opportunity and social equality. There are still differences of interpretation and diverse opinions as to future procedure to obtain these ends, but the end and ideal has been planted on solid rock. Moreover, the new Negro newspaper has arisen to collect and broadcast news of the colored world in modern wise to an extent unknown 20 years ago.

What then of the future of The Crisis and its program? This 20th Years of our existence is truly critical for the answering of this question. When the 13th Amendment was adopted, Garrison ceased publication of the Liberator on the ground that the slave was free. But the slave is not fully free yet, sixty-five years after.

So, too, while The Crisis has in large parts accomplished its original mission, there is still a vast field of future usefulness to be occupied. First and obviously, the spiritual ground gained must be held. There must be no careless slipping back from the ideal of full manhood rights for Negroes, and the fighting of every plan of discrimination based on race and color.

But beyond this there is a great new work to be done—a work of education and ideal beyond the practical steps of the N.A.A.C.P. This field includes:

1. The presentation of the facts of racial adjustments as shown by individual experience and organized investigation. This will bring to light much that is not "news" in the ordinary sense but is most valuable information.

2. A careful interpretation of social development among American Negroes, among African and West Indian Negroes, and among other colored folk; a watchful following of the development of thought and culture in the civilized world and of its influence on our program.

3. The future guidance and development of American Negro art and the setting of proper standards in prose and poetry, illustration and portraiture; the wider knowledge of past efforts and establishment of future ideals: our authors and artists must be paid and encouraged by awards, their books and pictures must be brought, their ideals must be clarified.

4. The organization of Economic life must be carefully thought out and directed. The white economic world is at the threshhold of widespread and fundamental reorganization. The democratization of industry is fast approaching. Our place in the economic world is not simply a question of individual work, thrift and investment—it is looming as a vaster question of income, technique, organized co-operation and social ideal.

5. Finally, a new era of self-appraisement and self-criticism faces us. We have in 20 years swung from violent self-depreciation and humility to rightrace consciousness and boasting. The time approaches for rational weighing of what we are and what we have done and what we may do.

6. In this new self-appraisement, the role of youth and its education for life as American Negroes must be carefully considered. The reaction from the exercises of war time, the new educational opportunity, the new self-assertion and independence call for as perhaps nothing else, the building of new and clear goals, a new adjustment of parent and child, and old and young, and white and black.

In all these fields as in others that will occur to you, like the expenditure of our income, the preservation of health and the constitution of the home. I believe The Crisis is prepared to blaze a trail in the next 20 years as clear and true as in the past 20.

But to do this, The Crisis needs capital for expansion. We can with our present income pay current expenses, provided such expenses are kept at a minimum. Beyond this, we can gradually liquidate our old debts. But we cannot expand as we need to and add new young talent to our editorial and business equipment, explore and spread our field of readers and advertisers. The new funds thus needed will, I confidentially believe, constitute simply the new adjustment of capital necessary in every branch of business and will, in a few years, re-establish The Crisis on a broad field of financial solidity, as well as spiritual leadership.

Extended report and booklet

THE CRISIS is now entering upon the 20th Year of its existence, having been founded November 1, 1910. At that time, the dominant philosophy of the colored world and of its friends inculcated insistence on the duty of Negroes to be thrifty and hard-working and to seek elementary and industrial education and to insist as little as possible on political, civil and social rights, and above all, not to complain. When the N. A. A. C. P. grew out of the Niagara Movement of 1906 and the New York Conference of 1909, there came a new program of insistence on full wanted rights, exposure of the evils of lynching and disfranchisement, and the widest encouragement of trained ability in all lines.

We who had for many years studied the race problem in the United States felt strongly that unless that new program was carefully and continuously explained and popularized and unless the facts of race discrimination were exposed in detail and their results made clear, the N. A. A. C. P. and its program would be handicapped if not smothered by misapprehension and misinterpretation.

On the other hand, many earnest friends from long experience in philanthropic work, advised against the publication of an organ and pointed out that official organs were invariably a drain upon the resources of the organization which the new N. A. A. C. P. could ill afford. One tried friend expressed it: "Magazines as thick as the flies of Egypt. If you are not committed to this new venture, for heaven's sakes drop it."

Nevertheless, others insisted that without defense facts and answers to inevitable attack and misrepresentation, we could not survive. We argued the matter from August through October, and in November, printed the first number with the understanding that the N. A. A. C. P. treasury would meet deficits up to but not exceeding

> The object of this publication is to set forth those facts and arguments which show the danger of race prejudice, particularly as manifested today toward colored people. It takes its name from the fact that the editors believe that this is a critical time in the history of the advancement of men. Catholicity and tolerance, reason and forbearance can today make the world-old dream of human brotherhood approach realization; while bigotry and prejudice, emphasized race consciousness and force can repeal the awful history of the contact of nations and groups in the past. We strive for this higher and broader vision of Peace and Good Will.
> The policy of THE CRISIS will be simple and well defined:
>
> It will first and foremost be a newspaper: it will record important happenings and movements in the world which bear on the great problem of inter-racial relations, and especially those which affect the Negro-American.
> Secondly, it will be a review of opinion and literature, recording briefly books, articles, and important expressions of opinion in the white and colored press on the race problem.
> Thirdly, it will publish a few short articles.
> Finally, its editorial page will stand for the rights of men, irrespective of color or race, for the highest ideals of American democracy, and for reasonable but earnest and persistent attempt to gain these rights and realize these ideals. The magazine will be the organ of no clique or party and will avoid personal rancor of all sorts. In the absence of proof to the contrary it will assume honesty of purpose on the part of all men, North and South, white and black.

Johnson - James Weldon

BLACK AUTHORS AND WHITE PUBLISHERS

It is said that when H. G. Wells and the late William Archer differed on any point, each had to write a book about it. Weldon Johnson and myself are not as voluminous as this but we take it out in articles. Frankly, I think that Johnson in his July Crisis article is, in modern parland, "all wet!" Mr. Johnson's argument was as our readers will remember that young colored writers have little cause for complaint; that white publishers are eager to publish good work, and that as a matter of fact, most of the books published deal with the better class of Negroes. To this I demur. I would illustrate my point this way. Here is the Negro world:

Here is the fiction written about it:

Now the point is this colored fiction as a fair reflection of Negro life is ludicrously out of proportion. Touts, thieves, prostitutes, gamblers and sadists have been painted to represent a typical Harlem if not a typical American Negro. Moreover, these are not the real "lower classes" whose annals are always of deepest human interest and dramatic force. Such persons are the Negro laborers and servants, the mass of black church goers, the plodding 10 of our 12 millions as contrasted with a million criminal and a million rich, and it is precisely this great middle mass that white publishers have long with few exceptions encouraged Negro authors to forget. Led by Carl Van Vechten, the publishers want "hot-stuff" from Harlem, and the more lewdness and drunkenness and gambling, the better. The publishers here but follow their public. The white public, emancipated by the dirt of war, want candid sex talk. But they don't want it about white women. They prefer to see their own sex desires and perversions elucidated by colored folk. Hence, one searches literature almost in vain for the picture of a decent—I do not mean simply puritanically "pure"—but reasonably human and decent colored woman or for a colored man who is not obsessed by white female "beauty".

This is all abnormal, rot and will and must change.

Far from contemporary literary judgment being infallible and eternal as Mr. Johnson intimates, the exact opposite is nearer the truth. I maintain that the young black author today who wants to write of a real Negro will have a hell of a time with 9 out of 10 white publishers.

WHAT INSPIRATION CAN WE DRAW FROM NEGRO LITERATURE?

The inspiration to be drawn from any literature depends upon the literature that one has in mind and the personality which is doing the drawing. There are all sorts of Negro literature; some of it will in time become classic, as representing on the whole and with fair accuracy the situation, reactions and aspirations of Negroes in America; there is a good deal of Negro literature which is a revelation of the attitude of the white world, and represents what they think of Negroes and wish concerning them; this, too, will be more or less permanent as their attitude is permanent; then, there is a good deal of literature which is merely local and temporary in its effect.

The readers of all these sorts of literature take inspiration according to their character and ideals: they may be encouraged to express the truth more clearly as they see it; or to refute what they believe is untrue; or to restate thoughts and feelings and situations which they believe have been inadequately handled.

This answer to your question is vague because the whole matter is vague. True art must always be vague in the mind of the artists, and he is above rule and reason.

Liberals, Radicals and the Negro

The relation between liberals and radically-minded Americans, on the one hand, and Negroes and their friends, on the other, is a matter that has seldom been discussed and yet continually leads to difficulty and misunderstanding. It is, for instance, commonplace for a liberal-minded American to discover with astonishment and to meet the discovery with partial criticism, that American Negroes are often unacquainted with great liberal movements, or if acquainted , not advocates of them; not opposed to them. Radicals; that is, those who believe in thorough-going and even revolutionary reform, are especially astonished that Negroes display so little interest in their problems. On the other hand, the colored people themselves are continually disappointed at the patent fact that men may be liberal on so many matters of reform in America and in the world and yet be unsympathetic and even reactionary so far as the Negro problem is concerned. And it is quite common to find radicals who have no place in their program for Negroes. This situation is not only anomalous but dangerous. It interferes with logican thought in reform and it tends to make the Negro provincial, unprogressive and even selfish in his outlook.

Let us for instance consider certain problems of reform. We may think of the movement for peace and disarmment, for the uplift and emancipation of women; for the spread of Democratic government; for the education of children; for the abolition of poverty; for vocational guidance and training; for a more just distribution of income; for health and eugenics; for recreation; for greater social solidarity and the breaking down of class lines; for tariff reform; for civil service reform; for the increase of international co-operation; for the obtaining of racial and national prejudices; for prohibition; for religious liberals. For all these matters and for many others there are groups of earnest people working, spreading propaganda, proposing laws and administrative action. According to the degree of their earnestness and the character of the measures which they advocate, they are listed as Liberals or Radicals. Between most of the groups advocating reforms in these measures, a certain sympathy has grown up so that it is not difficult to find people who are sympathetic toward a whole groups of these reforms, and certainly it would be unusual and unexpected to find a persons who favored universal peace and at the same time was not in favor of some measure of tariff reform, or who wanted the death penalty in crime abolished, and was opposed to the emancipation of women. On the other hand, it is so surprisingly common to find the person who is liberal on nearly all of these matters, who nevertheless, has grave question as to how far the Negro should be regarded or accepted as an American citizen with the same rights as other citizens, or as to how far the Negro race in the United States should be treated as the potential equal of other races. So common is this attitude that it is not sufficient for a Negro to be told that this person is a Liberal; this candidate stands for a radical program; or that organization is progressive. He is disposed to ask rather _____ , pacifically, what the attitude of this person or organization is toward Negroes, and to require certain undoubted proofs before he is willing to give his sympathy, or his co-operation or part.

On the other hand, it is equally true that the majority of intelligent Negroes are apt to be ignorant or reactionary of the greater matters of modern social reform. The man who regards color prejudice as the greatest evil of modern life; who an_____- slavery and the color bar, may, nevertheless, be a red-hot patriot; a supporter of a large army and a big navy; one who suspects other nations and has no sympathy with Chinese or Japanese; who believes generally in the capitalistic system; who does not believe in trade unions; who thinks that jails and capital punishment is the only way to fight crime, and has a deep conviction that the place of women is in the home.

To those who first become conscious of all of the larger part of this contradictory set of facts, the natural reaction is impatience and anger. The white workingman who is called to discuss the Negro problem, sees in the Negro problem nothing else than the fact that most Negro workers are not membersof trade unions, and gets their jobs by scabbing. The advocate of universal peace is horrified and sarcastic to find Negroes ready to fight, to hurrah for the flag, to join military organizations, and to vote for a big navy. Advocates of _____ reform cannot understand the utter lack of interest which Negroes have in this matter of which they are so openly and greatly the victims. Negroes, on the other hand, are quick to accuse of downright hypocrisy most white Liberals and Radicals. They assert that the advocates of peace seem to be absolutely unconscious that one of the great causes of war is the fact that black folk are not regarded as human beings, and that this leads to war, not so much because white and black fight each other, as that whites fight white for the discrimination and ownership of blacks and blacks fight blacks because they are egged on by whites. They assert that Democracy is becoming a dead letter in the United States, principally because the disfranchisement of black people, and the uplift and emancipation of women in the lines of most white folks, means the protection of white women and the stripping of black women of every protection or difference in law or custom.

There is danger in this situation, and it is the purpose of this paper to apoint out in the first place the cause of the logical discrepancies here revealed, and the obvious remedy. In the first place, it is perfectly natural that liberal thought should forget all about the Negro. Most of the causes in which liberal and radical thought is interested antidate any active or important Negro problem. It is usual in the United States for people to go through the world and quite forget black folk until they are forcibly called to their attention. Most liberal movements, therefore, are simply uneducated when it comes to the Negro problem, and a persistent cause of education, backed by facts, figures and examinations, has got to be entered upon in order to convince Liberals and Radicals that the Negro problems are human problems so inter-mingled and connected with other problems of human reform, that they simply cannot be neglected. They must be openly faced, each in all inclusive human problem is to be worked out. Liberals and Radicals cannot be blamed for continually refusing to face these problems. When woman suffrage was becoming a national movement for civil war, its advocates were frighten to death lest in any way it should be mixed up with the so-called Negro problem. They were not only willing but eager to have the problem of the uplift of women considered without reference to black women, and yet the thing was eternally impossible. So today, one of the difficulties of making Democracy effective in the United States and carrying through thorough-going irradical reform, is the whole problem of the black vote, a problem most advocates of democracy simply refuse to face. It is conceivable that there should be in the United States and in other culture countries a movement for the uplift of labor through better wages, shorter hours, better conditions of work, protection against unemployment and education, which should openly and definitely confine itself to white laborers. But if consciously and clearly such a movement was launched, immediately thinkers would be forced to remember that such uplift of white labor must ineffectively depend upon the virtual slavery of yellow, brown and black labor, and that that slavery would have bad effect upon the effort to better the condition of white laborers and might indeed absolutely check the success of such efforts. At any rate, the problem has got to be faced if it is going logically to be thought out. Or, consider the matter of navies which has organized recently so large a part of the thought of great countries. We are spending sums upon great war machines, which are nothing less than ridiculous in their amount. We propose continually by international agreement to cut down this expenditure. So far as the main reasons for this cutting down of naval strength are discussed, it seems so obvious that it is difficult to understand the objection. Englishmen do not want to fight Americans. Americans do not want to fight Englishmen. The French and the Germans have had all the fighting that they want. It is inconceivable that the Italians really want to kill Frenchmen. But the difficulty is that the real pawns, the real prizes at stake, are not distributed. They are not brought into the picture. Hardly a word was said about them at the London Conference, atthe Geneva Conference, at the Washington Conference. All that Italy wants is the control of certain masses of laboring black folk in areas now controlled by France. What England wants is to hold intact a great Empire predominantly colored and not to have her economic advantage there shaken by the incursions of powerful commercial interest in the United States. What Germany wants is to get big areas of colored labor and raw material which she lost in the great war. These matters are so important to all these countries that despite what is said large numbers of men and influential groups are willing to direct organized murder in order to keep their present advantage or to increase their advantages. Moreover, the victims of this situation, the black laborers, and yellow laborers, and brown laborers, in Asia and islands of the sea, are not only voiceless in these conferences, but the mass of the intelligent people of England, France, Germany, Italy and America do not consider that the interest of colored peoples is of enough importance to be considered as compared with the income and wealth of white people. Manifestedly under these circumstances, the great degrease and abolition of navies and armies is unthinkable, and manifestedly, we have got to face with unblinking eye the color problem before the problem of naval reduction, military disarmment and peace can be settled.

On the other hand, advocates of social reform had a clear case against American Negroes, if not against other colored folk in the world. They did admit, many of them, that much of what he has said with regard in which the color problem entered other problems, is quite true. But they say, we get no support from colored people in our general efforts at reform. The colored people are very eager to have us help them, but their attitude is too often an attitude which seems to say: What we want is personally to escape from our disabilities. We want greater wealth and freedom and political power, and we propose to use this for ourselves and we would not be at all adverse if we got power to tramping other less fortunate people and less fortunate classes under our feet. Thus, there is continually disclosing a territory of colored people to be curiously provincial in their thought and aspiration. They haven't the slightest interest in the peace movement. What they want is to abolish lynching of Negroes in the United States. They are not advocates of democracy, so far as China or India is concerned or so far as the foreign-born of the United States is concerned. What they mean by democracy is the right of black America to vote. We want better wages, but they are perfectly willing to accept better wages at the expense of lower wages for other groups, whether they be American whites or brown or black people in other lands. In other words, reformers have a right to complain that instead of appointing themselves as a part of the great mass of people for whom social reform is trying to work amelioration of condition. They tend to appoint themselves as a reason. The only victims of oppression and the ones for whom not only Negroes themselves must work but all other people must give up their interests and join in the settlement of their problem. It is manifest now that the time is here when this logical failure to understand each other must come to an end. Reformers must realize that after all one of the chief difficulties with the thought of American Negroes is that they have been so long excluded from contact and conference with the mass of their fellow citizens that it is not easy for them to realize what these people are thinking of and where the shoe pinches in the case of white Americans and yellow Asiatics, today the education which Negroes have received has quite naturally given them the attitude of prosperous Americans of the previous century, but in their textbooks they have learned the advantages of wealth and power and the low and despicable position of other nations and races. That the only thing that has counteracted this general knowledge has been the specific knowledge of their own disabilities. But under these circumstances, it is natural for American Negroes to be radical so far as the Negro problem is concerned, but to be reactionary or intelligent on all other social problems. The American Negro, therefore, needs an intensive course of study, not only in schools but in adult life of the difficulties of the world and the reform movements, and the part which Negroes as citizens of the world must play in reform.

Just as truly, no man today has a right to discribe himself as liberal or radical who refuses to face the problem of black folk and colored people; who proposes to reform the world for the benefit of white people on the tacit assumption that other folk are not human in the same sense that white people are human. To achieve this attitude, they have got to become acquainted with what is known as the Negro problems; they have got to face the facts of their problem; they have got to realize its human difficulties and implications; they have got to know Negroes as human beings.

I doubt if that once there is this orientation of thought among Negroes, Liberals and Radicals, and there is going to be a chance for reform in the United States which today seems almost impossible. We are quite used today to seeing efforts of reform backed by unassailable logic and deep sympathy, fall on absolutely deaf ears, and the reason is that back of the spoken word is the whispering campaign which says this will never do: Look out for Japan; look out for the Negroes of the South; look out for the yellow peril. But, on the other hand, every effort to make the Negro act as a thinking human being, an intelligent voter, an advocate of liberal causes, is again made by the whispering campaign, These people are , , they don't believe in you, and you can't trust what they say. I know of no single line of work in the modern world and in America which promises more immediate and gratifying result than a thorough understanding and unification of the race problems and the problems of social reform.

by W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

The relation between those who wish to reform and uplift society, on the one hand, and Negroes and their friends, on the other, is a curious one. Yet it is a matter seldom discussed and continually leading to difficulty and misunderstanding.

It is, for instance, commonplace for a liberally-minded American to discover with astonishment, and to meet the discovery with stinging criticism, that American Negroes are often unacquainted with the great liberal movements of the day—or if acquainted, not advocates of them; or even opposed to them. Radical advocates of thorough-going and even revolutionary reform, are especially astonished that Negroes display so little interest in their programs. Conservative friends of the Negro hail this as common sense, but radicals call it stupidity.

On the other hand, the colored people themselves continually express bitter disappointment at the fact that men may be liberal on so many matters of reform, and yet be unsympathetic and even reactionary so far as the Negro problem is concerned; indeed, it is quite common to find radicals who have no place at all in their program for Negroes. The usual explanations are of two sorts: Liberals explain that their programs and proposals are such that if adopted they will automatically solve the Negro problem—that indeed the so-called Negro problem is not a problem of Negroes at all but simply a human problem of economics, of education, of democracy, of crime and what not. But, on the other hand, Negroes declare that liberal and radical platforms cannot attack the problems of the mass of men without first recognizing Negroes as men; that failure to do this is so fundamental a fault that it negatives all effective effort at social uplift. They regard, therefore, the Color Line as the first test of real liberalism or radical reform.

Here now is a serious impasse. It is a situation not only anomalous but dangerous. It interferes with logical thought and it tends, on the one hand, to make the Negro provincial, unprogressive and even selfish in his outlook; and, on the other, to make honest reformers openly dishonest in their thought and action.

This may best be illustrated by certain groups of specific proposals for social reform such as war and disarmament; education and illiteracy; income, wage, unemployment, housing and poverty; recreation, health, crime and punishment; voting, taxation and the tariff; prohibition. On all these matters and for many others there are earnest people working, spreading propaganda, proposing laws, administrative action and social change. Between most of the groups a certain sympathy has grown up so that it is not difficult to find people who are advocates of most of these reforms; and certainly it would be unusual and unexpected to find a person who favored universal peace and at the same time was not in favor of some measure of tariff reform; or who wanted the death penalty in crime abolished, but was nevertheless opposed to popular education.

On the other hand, it is surprisingly common to find the person who is liberal or radical on most of these matters, but who nevertheless is unwilling to express any opinion concerning Negroes—as to whether they should be regarded as a human race, potentially equal to other races; as to whether they should be treated as American citizens; as to whether the 15th Amendment is as important as the 18th.

So common is this attitude that certain quite illogical attitudes of mind are not questioned. For instance, it is not sufficient for a Negro to be told that this person is a Liberal; that this candidate stands for a radical program; or that such and such an organization is progressive. He is disposed to inquire specifically what the attitude of this person or organization is toward Negroes, and to inquire of them certain unquestionable proofs before he is willing to give them his sympathy, or his co-operation. When the Progressive Party was launched under Roosevelt, the Negroes asked one blunt question: How do you stand on votes for Negroes? When Al Smith was represented as a Liberal, Negroes refused to vote for him because he refused openly to oppose lynching or disfranchisement.

On the other hand, it is equally true that the majority of intelligent Negroes are apt to be singularly ignorant, uninterested or even reactionary on the greater matters of modern social reform. Thus, the man who regards color prejudice as the greatest evil of modern life, may, nevertheless, be eager to fight for his country, right or wrong; be a supporter of a large army and a big navy; and have no sympathy with trade unions, Indian freedom or Chinese nationhood; he may regard the capitalistic system as perfect and ordained of God; he may think that jails and capital punishment are the only way to fight crime; he may have a deep conviction that the place of woman is "in the home!"

Those who become conscious of some part of the contradiction in these attitudes, often display a natural reaction of impatience and anger. The white workingman who is called to discuss the Negro problem, sees in the Negro problem nothing else but the fact that most Negro workers are not members of trade unions, and got their present jobs by scabbing. The advocate of universal peace is horrified and sarcastic to find Negroes eager to get into West Point and summer military camps; advocates of modern methods of preventing and curing crime cannot understand the utter lack of interest which Negroes have in a matter in which they are so openly and frequently the victims.

Prohibitionists wonder at the apathy of black folk on the liquor question and those who fear the political power of the Catholic church find Negroes blissfully unconscious of danger.

Negroes, on the other hand, are quick to accuse of downright hypocrisy most white Liberals and Radicals. They assert that the advocates of peace seem to be absolutely unconscious that one of the great causes of war is the fact that black folk are not regarded as human beings, and that this leads to war, not so much because white and black fight each other, as that white fights white for the exploitation and ownership of blacks; and black fights black because he is deceived and and egged on by whites. Negroes assert that Democratic government is becoming a dead letter in the United States, not only because of the systematic disfranchisement of black people, but of the consequent disfranchisement of millions of whites which the Solid South makes necessary. Negroes aver that the emancipation of women, in the thought of most white folks, is compatible with laws and customs that strip black women of every protection for soul and body. There is danger in the situation which I have indicated; and it is the kind of logical danger which has in the past overthrown civilization, nations, social classes and religious sytems. Greece could talk about the rule of the people by the simple expedient of not regarding nine-tenths of the inhabitants as people at all. Christianity could proclaim the Prince of Peace and the love of neighbors and yet lead canturies of war in Europe, Asia and Africa, while burning witches and enslaving human beings at home. The United States in 1776, with "a decent regard to the opinions of mankind", could declare:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights; that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness."

And they said this looking 600,000 black slaves straight in the eye. It is then the purpose of this paper to point out, in the first place, the causes of the logical discrepancies here revealed, and secondly, to seek to indicate the obvious remedies.

Historically, it is easy to trace the reasons of this blindness. The social heredity of nearly all our broader national problems leads back to the time when the Negro simply did not have to be considered--poverty is age old and why should a few million poor Negroes change its essential meaning? War has always been the crime of mankind—how can it be regarded today as part of the Negro problem. We have long had problems of women, education and crime.

Moreover, with the prevalent social separation by color and the silence of pulpit and press, the problems of Negroes and the problems of which Negroes are a part, simply do not occur to many eager and observant thinkers. A meeting like this may focus attention for a week; a visit to the South may remind some college-professor that the slavery question was not settled by the Civil War. White people every now and then meet a complaining Negro—become suddenly aware of him and ask in perplexity; well, what are you complaining of? Aren't you free? Do you expect me to ask you to dinner? A leading critical monthly recently had a sarcastic article on "Wailing Negroes" and pointed out that they had really very little to complain of. A new political party was recently launched advocating all possible modern reforms. When asked why their platform was silent on the Negro, they said frankly: "We forgot him!" They forgot one-tenth of the nation's population whose plight affects every one of the other nine-tenths.

Most liberal movements, therefore, are simply uneducated, when it comes to the present Negro problem, and a persistent course of education, backed by facts, figures and explanations, has got to be entered upon in order to convince Liberals and Radicals that the Negro problems of the 20th Century are human problems, and so intermingled and inter-connected with other problems of human reform, that they simply cannot be neglected without ultimate disaster. They must be openly faced as part of an all inclusive human problem.

There are social reformers who know this and yet they are silent and the silence and inaction of such men presents the greatest difficulty of our day; and that is, the widespread pessimism concerning any possibility of solution. Again and again liberal-minded men come face to face with this problem, throw up their hands, and say by word or action, or by mute inaction: the question is simply unanswerable. We do not know and we cannot conceive how the Negroes of America, much less the Negro race in the world, is going to survive as a part of civilization. It is useless, they say, therefore, to try to include the Negro in any present program of reform. Admitting, as many do admit, that no complete consideration may be given to the problems of democracy, education and crime so long as we neglect the Negro element, nevertheless, their argument is that nothing can be done because the bringing in of any consideration of the Negro would make everything impossible.

One can see in the history of various movements the influence of this idea. When woman suffrage was about to become a national movement before the Civil War, its advocats were frightened to death lest in any way the question of the status of white women should be mixed up with the slavery question. You remember doubtless the delicious story of Sojourner Truth and the first national Suffrage convention. They were not only willing but insistent that the problem of the uplift of women be considered without reference to black women. And yet, of course, the thing was and is eternally impossible.

So today, one of the difficulties of making democracy effective in the United States and carrying out thorough-going radical reform, is the whole problem of the black vote, a problem most advocates of democracy simply refuse to face. It is possible to have college courses in Democracy, public forum debates on democracy, learned articles and long books without any serious consideration of American Negroes as part of democracy in America. The only reference which any respectable modern American allows himself is profound regret that the 15th Amendment was passed 60 years ago. It is conceivable that there should be in the United States and in other culture countries a movement for the uplift of labor through better wages, shorter hours, better conditions of work, protection against unemployment and education, which should openly and definitely confine its benefits to white laborers. And this is practically what the A. F. of L., the British labor party, the German and Austrian Socialists and the labor movement of the world does. But if consciously and openly such an object were clearly proclaimed, immediately thinkers would be forced to remember, that the uplift of white labor today depends on two elements: immense profits of white capital which depend on the semi-slavery and starvation wage of colored labor, an increasing but still a small share of this profit goes to white labor as the political and social power of the Labor movement compells employers to yield. Every thinking leader of the labor movement in white countries then faces a baffling dilemma: if he organizes to raise the status and wage of black and brown and yellow labor, he must either cut his own wage and standard of living or further reduce the profits of his employers. He does not dare do either and the result is that the Labor government of England fights Egypt and India, the Socialist bloc of France enslaves Syria and Burma, and the Democratic United States chokes Haiti, Nicararigua and the Philippines.

Or, consider the matter of navies which have occupied recently so large a part of the thought of great countries. We are spending sums upon war machines, which are nothing less than ridiculous in their amount. We propose continually by international agreement to cut down this expenditure. So far as the main reasons for this cutting down of naval strength are concerned, they are so obvious that it is difficult to understand any objection. Englishmen are overtaxed for war and do not want to fight Americans. Americans are overtaxed for war and do not want to fight Englishmen. The French and the Germans are overtaxed for war and have had all the fighting that they want for a century to come. It is inconceivable that the overtaxed Italians really want to kill Frenchmen or Yargo slavs. But the difficulty is that the real pawns, the real prizes at stake, the real things that all of them are willing to fight for, are not mentioned. They are not brought into the picture. They are deliberately forgotten. Hardly a word was said about them at the London Conference, at the Geneva Conference, at the Washington Conference. They, like the Negro problem with us, are regarded as an outside unrelated and unimportent problem.

All that Italy wants is the control of certain raw materials and masses of laboring black folk in areas now controlled by France. What England wants is to hold intact a great Empire predominantly colored and ruled autocratically over nine-tenths of its area and not to have her immense economic advantage there shaken by the incursion of powerful commercial interests from the United States. What Germany wants is to get back at least some of the areas of colored labor and raw material which she lost in the Great War.

These matters are so important, so vital to all these countries, that despite what is said the mass of employers and laborers, the teachers and scholars, the church people, and their priests are willing to direct organized murder, spill oceans of blood, and dissipate uncounted treasure in order to keep their present advantage or to increase it at the expense of other lands.

Moreover, the victims of this situation, the black laborers, and yellow laborers, and brown laborers, in Asia and islands of the sea, are not only voiceless in these conferences, but the mass of the intelligent Christian people of England, France, Germany, Italy and America do not consider that the interest of colored peoples is of enough importance to be even mentioned when compared with the income and wealth, the comfort and luxury, the world power and civilization of white people. Manifestly under these circumstances, any great decrease or abolition of navies and armies is unthinkable; and manifestly, before the problem of naval reduction, military disarmament and world peace can be settled, we have got to walk up and face with unblinking eye the problem of the place and use and future of the majority of mankind who do not happen to be white.

On the other hand, advocates of social reform have a clear case against American Negroes, and against many other colored folk in the world. Many of them admit much of what has been said with regard to the color element in all world problems. But they say: We get no sympathy or support from colored people in our general efforts at reform. The colored people are very eager to have us help them, but their attitude is too often an attitude which seems to say: What we want is personally to escape from our present disabilities. We want greater wealth and freedom and political power, and we propose to use this for ourselves; and we would not be at all adverse if we got power to trampling less fortunate white people and our own less fortunate social classes under our feet. Unless the Negro American group sees direct advantage to itself, it shows little interest in public movements. How many Negroes are interested in the release of political prisoners? How many have enlisted in the war against capital punishment? What interest have they in tariff taxation, high or low? Nor is this all: in matters where they do show interest they have continually bee on the wrong side. Negroes voted overwhelmingly against woman suffrage; they continually are found siding with the rich, the fashionable, the well-to-do and against the poor and ragged and unfortunate. There is no social snobbery that can outdo the pretentions of black folk who have achieved large income and some social recognition from the dominant white world. The colored groups of the world are proverbially groups of oppression and social discrimination; the ignorant tyranny of the Egyptians over the black Sudan gives England excuse for more scientific exploitation there, just as caste and religious sectarianism delivers India to her man, bound hand and foot. The silly ostentation of Indian rajahs, the present anarchy in China where rich merchants have for years joined rich foreigners in enslaving the coolies—all this seems to most Liberals reason for less action rather than for more—for despair, rather than increased determination.

There is continually disclosing a tendency of colored people in the United States to be curiously provincial in their thought and aspiration. Even when they are right they are narrow. They have not the slightest interest in the peace movement. What they want is to abolish the lynching of Negroes. They are not advocates of democracy, so far as China or India is concerned, or so far as the foreign-born of the United States are concerned. What they mean by democracy is the right of black America to sell its delegates to the highest bidder at National Republican conventions. They want better wages, but they are perfectly willing to accept better wages at the expense of lower wages for other groups, whether these groups be American whites or brown or black people in other lands.

The complacent attitude of colored people in religion is particularly exasperating to liberal-minded folk. Their churches are still largely centers of an unintelligent, uncivilized practice of emotional self indulgence, with almost no attempt to face the religious problems of the day. When the great M. E. Church fought hard and kept its colored members, they kept a block of members who voted against theaters and dancing, fifty years after these questions had been dead as Tophet. The Baptist are split not only by the color line but by a line of civilization which leaves the colored church 50 years behind and proud to be so. The colored Episcopalians and Congregationalists are content to be humble objects of white charity. Where is religious freedom, independent assertion and renewal of high ideals in such a group? The leading Fundamentalists today are in the white South and the black church.

In other words, reformers have a right to complain that instead of regarding themselves as a part of a great mass of people for whom social reform is trying to work out some amelioration of condition, Negroes tend to regard themselves as the only victims of oppression and the ones for whom not only Negroes themselves must work, but all other people must give up all other interests to join in the settlement of their problem.

It is manifest now, that the time is here when this logical failure to understand each other must come to an end. Reformers must realize that after all, one of the chief difficulties with the thought of American Negroes is that they have been so long excluded from contact and conference with the mass of their fellow citizens that it is not easy for them to realize what these people are thinking of and where the shoe pinches in the case of white Americans and yellow Asiatics. Today the education which Negroes have received has quite naturally given them the mental attitude of the prosperous Americans of a previous cnetury; in their textbooks they have learned the advantages of wealth and power and the low and despicable position of other nations and races. The only thing that has counteracted this general knowledge has been the specific knowledge of the disabilities of Negroes. Under these circumstances, it is natural for American Negroes to be radical so far as the Negro problem is concerned, but to be indifferent or reactionary on all other social problems. The American Negro, therefore, needs an intensive course of study, not only in schools but in adult life of the difficulties of the world, of the meaning of reform movements, and of the part which Negroes as citizens of the world must play in reform.

Just as truly, no man today has a right to describe himself as liberal or radical who refuses to face the problem of black folk and colored people; who sits down before one of the greatest of world problems and seeks to settle it by saying it cannot be settled; who proposes to reform the world for the benefit of white people on the tacit assumption that other folk are not human in the same sense that white people are human. To ~~achieve~~ change this attitude, they have got to become acquainted with what is known as the Negro problems; they have got to face the facts of that problem; they have got to realize its human difficulties and implications; they have got to know Negroes as human beings and treat them as such.

I doubt not but if once there is this orientation of thought among Negroes, Liberals and Radicals, there is going to be a chance for reform in the United States which today seems almost impossible. We are quite used today to seeing efforts of reform, backed by unassailable logic and deep sympathy, fall on absolutely deaf ears, and the reason is that back of the spoken word is the whispering campaign which says: this will never do: Look out for Japan; look out for the Negroes of the South; look out for the yellow peril. But, on the other hand, every effort to make the Negro act as a thinking human being, an intelligent voter, an advocate of liberal causes, is again marred by the whispering campaign. These people are hypocrits, they do not believe in black folk, and you cannot trust what they say. I know of no single line of work in the modern world and in America which promises more immediate and graitfying result than a thorough understanding and unification of the race problems and the problems of social reform.

I have purposely omitted here a discussion of the obvious differences that must lie between liberal and radical programs. This is because exact definition of reform is secondary to my main purpose of saying that social reform of any kind must include Negroes, and that Negroes must work for social reform.

But I shall not shirk the secondary matter because it is the theme of the Crisis magazine which I edit. I can say that today any honest and thorough Liberal reformer must stand for ideals looking toward the following matters:

World Peace

Anti-Imperialism

The Reduction of Poverty

Increase social control of property and income.

Democracy in politics and in industry.

Public education

Internationalism and the breaking down of artificial barriers between nations and races.

The scientific curse of crime, Health and war on disease.

Freedom of thought and expression in the pursuit of truth and beauty.

And the abolition of dogma in religion.

I cannot conceive of anyone calling himself intelligently liberal in 1930 to whom these ideals do not appeal as objects of effort. On the other hand, what are the Negro problems today? They are, I take it, Military oppression of the colored races, including lynching

The denial of self-government

Low wages and organization of industry and commerce which keeps wages low.

Disfranchisement in politics and industry.

Restricted education

Race prejudice which prevents human contact

Crime, due principally to poverty, disease and discrimination.

The inability to complain of these conditions without incurring public disapprobation or even mob law.

One cannot compare these two lists without seeing that they are simply two sides of the same set of problems: the one side larger in the United States because of the majority of whites; the other side, larger throughout the world because of the majority of colored people. And yet, whether we regard the color problem as a problem of the people or the United States or as a world problem, the same thing must be true. No permanent social advance can be made and maintained, if, on the one hand, liberal-minded reformers refuse to face the Negro problems, and if, on the other hand, the American Negro and the colored races seek to escape from their present disabilities without working hand in hand with the reformers of the world.

Granted this obvious fact and there comes the practical matter as to how this social advance can best be achieved. The worse victims of military oppression, the slaves of imperial industry, the unemployed of civilized states; those who suffer from the greed of organized wealth in politics, industry and education. The social classes disfranchised for their manners, their poverty or their color; the weak, the wretched and the insane. The victims of economic and religious intolerance. Such folk, so far as they consciously think and feel, must tend toward the radicals. They must tend to seek relief from present conditions only in force and even revolution. On the other hand, in a happy city like this, which is in many aspects a paradise for the well-to-do, where owners of safe bonds congregate weekly in comfortable churches and worship a God who has ceased to threaten; people to whom the present organization of society and industry has furnished undoubted advantages, and who are, therefore, disposed to rejoice that they are not as the Russians are, and to be glad that John Brown planned his anarchy eighty years ago and not today — such people, naturally, will be only mildly Liberals. They will be neither excited nor extreme about remedies for present ills, and they will easily turn to regard reform as simply a matter of personal charity.

Between these extremes, where shall the American Negro stand? I maintain that his position in this land with his poverty and ignorance; his limited economic opportunity; his disfranchisement and social ostracism, forces him logically to take his stand rather with the poor than with the rich, with the workers and not with the employers, with the unfortunate and not with the well-to-do. He should help raise from that great and propelling tide of protest which must soon awaken America and the world to the short-comings of present civilization and to the insistent need of thorough-going reform. He will be kept from extreme methods of revolutionary reform, on the one hand, by the memory of what he himself has accomplished by means of the benevolent charity of others, and the persistent agitation of his own organization. But this will not seduce him into complacency and fatuous contentment which is found impossible if he is to survive as an efficent member of a modern civilized state. It is more necessary that he guard himself against the complacency and mild liberalism of the well-to-do than against the agitation of bitter complaint of the outcasts of the world. And it is here between radicals and the Negro, between revolution and the colored races, that the Liberals, and particularly the Liberals of America, hold the balance. If their recognize the desperate plight of the poor and the black, they will have forestalled radical upheaval by intelligent reason and immediate reform. But if their climb upward makes them blind and deaf to the world's ills, they will be the ones who will find themselves appealing to force and bloodshed in order to oppose the bloodshed and the force of thoses determined to be free.

And right here lies, as it seems to me, the real common ground of Liberal, Radical and Negro.

What Black America Thinks of South Africa (Please forward)

The development of interest in South Africa among American Negroes has been noticeable in the last ten years. When Bishop Turner of the African Methodist Church a generation ago returned from South Africa and talked of its problems and prospects, his words fell on deaf ears. The American Negro had become prejudiced against Africa because of the effort of the slave holders to get rid of the problem of the free Negro by shipping him off to Africa. Ever since Emancipation, American Negroes have maintained that they are Americans and not Africans. Gradually, however, they have begun to acknowledge their kinship of interest with the black folk of Africa. This has been brought about by the African students who have been training in America; the American Negroes who have visited Africa as missionaries and travelled, and the Pan-African Congresses, held in Paris, London, Brussels, Lisbon and New York. Today, there is widespread and lively interest among American Negroes in their brothers of Negro descent in Africa and they think of South Africa as the country where the race problem is most intense and where its settlement means most for the Negro in the world. It is not easy for American Negroes to get first-hand knowledge of what is happening in South Africa. Their knowledge comes chiefly from the visits of South African natives and from the South African native papers, and from the little that they can get in the white press. The general idea among American Negroes of the South African problem is that the whites there are the most bitterly prejudiced set of modern persons who have come in contact with the Negro race. Negroes there are discriminated against and drawn race lines which are worse than anything that we have experienced in the United States: Separate residential districts; separate post office entrances; separate railway cars and street cars, and things of that sort. Moreover, they understand that this separation is based on law and that the laws upon separation are increasing. In the United States most of the race discrimination is illegal and systematic appeals to the courts are gradually breaking it down. There are separate cars in the Southern states, but they must, according to law, give "equal" accommodation. The discrimination as to voting is patently illegal and it is only a matter of time when it will be broken down. The United States courts have repeatedly declared that separation by race in residential districts is against the fundamental law of the land. In South Africa, on the other hand, we learn that Negroes cannot buy land except in restricted districts; that they cannot build and live in homes, except by special permission, and that they can vote only in the Cape Province ~~of Capetown~~, and even there they cannot vote for Negro officials. In seven states of the United States Negroes sit in the Legislatures, and we have one Negro in Congress, and will have more. We have several judges and several men high in administrative positions. Nothing of this sort, we understand, can happen in South Africa, there you have the vast majority of the black inhabitants ruled by white people and with absolutely no effective voice in their own government. We cannot understand how any civilized country can defend a situation of this sort. Of course, to most American Negroes it is not clear that the mass of natives are not acquainted with modern civilization; that illiteracy is well-nigh universal, and that modern methods of work and living are unknown. But, despite this, American Negroes are astonished at the opposition to the education of the natives, of the very small relative amount of money that is spent on native education. Negro education is discriminated against in America but, nevertheless, it is growing by leaps and bounds. In 1900, we had only 1,500 Negro students in college. Today, we have 19,000. Two-third's of the adult Negroes in America can read and write. American Negroes are especially incensed at the thought that the situation in South Africa involves the invasion of a people's country by foreigners and making those natives strangers and aliens on their own soil. We can understand how in America an alien race, even though brought against its own, will, should be ~~certainly~~ at first looked upon as strangers. Nevertheless, because of our long residence and our increase in knowledge and civilization, we are fighting a winning battle to be regarded, legally and conventionally, as American citizens. But in Africa, we see the astonishing situation of a million and half white people invading and seizing the land where six or seven million natives live and then setting up a government and a civilization which practically doesn't regard these natives as having any rights in their own continent. It envisages for them no future. Because in spite of the clap-trap which Jans Smuts has been distributing around the civilized world, any program for the future of African natives which involves their being cut off from modern civilization and confined to their primitive folk ways, at the same time that they are being heartlessly exploited by powerful industrial organizations, is headed for disastrous failure. We have ~~no~~ more sympathy with Hertgoz's plan, which while it is idiotic and can never be worked out, nevertheless has the merit at least of honesty and frankly proposing to do openly what already South Africa is doing. As to the future of South Africa, we can see but one out come. The native must become recognized as a part of the state with the right to ~~a future~~ vote and the right to work, with the right to own land and property and with universal education. If this can only be accomplished by a separation of races, then that separation has got to be a real and just separation. The land which the natives has must be just as good as the land of the whites, and if natives are kept out of white districts, whites must be kept out of native districts. Self-government for black people must become the rule in South Africa, and unless South Africa soon admits this and begins to work toward it, she is going to become an outcast among the nations. It is simply unthinkable that in a day when the black people of North America, the West Indies and South America are becoming incorporated in their respected states, when the yellow people of Asia are demanding and beginning to secure self-rule, when one can see the beginning of nationhood in Abyssinia and even in black West Africa, there should grow up in South Africa a state based upon the utter sub-ordination of three-fourths or more of its inhabitants.

W. E. B. DuBois (1930?)

Men as goods and social revolution. The new thing in the renaissance was not simply freedom, freedom of spirit and body, but freedom to destroy freedom; freedom to make slaves. The ancient world knew slaves and knew them well but they were slaves that worked in private and personal service or in public service like the building of pyramid and when slaves made goods the goods made them free because men knew the worker and the work and judged them humanly and sympatheticly. But when in the latter 15th century there came slaves, and mainly black slaves, they performed a different service. That service became for the most part not personal but labor that made crops and crops that sold widely and in the end promised vaster personal service than the first workers could directly give. This then was not labor but capital labor and the slaves were not laborers but a kind of capital goods and capital whether in labor or in goods; in men or in crops was impersonal, inhuman, a means to a mighty end. Immediately slaves became not men but things and valued as things are valued by the demand and supply of their labor force. They belonged, it happened, to a race apart, unknown, unfamilar because the available supply of people of that race was for the moment cheaper. Hence arose a doctrine of race based really on color but franticly extended.in every possible direction. The ancient world knew no races only families, clans, nations and degrees and contrast of culture. The medieval world evolved an ideal of personal worth and freedom for wider groups of men and a dawning belief in humanity as such. Suddenly comes America; the sale of men as goods in Africa; the crops these goods-men grew, the revolution in industry and commerce and manufacture and transport and trade and transformation of goods for magnificen service and power. The cry for the freedom of men's spirit became a shriek for freedom in trade and profit. The revolt of the liberal spirit was arrested by the theory of race so that black men became black devils or imbeciles.to be consumed like cotton and sugar and tobacco to make whiter and nobler men happier.

Fortunately as Gobineau rationalized this subjection of men Marx saw the virus of labor exploitation, of labor regarded and treated as goods poisoning Europe. He saw the social revolution, revolution in ideas which traffic in labor force for power and personal enjoyment brought and he saw this becoming the object of that very industrial revolution to which black slavery gave birth. Freedom then became freedom to enslave all working classes and soon the emancipation of the new wage slaves arising out of the hell of the industrial revolution was hindered by chattel slavery and men began dimly to see slavery as it really was. Then chattel slavery of black folk fell but immediately and in its very falling was rebuilt on African soil in the image and pattern of European wage slavery of the 18th and 19th centuries which at the time was crumbling before a new freedom. The abolitionists, however, did not realize where the real difference between white and black workers had entered. Initially the goods which the white workers made had made them free but the goods which black slaves made did not make them free. It long kept them slaves for these workers were isolated in far and wild America. The eaters and wearers and smokers of their crops, even the owners of their crops and bodies did not see them working or know their misery or realize the injustice of their economic situation. They were workers isolate from the consumer and consumers bargained only with those who owned the fruit of their stolen toil often fine, honest, educated men. Those then who in the dieing 19th century and dawning 20th saw the gleam of the new freedom were too busy to realize how land monopoly and wage slavery and forced labor in present Africa was threatening Europe of the 20th century and reestablishing the worst aspects of the factory system and dehumanizing capital in the world at the time when it was diligently attacked in culture lands. They did not see that here was the cause of that new blossoming of world wars which instead of being wars of personal enmity, of dynastic ambition, or of national defense become wars for income and income on so vast a scale that its realization meant the enslavement of the masses of men. All this then was the significance of that slave trade which we now study.

Ethiopia

34-1-20

After the tumult and shouting, it may be well to review that which the great and distinguished writer, Arthur Brisbane, regards as the "circus" at Addis Abeba. The press correspondents had a most difficult time. Their original cue was to get a great deal of fun out of the crowning of this black King; and even after revelation had come to them, they restrained themselves with great difficulty. There were, for instance, the lightly veiled jibes at the architecture of this African capital; and there was the delicious story of machine guns guarding the new Emperor from his own army. There were the usual hints at splendor amid dust and mud, always described as barbaric, if it takes place outside Europe and New York, and unless it takes place in London, with the solemn ~~presence~~ aura of George V.

In other words, there was in the news from Ethiopia a certain note of haunting restraint. First, of course, there was the change of name: Abyssinia has long been in use. It is a country of white folk, mysteriously lost in Northeast Africa; but not Negro, Oh no! and not Negroid. "Ethiopia", on the other hand, which these people now curiously insist on calling their country, has the most unfortunate implications in America. When we have run the gamut of "colored", "Nigger" and "darky", we come down to the depths of "Ethiopian", and now comes an Ethiopian emperor! Then, too, this matter of color in the new incarnation of Ethiopia is a bit disconcerting. Not even the hardiest of the correspondents could describe th King of Kings as white, or even as "olive". England, with the cunning eye for effect which seldom fails, sent a Prince of the Blood, and so did Italy; and these two naturally outranked everybody, save the conquering Lion of Judah himself.

Our business is to get America to invest in Abyssinia and in Tanganyika. Ethiopia

by W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

After the tumult and shouting, it may be well to review that which the great and distinguished writer, Arthur Brisbane, regards as the "circus" at Addis Abeba. The press correspondents had a most difficult time. Their original cue was to get a great deal of fun out of the crowning of this black King; and even after revelation had come to them, they restrained themselves with great difficulty. There were, for instance, the lightly veiled jibes at the architecture of this African capital; and there was the delicious story of machine guns guarding the new Emperor from his own army. We got most of our fun out of Colonel Julian, the Negro American aviator. There were the usual hints at splendor amid dust and mud, always described as barbaric, if ~~it takes place~~ outside Europe and New York, and unless it takes place in London, with the solemn face of George V.

In other words, there was in the news from Ethiopia a certain note of pained restraint. First, of course, there was the change of name: Abyssinia has long been in use. It is a country of white folk, mysteriously lost in Northeast Africa; but not Negro, Oh no! and not Negroid. "Ethiopia", on the other hand, which these people now curiously insist on calling their country, has the most unfortunate implications in America. When we have run the gamut of "colored", "Nigger" and "darky", we come down to the depths of "Ethiopian", and now comes an Ethiopian emperor! Then, too, this matter of color in the new incarnation of Ethiopia is a bit disconcerting. Not even the hardiest of the correspondents could describe the King of Kings as white, or even as "olive". Certain correspondents did find "white" children among those that swarmed for dimes before the Imperial throne. But sunlight effects the eyes in Africa. "My God!" cried the Anzacs, in world-war time, "We didn't know the Egyptians was Niggers!" They say that helped Zagloul's rebellion, So correspondents had to be careful.

The thing that astonished the unsophisticated was the notice which all Europe took of this dark coronation, and more strange to say, the fact that even color-mad America and President Hoover, (who's not a bit color blind, even in Southern politics), were up and coming in the very front rank behind the brass band. England, with the cunning eye for effect which seldom fails, sent a Prince of the Blood, and so did Italy; and these two naturally outranked everybody, save the conquering Lion of Judah himself.

America was represented by a real General in gold braid, a naturalized German banker, with the rank of Ambassador and a United States Minister, who received a gorgeous decoration. France was there with a full fledged Marshall, baton, oak-leaves and all; and Germany, Japan and Turkey, the Catholic Church, the Netherlands and Poland,—thirteen delegations in all—stood by. Indeed, it looked almost like a swarming of vultures, looking for loose corpses in North Africa. This, too, was emphasized by certain significant absences: Nearly all the darker world of Asia and Africa, save Japan, Turkey and Egypt, was conspiciously absent. Russia, of course, was not there, nor the little states of the Balkans; neither Haiti nor Liberia came; but the imperial masters of exploited yellow, brown and black men, were there all smiles, gold braid and clinking swords, decked out with pomp and circumstance. And presents, too, all the way from a big English cake to French and Italian airplanes.

The secret dispatches sent or carried home, nor even those uncommitted to paper, but whispered into the ears of wise Prime Ministers, have not been divulged to an eager public. Nevertheless, I seem so sure in my own mind as to what these delegates said that I am giving my guesses full publicity here, without assuming one iota of responsibility. If this is what was said and written, than I quote verbatim!

England's Resident Minister, Sir Sidney Barton, hastened to cable in code:

"Good we had Glouscester here! His medals and uniforms made a superb showing. And, of course, he outranked everything, even Italy; the Emperor was vastly flattered. At least he should have been. He is not a man quite as subject to flattery as I would like. "France and England must get together and watch Germany and America in Abyssinia. Above all, we must sound out Italy. She's still sore."

M. le Mareshal Franchet d'Esperly, heading the French mission, must have been given an earful of information to take home. The spokesman of the resident legation would say: "After all, they all had to land in French territory". Ships arrived and left Djibouti and all rode up the mountains to Addis Abeba on a French railway,—English milords, American shopkeepers and Italian Facisti. This gratifies but also reminds us of what we missed in 1898! "Nevertheless, we are still dominant in Abyssinia. The Emperor speaks our language alone of European tongues and has an excellent French chef. We are educating more young Abyssinians than any other country. We have more capital invested in Abyssinia than any European country, and we are going to invest more. For the first time in her history, Abyssinia has at last decided to contract a foreign debt to stabilize her currency, extend her railway and begin industrialization. and we remember, too, what old Menelik, that real Lion of Judah, said when he faced Italy and Great Britain:

But we got our greatest joy out of Colonel Julian, the Afro-American aviator. He gave us a chance to laugh at Negroes in America and to sneer indirectly at Abyssinia. And yet, there was something a bit significant about Julian's attempt, and the last Abyssinian commission was strangely eager to interest American Negroes in Abyssinia.

On the other hand, we are bankrupt financially and the world knows it, and if we back down before France and England, we'll be bankrupt, politically. We have got to go forward. We must triumph in Africa. We cannot ease the pressure on England and France.

MAY WEEK AT TALLADEGA

The May Week celebration sponsored by Alpha Zeta Chapter of Delta Sigma Theta Sorority from May 1-4 was a decided success. Members of the chapter had charge of chapel exercises on Thursday and Friday. On these two days the chapter presented local Delta talent. The Sunday afternoon program was contributed by Sorors Lorraine Howse and Grace Price, corresponding members of Alpha Beta Chapter; and Mrs. W. T. B. Williams, a member of the graduate chapter at Tuskegee. The intellectual value of the chapel programs was based on interfraternalism and interracialism. The intellectual guidance received on Sunday was from Soror Williams' talk on Educational Ideals. The material contribution to educational uplift was in the form of library books. The books were: The Door, a mystery novel by Mary Roberts Rhinehart The Exile, a novel by Warwick Deeping; and A Guide to Short Stories by Firkins. Alpha Zeta Chapter and visiting sorors feels that the celebration was quite a success and are confident that the next May Week celebration will be still better.

The Negro in the United States today has less opportunity of achievement and less freedom for development than any other American group, and I am unable to see that President Hoover has made any successful effort in increasing our opportunities or our freedom. On the other hand, to single out two points; his attitude toward the Lily-White movement of the South, and his attitude toward Liberia, have both hurt us immeasurably, and these are but two matters of a dozen that I might name. For this reason, I can not take seriously the platitudes and well-meaning generalizations of the President's last speech.

Nana Prempeh

Kweku Dua III., last King of Ashanti, and known to the world as Nana Prempeh, died at Kumasi, Gold Coast, West Africa, May 12. Thus ends an astonishing romance of history. Ashanti, now a part of the British dependency known as the Gold Coast, has an area of 23,000 square miles and has a black population of 400,000 people. The Ashantis, according to the English themselves "were a proud nation of brave and daring soldiers, living happily and contentedly under the most absolute of Kings." They came down from the far interior where they stemmed the Moslem invasion and found themselves face to face with white Christian slave traders. They resisted at one time and another the French, the Portuguese, the Dutch, the Danes, the Swedes, and the Brandenburgers.

Against the English alone they fought six wars: in 1806, in 1811, in 1814, in 1823, in 1863 and in 1873, and they were not finally subdued until in 1900, when the British brought the might of their empire against them and in the battle Prince Henry of Battenburg lost his life.

The Ashantis have reigned in unbroken dynasty in West Africa since the 16th Century and their history goes back to the ancient kingdoms of the Mossi and Borgu and Nupe, who in turn knew Byzantiam. In the known history, since 1500, they had thirty-three Kings, of which Ajiman Prempeh was the last. The real history of Ashanti is yet to be written. We read it now only in the story which the English have written. Even this is a sordid tale. Sir Hugh Clifford, late governor of the Gold Coast, confessed in 1915 that the history of this colony, the earliest beginnings of which had their inception in the dark days of the slave-trade, cannot but hold many things that modern Englishmen must recall with mingled shame and horror. The reader will find much to deplore in the public and private acts of many of the white men who, in their time, made history on the Coast; and some deeds were done which must for ever remain among the most bitter and humiliating memories of every Britisher who loves his country and is jealous of its fair fame.

Nana Prempeh who has just died was born in 1874 and succeeded his brother in 1884. He tried to govern with fairness and tried to keep peace with the British but failed. The crisis came in 1896, when a victorious British force entered Kumasi. Prempeh restrained his soldiers so as to have the least bloodshed, but the British seized and humiliated him just as they desecerated the ashes of the Mahdi in the Sudan. They forced him and the Queen Mother to prostrate themselves publicly before the victorious puppet of England, Sir Francis Scott. The King's subjects stood dumb with amazement and after he had been imprisoned and finally banished to the Seychelles Islands, a thousand miles from Africa, a great rebellion took place in 1900, known as the War of the Women, and led by the Queen Mother. But Ashanti was crushed and the British Empire stood at last in 1900 with its feet on the necks of these black people. But even the British dare not go too far. They demanded the Golden Stool, which contained the "Soul of Ashanti" and on which its Kings had been crowned for half a millennium. They never got it. Today it remains in the hands of black folk.

Finally, after nearly thirty years, on petition of the leading chiefs, Nana Prempeh was released and allowed to return to the Gold Coast November 11, 1924. He received an amazing reception. The chiefs made him a gift of $30,000 and the Government allowed him to be elected Omanhene of Kumasi, with a salary of $5,000 a year. He had 130,000 of his former people under him. His task of government between the old chiefs, who looked for the return of a king, and the educated young men, was difficult but succeeded unusually well. Ashanti has its place in history. Yesterday it was one of the centers of that African art that inspired the art of the modern world. Today it is part of the greatest cocoa-raising country on earth. Ashanti buys $20,000,000 worth of English goods each year and sends out in return mahogany, oil, rubber, and seventy thousand tons of cocoa. There are gold mines, but little education. Only 789 children in in government schools and 3,000 in indifferent mission schools. The chiefs still have a voice in their own government but they are dominated by the English, receiving a subsidy from the government and liable to be driven from power if the English Commissioner wishes.

Nevertheless, there is in Ashanti today and in all West Africa a growing independence and determination not always to be at the mercy of the British Colonial Office. Of this spirit, Nana Prempeh was a significant example. He stooped to conquer. He came back from exile and with dignity bowed to the British power and yet maintained his influence and ascendancy over his own people and stood as a great living example of the ancient African kingship.

RESOLUTIONS

There can be no doubt but that the present depression has brought the modern world face to face with the problem of practical economic reform, and a group situated like the American Negro, a little more than a generation removed from physical slavery, must of necessity feal the need of improved industrial conditions more than most folk. The American Negro still clings to the belief that just as his progress since Emancipation has been accomplished by hard work, even if poorly paid, agitation, and appeal to law and order, that these same fforts accompanyed by more intelligent co-operation will lead eventually to complete Emancipation. The American Negro, however, needs to guard against any idea that thoughtless contempt and reactionary opposition to reform movements is going to accomplish this end. As a laboring class his interests are on the whole identical with those of the white laborers. But he is able to make no thoughtful or advantageous alliance with white American labor because of its intense race prejudice through which it has disfranchised the Negro vote and kept the American Negro in economic serfdom. Notwithstanding this, the Negro as a laboring class refuses to surrender to the idea that the present organization of industry and distribution of wealth and income is just or proper. Under the law the Negro proposes to fight for his status as a full American citizen, to put down the barbarism of lynching, to insist on justice in the courts, on the abolition of the Jim-Crow car, on the recognition of decent marriage, and on opposition to racial segregation. Further than that, the American Negro, still believing in democracy, proposes to use his political power absolutely independent of party tickets and to seek representation in city councils, state legislatures, and the United States Congress. Beyond this, he is going to use his vote to compell the United States Government to keep their promise, to restore the freedom of Haiti and to give freedom and to the Philippines in Hawaii. The American Negro is in sympathy with their whole movement in the colored world looking toward independence and self-determination. And especially are they interested in their oppressed brethren in South Africa; they rising relatives in West Africa, and their kinsmen throughout the continent. The American Negro still believes in education. He protests against discrimination in public elementary education throughout the South which is condemning him to continued ignorance; he demands better high school facilities, both North and South, and he urges Negroes still more to increase the number of young men and women who are given a college education. All this, however, is simply to give us civil freedom, political power, and intelligence, so as to help in the re-making of modern industrial society. We should shoulder to shoulder with those far-seeing thinkers of the modern world who declare that the income of the mass of people must be increased; that poverty must be abolished; that inordinate individual wealth is immoral and dangerous, and that the power in industry must more and more in the future be democratic and notmonartic.

Scottsboro Case

Carbon

In the defense of the boys charged with rape at Scottsboro, Alabama, the N. A. A. C. P. has but one object, and that is, a fair trial for them before the courts and exact justice to them regardless of race. For this purpose, the N. A. A. C. P. stands ready to co-operate in all measures for legal defense with any organization or person working for this one object, and it hereby pleads for such united effort, and expresses its grave fear lest without such effort these victims be hanged through dissension among those who are trying to defend them.

During the early part of January two statements appeared in the press of the United States which concerned the relations of Negroes and Jews in this country. One, was a story that members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were opposed to the election of Joel E. Spingarn as President of their Association; Mr. Spingarn being of Jewish descent. The second, was news of a protest made by a Negro medical association in Harlem against a proposed hospital for Negroes in Harlem to be financed by the Julius Rosenwald Foundation. Both of these stories have carried false implications which ought to be corrected.

In the first place, the story concerning Mr. Spingarn is entirely false. An editorial in The Crisis magazine, which is the organ of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, says:

Mr. Johnson, who resigned as Secretary, is a close friend of Mr. Spingarn and his resignation had absolutely nothing to do with Mr. Spingarn's election. Mr. Johnson resigned so as to be able to devote himself entirely to literary work.

The matter of the proposed Negro hospital in Harlem stands on quite a different basis. The Rosenwald Fund, after having built some five thousand schoolhouses for Negroes in the South, is beginning now to turn its attention toward Negro health and hospitalization. They propose to build and equip a hospital for Negroes in Harlem.

The American Negroes are deeply grateful to Julius Rosenwald. His help in the matter of schoolhouses and in the matter of Y. M. C. A. buildings have been invaluable. At the same time, Negroes have to point out that separate institutions, based on race, even when they are given in the best spirit, and for worthy objects, are sometimes dangerous. This, they believe, is the case in Harlem. Gradually, Negro patients are being received in the hospitals of New York City with less and less discrimination. This is the right of their American citizenship. In addition to this, Negro interns are entering hospitals now and then, and recently thirty Negro physicians were placed on the staff of the great municipal Harlem Hospital, including four heads of departments, and these men are working amicably and successfully along side of sixty white physicians. They were held to the same standard of efficiency and character that white physicians all over the city were held. Now the Negroes of New York claim that this is the proper method of progress, and that if, on the contrary, a separate Negro hospital were established, it would be an excuse for discrimination in other hospitals, which would narrow the chance of Negroes to be admitted to the staffs of hospitals, which thus might easily turn to lower the standard of medical education for Negroes. The better part of the Negro physicians, therefore, of Harlem, have protested against this separate hospital, and refuse to accept it.

Manifestly, there is here nothing of racial or religious prejudice against Jews, and nothing but the deepest appreciation of what Mr. Rosenwald wishes to do for the Negro race.

Dayton

Segregated Schools

Dayton has a population of 200,000—10% of which is colored; we are situated nearenough to Kentucky to have some distinctly southern attitudes on the part of many of our citizens; Negroes and whites ride together on street cards, but Negroes are not admitted to downtown moving picture shows or restaurants. Up to the present time we have had no all-colored schools, though Negro children have been restricted in the use of swimming pools, and segregated in gymnasium classes. One grade school has a main building with both white and Negro children under white teachers, and a temporary building for colored children under colored teachers. There seems to be an unwritten law that white children should not be placed under Negro teachers.

The new school is so located as to insure a large majority of Negro children in attendance. The whites on the West Side are bringing heavy pressure to bear on the superintendent of schools to have all-Negro school, both faculty and children. Others interested in this situation fear that the practice of segregation will be much more firmly established in the community if this is done, and would like to see at least two or three white teachers and if possible a few white children to keep the Paul Lawrence Dunbar School from being, to all intents and purposes, a segregated school.

May I ask what you yourself would consider wise in such a situation, and what you would think the main trends of Negro thinking would be? We are very anxious to see this school started right—whatever that may be—and will deeply appreciate your viewpoint on this matter. I might add that the time element is important—what is done must be done quickly—so a prompt reply will be much appreciated."

"It is always unfortunate and against the fundamental idea of free popular education to separate the pupils on any artificial basis. As far as possible public school children should not be segregated according to the income of their parents, according to their home culture and surroundings, according to their national race or color. The public school should be a great democracy where all elements of the population come to realize the essential humanity of each.

"This ideal cannot always be reached. We find continually in modern cities that the arrangements of the community into exclusive sections and slums segregate the rich from the poor. There are schools mainly attended by Italian workers and schools initiated and designed for old American families. Nevertheless, usually there is no open and advertised segregation according to wealth and nationality; but there is an attempt in the United States to educate colored and white children separately.

Where public opinion is as fixed and immovable as in this city where I write, Atlanta, Georgia, separate schools are inevitable and at present best for the purposes of education. On the other hand, it would be a calamity if in New York or Boston there were similar segregation. In a border city like Dayton the problem is such that no outsider can bring much wisdom. Public opinion among thoughtful colored people, and I think among most far-seeing white people, would think it would be most unfortunate if the new Dunbar High School were made exclusively a Negro school. On the other hand, if Negro children in the mixed schools are not receiving proper attention and training, if they do not enlist the interest and friendliness of the teachers, if the teachers must inevitably and always be white, then colored children cannot receive in such schools the education that is their due and some separation is almost inevitable.

Even in such case, however, it may be possible to save some remnants among the debris and as you suggest in your fourth paragraph, keep in the school some white pupils and insist upon a mixed staff of teachers. But whether Dayton is civilized enough for this procedure, I do not know."

Voting in the South

It is not always absolutely true to assume that nothing is absolutely settled until it is settled right. Lots of matters have been settled wrong and so far as human wisdom goes, it is hard to say just what is going to be done about it. But there are certain things, like the voting of the Negroes in the South, that have not been settled despite the earnest prayers of the Southern Bourbons and the benediction of the Northern Copperheads.

Here comes, for instance, the Editors of the Southwestern Review published at Dallas, Texas, who sends THE CRISIS an article by J. S. Stemons, a Philadelphia Negro, on "Negro Suffrage in the South". The Editors are quite intrigued over this article because it advocates Negro voters who always vote right and unselfishly under the wise dictatorship of their Southern white friends. This is, of course, poppycock. Stemons charges Negroes with unbridled abuse of the election franchise during Reconstruction and declares that today in the North they are just as dishonest. This is a petty lie and quite worthy of the obscure career of the author which has been followed by some of us for some time, and any contradictions to the contrary is asinine. Moreover, signs multiply that the South has got to come to it. For instance, the Atlanta Constitution tells us in a recent number that it would take "one-third of the registered voters or about six thousand to force a recall election." of Mayor Key who took a drink in France. Thus, Atlanta, Georgia has eighteen thousand registered voters. Now Atlanta, Georgia has 170,000 persons twenty-one years of age or over, which means that only one-tenth of her voting population is actually registered, and nine-tenths disfranchised. Or, if we assume that according to Southern chivalry all the women, white and black, are disfranchised, nevertheless, less than one-four of the men can vote. What kind of democracy exists in Georgia,? Or take Louisiana, Dudley J. Le Blanc, candidate for Governor, is after the Legislature because the Legislature has not admitted white illiterates to the rolls. He says referring to the disfranchising Amendment:

The trouble with Mr. Barnes is that he doesn't realize that what is sause for the goose is sauce for Gander Long and the methods which are disfranchising Negroes in the South are being used and will be used to disfranchise whites.

The News and Courier of Charleston, South Carolina is beginning to realize this. It says:

Edna J. Meeker
2034 Darrow Ave.
Evanston, Ill.

THE CHICAGO WORLD'S FAIR OF 1933

AND THE AMERICAN NEGRO.

It seems to me that the following basis principles of proceedure ought to be laid down:

There should not be distinct Negro exhibits. It should be assumed that the Negro is represented in many of the general exhibits. On the other hand, since such representation will not be racial or the identity of the person emphasized, the American Negro will seem to be omitted unless something especially is done.

Now this can be done by making an American exhibit which will illustrate the extraordinary experiment made in this country to transform a body of slaves into full citizenship in a democracy. The exhibit could be called:

AN AMERICAN EXPERIMENT IN DEMOCRACY

It should be housed in a building with distinctive and striking African architecture, something like the African pavilions in therrecent French-Colonial exhibit, or a replica of some of the temples pictured in Frobenius' "Voice of Africa". This will give the striking and somewhat exotic primal impression.

Within, there should be a series of large grafts and moving diagrams, which in color, line and movement, should illustrate the way in which the Negro population has grown in the United States from the beginning; the increase in property holding and education, the occupations which Negroes pursue, and a series of large photographs and drawings of Negro homes, colleges, schools, and public buildings. A special effort should be made to illustrate Negro art and literature. There should be continuous music, instrumental and vocal of the Negro folk songs, and of their development by Burleigh and Dett. There should be maps of the distribution of the Negro population and diagrams showing the contributions which Negroes have made to American civilization in exploration, invention, labor, war, etc.

To make these exhibits effective, the stress must be on the relation of these men their efforts and accomplishments to American civilization, and not simply the exhibits of a group. This will take a great deal of ingenuity, it will call for machinery, the increase of the Negro population, for instance, to be illustrated by the invisibly growing figure of a black man, and forming a height of one foot to a height of twelve feet. In his hands, the power of money could increase from practically nothing to a billion or more dollars. The ground upon which he stands would increase from the size of his feet to a plot larger than Ireland, etc. There should be in this no touch of commercialism, nothing for sale, no advertising or merchants, no begging for contributions, it would simply be a visible piece of definite information concerning twelve million Americans. If there is any chance to have anything like this done, I should be very glad to submit a plan in much greater and more definite detail.

JULIUS ROSENWALD, 1862------ 1932

American merchant and philanthropist, was born in Springfield, Illinois, on August 12, 1862, and was educated in the public schools. From 1885 to 1906 he was president of Rosenwald and Weil, clothing manufacturers, Chicago. In 1895 he became vice president and treasurer of the mail order house of Sears, Roebuck and Company, Chicago; from 1910-25 president, and from then on chairman of the board. The gross sales of the company, which approximated $2,000,000 in 1896, increased to $290,000,000 in 1927. He was, during the World War, a member of the advisory commission of the council of national defence by appointment by President Wilson, and in August 1918 went on a special mission to France for the secretary of war. In 1910-20 he served in Washington as a member of the President's industrial conference.

In 1916 Rosenwald founded the Sears, Roebuck and Company employees' savings and profit sharing pension fund, to enable those who remain in the employ of the company ten years or more to secure an income after the close of their active business careers, or, in case of death, to provide and estate for their families. The fund has paid to employees who have left the service of the company, in cash and in shares of the company's capital stock, an amount equivalent to nearly $13,000,000. All of the fund's assets are invested in the company's capital stock, and on December 31, 1927, it amounted to approximately 400,000 shares, having a market value of about $35,500,000 of which $5,500,000 was contributed by the employees. In December 1921 Rosenwald pledged $21,000,000 to safeguard the interest of Sears, Roebuck and Company during the critical period of business readjustment after the war. In 1920 and 1921 the company had paid no dividends on its common stock and it was apparent that its capital at the end of 1921 must show impairment. By Rosenwald's action the company was enabled to readjust its finances without injury to its capital.

Liberia

THE CRISIS has said little about the present situation in Liberia because we were not at all sure of the facts. The Editor of this paper was in Liberia when the Firestone interests sent their chief investigator to look at the rubber forests which English promoters had planted and abandoned. He knew of the work which the United States Minister Solomon Hood had conscientiously and indefatigably done in order to interest foreign capital in Liberia. He hoped that the influx of this great corporation would be beneficial. Unfortunately, this has not turned out to be true and we are now convinced by undoubted evidence that the Firestone Corporation is responsible mainly for the present situation in Liberia, and the present effort to overturn and put into the hands of white men the government of this Negro country. The Firestone interests have been desirous of securing labor at the cheapest rates. They paid, at first, a shilling a day and "chop", and then theyreduced this to 9 pence a day and then to sixpence. They found that even at the higher rates of pay, they were not going to be able to get in Liberia the number of workers which they wanted, and they learned that President King and other Liberian officials had been allowing the Spanish and the French to secure a certain number of workers from Liberia. It was undoubtedly true that the systems under which these laborers were drafted, approached slavery, and that some Liberian officials, including the President, were financially interested. Nevertheless, if the same methods had been used to give labor to the Firestones, there wouldhave been no protest. As it was, the Firestone organization, backed a protest against slavery in Liberia, and the League of Nations made an investigation which showed undesirable and reprehensible conditions. They moved immediately toward rectifying this situation, and the Liberians promised co-operation.

President King was deposed and President Barclay was put in his place. Mr. Barclay was a man of education and honesty. He is willing and eager to bring about labor reforms in Liberia and to reconstitute the country upon a higher basis than ever, but no sooner was he elected to his position that every opposition which propaganda could bring was thrown in his way. He was refused recognition by the United States and by every country, except the Roman Pontiff. The United States surrendered completely to the Firestone Company. The Firestone Company established headquarters in a suite of rooms in one of the largest hotels in Geneva and kept its Secretary running backward and forward between this suite and a Committee of the League which was considering Liberia. The League laid down a plan of action, including an advisor, who was to go to Liberia and help re-organize the country. But the United States, backed by the Firestone interests, demurred. They said that this man must not be an advisor but must have dictatorial powers, and they finally increased their demands so that an American should be appointed, and it is said on good authority that the Firestone interests had demanded that they appointe this dictator. In the meantime, other interests were brought in to back the extraordinary stand of this corporation. When Sibly, the Educational Advisor died, there was appointed in his place a young man named Oxley. When Mr. Oxley arrived in Liberia, he was told that he must not call on President Barclay. He was told that the white people must keep the united front against the Liberians. He did not call for several months, but at last decided that he must, and found Barclay honest and eager to co-operate. Barclay gave him a dinner, and Oxley in turn gave the President a dinner at the house of one of the high Firestone officials. Because of this, this official, Davidson, was dismissed by the Firestone Company, and the General Manager, Hines, acting in the place of the Manager, Ross, who was on vacation, went to Geneva to prove the propaganda against Liberia. Davidson sued Hines in the courts of Liberia for Fifty Thousand pounds for this letter. The testimony of Oxley was needed, but he was advised by Hines and Ross and Thomas Jesse Jones, of the Liberian Educational Commission, not to appear. He did not. He went to the Gold Coast and returned to the United States, and eventually resigned. In the meantime, every pressure is still being brought by the United States at Geneva to make the League of Nations appoint the Firestone interests as dictator of Liberia. When this happens, Liberian independence is gone.

The Soviets and the Negro

We are not at all surprised at certain developments in Russia concerning the proposed Negro film. All the facts are not known, but this much seems certain. Radicals and enthusiastic artists believed that a film frankly portraying the present tragedy of the American Negro would not only be a great artistic accomplishment but a splendid means of propaganda. A company of young people, including persons of distinction, like Langston Hughes, went to Russia to take part in the film. Then, suddenly, the making of the film was either postponed or given up. The reason is perfectly clear. The only chance that Soviet Russia has to survive in a predominate capitalistic world is to secure such technical guidance and capital in the form of majority and materials from America, Germany and England, aswill insure her industrial independence. Particularly, Russia today is dependent upon American technique and upon such engineers as Hugh Lincoln Cooper. The engineer was one of the greatest of world experts in hydraulic engineering as applied to power developments for electrical uses. Before the need for American technique and money, Communistic propaganda in behalf of the Negro, bows its head. We are sorry. There was something rather splendid in the way in which this great new land slashed at Negro prejudice throughout the world But we recognize the real politik in Russia's present attitude. Perhaps sometime when this great experiment finds its feet, it will again essay to stretchitsgscuing hands to the dark submerged millions of the world.

Negro — Co-operation

I sincerely believe that the only hope of the Negro farmer lies in the organization of farm communities by Negroes and under their economic control and direction. There should be no compulsion in such co-operative effort and anyone, white or black, should be admitted if they so wish. In the North, it is quite possible that here and there white farmers would be quite willing to join such a community, and certainly colored farmers could often join white communities; but in the South the alternative before the Negro farmer is clear: he must either be a subordinate in a white farm community with no real voice in the conduct of its affairs, or he must organize his own community; and while no one should be kept out of such a community because of race and color, in effect this will be a segregated Negro community.

I have thought this matter over with great care, and I see no other way out so long as race prejudice in the South is what we all know it is; the continued subordination of Negroes to whites who will neither accept them as equals or give them justice must stop. Segregation by race, which is the practical alternative, has its great and threatening disadvantages; but for the black farmer in the South, it is the next and only step, and it is a step not only to be followed in the future; it has already been taken and followed by the more successful Negro farmers in the past. Its test for the future will be its success and the degree in which a larger co-operation between the Negro farmer and the Negro worker and professional man can be built up all over the land.

If the movement toward this co-operation had been started with careful thought and with knowledge of the psychology of the Negro race, the present criticism and recrimination largely could have been avoided. This was exactly what I had in mind, when on the one hand I objected to a white man's appointment in the Interior Department, and on the other hand, strongly recommended the appointment of a colored man, Henry Hunt, in the Agricultural Department.

This is not a matter of race but of knowledge. It must be remembered that segregation has long meant to the American Negro a surrender of his determination to be a man equal to other men. In the past through segregation, he has been forced to live in slums, to work for lower wages, to have his children poorly educated, and to submit to public insult. For this reason, a whole array of bitterly resented facts and deeds arise in the black man's mind when any program of segregation is suggested, and particularly, when it is suggested by a white Southerner.

On the other hand, the Negro has today reached a stature when he can do things not only as an individual but in organized groups, and he must unite for the accomplishment of the great ends which he has in mind. This voluntary united effort involves a certain segregation and is often taken advantage of by white people in order to increase separation by race. Nevertheless, that is a risk we must take and the outcome is up to white America. It would be suicidal for the American Negro to oppose a wisely planned and carefully organized effort on the part of trained and experienced black men to lead them out of their present desperate difficulties simply because such organization involved their working by themselves. In fact, the very statement of the problem in this way, places the Negro in the peculiar position of seeming to object to associating with himself, just as white people object to associating with him.

If now, without any talk about segregation, separation or compulsion, the United States authorities had begun to encourage well-trained colored farmers and executives to ask for aid and some had gone to work and started successful co-operating farming efforts, no one would have been happier than the average American Negro. Instead of this, the authorities have begun with talk of segregation, and have brought forward as instances of successful segregation, the very last examples to which they should have referred, namely, the separate Negro towns in the United States. With two or three exceptions, these towns are about the most miserable places that any people, black or white, could live. They were organized without economic advantage, on the worst possible sites, with no trained people in control; and they represent a refuge and escape and not organized and planned effort. Thus the launching of this excellent idea has been most unfortunate.

That makes no permanent difference. As it is, groups of properly trained Negro farmers and business men ought to form themselves into voluntary organizations and ask of the United States aid for co-operative effort, and the government should with proper care and scrutiny grant such requests.

The Harlem Hospital

The vindication of the conduct of the Harlem Hospital marks in many ways a distinct triumph. The character of the Investigating Committee, headed by Doctor Walter L. Niles, the well-known Cornel professor, and having among its members the President of the American Medical Association, a former President of the New York Academy of Medicine, Doctor W. A. Hinton, perhaps the most distinguished Negro physician, Doctor Solomon C. Fuller, the pioneer in American psychiatry, Doctor Ernest Just, first Spingarn Medalist, is a guarantee of the fairness of its investigation. The conclusion of this committee is that the Harlem Hospital, with its mixed staff of white and Negro physicians, may become a forerunner of future developments. Dispite its many handicaps, it is doing excellent and even distinguished work and it proves that in science and social uplift no color line is necessary for efficiency.

On the other hand, the opposition to the Harlem Hospital came first from white physicians who had been displaced and who ought to have been displaced, and from colored physicians who desired opportunity for which they are not professionally fitted. One can sympathize with this latter group because it has within its ranks men of who might have distinguished themselves in medicine if they had had better training and better facilities after they entered practice. Nevertheless their opposition should be directed not against the open doors of Harlem Hospital but against the closed doors of other hospitals, and so long as most hospitals do exclude Negro physicians, no matter what their training and ability is, the Negro hospital must be sustained and must be kept at high and higher grades of efficiency.

STEVEDORE

In the United States, the theatre is widely regarded as a matter of amusement and recreation, and this is one of the chief reasons for the degeneration of the stage into the type of entertainment which is chiefly suited to tired morons. Of the theatre as an interpretation of life, and a serious attempt to solve social problems, Americans refuse to give much attention. And yet it hardly needs argument to say that the theatre, if it took its job seriously, could do as much as books and more than magazines to interpret the tangle of life intelligently to the average man.

For this purpose, however, probably the theatre would have to say frankly to its patrons: this is (or is not) a serious drama with an appeal to the intellect rather than to the stomach, and in that way the public would not be deceived, and would not see "Stevedore", for instance, with the idea that they were going to have a pleasant and diverting evening. "Stevedore" is a terrible experience because it is a picture of some of the worst aspects of contemporary life. It is an attempt to portray the influence of intense race prejudice upon Americans. It is not, therefore, a pretty play, or a play that is beautiful, save in the vaster connotation of that word. It does not bring forward anything particularly new in the facts which lie at its hand. We all know that a favorite charge of white women who have been brutally attack is to accuse colored men, either through misapprehension, or deliberate design to divert guilt from white men. And we also know the other fact which is only mentioned in "Stevedore", that one of the easiest ways, particularly in the South, to escape suspicion is for the white criminal to blacken his face and let some Negro swing in consequence. But the message of "Stevedore" goes beyond this, and takes hold of the basic fact: that here in America are two groups of workers, who for ages have been criminally and designedly set against each other, so that from the 18th Century down to the middle of the 20th, white and black workers have hated each other, killed each other, and tried to starve each other to death, because of their own sheer stupidity. Few if any plays have dramatized as effectively as

"Stevedore" this dilemma and paradox of the white American worker and the colored laborer. The scenes in which this is set forth are gripping and terrible. They lead to murder and arson, to that upheaval of the world which comes repeatedly from persistent misunderstanding between human beings. It is certainly true, then, that "Stevedore" as a play is not an evening's entertainment. It is just as true that it has for the public a tremendous message and volume of information, and it marks a forward step in the willingness of small classes of Americans to face the truth on the Negro problem, and not continue to be fed by sentiment and predilections and prejudice. I feel that the author ought to be congratulated; that the actors do an exceedingly good and sincere piece of work, and I am especially gratified that the appearance of colored and white people, men and women, in the same cast, does not cause today such an upheaval in New York as it used to. I have known a perfectly good and sincere play to be offered in New York, and to be unable to proceed after a few attempts because white and colored persons were working together in the cast. Above all, it is a matter of congratulation that we have at last in New York the beginning of a Worker's Theatre. I tried it some years ago with the Krigwa Theatre in Harlem, but the idiology of a capitalistic world made it a failure. The players had simply one ideal, and that was to use this Little Theatre as a stepping stone to get to Broadway. The other members of the organization wanted drama, but not drama about Negroes or about workers. They were willing to try Shakespear and Ibsen, but nothing lower. They did not want any experiments in staging or in plot, and the result was that Charles Burroughs and myself, after rending of soul and stumbling on a Second Prize in the Little Theatre contest, concluded it was a matter of wisdom to stop on this dubious note of triumph, rather than to try further in inaugurating a folk theatre in black Harlem.

I am glad to see the white and black laborers of New York now uniting in a more auspicious effort.

THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE.

Those of us who have, for a long time, represented the radical wing of Negro development must soon realize that our position is rapidly becoming conservative, not that we have changed, but rather that radical thought in the Negro race is moving beyond us. It is, however moving not so much in the line of demanding our citizen rights as individuals, but rather in the special line of demanding group development. In other words, we are facing a radical determination among American Negroes to develop the race group as such to its greatest efficiency; to avoid and even despise contact with whites, or association with them.

This purpose is, in many respects, laudable, but it has its dangers; and today in its incipiency is the time to guide it and mold it. It may be made, on the one hand, a great experiment for inner development, and world cooperation. It may, on the other hand, become a propaganda for racial hatred and revolution. It behooves all Negroes to think this matter over diligently, and take their stand. We must reach out to understand the younger generation of business and college men. To their laudable eagerness to develop the new discovered ability and genius of their group we must ever seek to add sympathy and careful contact with the great white enveloping world. Union and independence of effort is to be our slogan, but let it not degenerate to a racial narrowness and false pride.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RACE SEGREGATION IN THE UNITED STATES

Recently there have come disquieting signs that under the general term segregation, a great many specific misunderstandings are arising, and that the American Negro is in process of curiously contradicting himself and frustrating his highest desires by a sheer lapse of logic.

For instance, a group of young colored people, assisted by a few whites, organized a committee in Washington to see how far Negroes were getting justice under the N.R.A. codes. One of the best trained men on that committee was called to government employ for work on these same codes. Apparently this was exactly what the colored people were urging; namely: that Negroes should be among the officials who would help apply the codes. But curiously enough, the appointment of Weaver brought violent protest on the ground, apparently, that the government by its very fairness in appointing him, was interfering with a Negro group activity.

Or again, a white man was appointed Advisor in the matter of the Negro to the N.R.A. Immediately there was universal protest and especial indignation manifested when he proposed, among other things, that Negro incorporated towns should ask for government aid. This, said the Negro world, was segregation.

These are two specific instances but the matter is much more widespread. On the one hand, the Negro protests against discrimination, and on the other hand, he inculcates race pride. He criticizes the lack of racial unity, and also criticizes any movement which increases the number of racial institutions and movements in the country.

Manifestly, here is confusion of thought and the historic reasons for this are fairly clear. In the earlier days, to segregate Negroes in a group meant to deprive them from their contact with civilization, which was their chief means of advance. They, therefore, fought segregation not because it made them associate with each other, but because it prevented them learning from association with better educated and better trained people. Again, segregation was used in order to reduce the Negro group and put it under the domination of the white group, and the Negroes protested, not against associating with themselves, but against white domination and inforced inferiority. Finally when there came the insistant cry that Negroes should cease to be ashamed of themselves, and should unite in various racial enterprises, this was offset by the fear, on the part of American Negroes, that such movements would give increased impetus to the policy of segregation, and that when the Negro voluntarily segregated himself, he undertook the responsibilities and programs which by himself and within this enfironment he could not possibly carry out.

As a result of these various lines of reasoning, and historic developments, there is in the minds of most Negro thinkers today curious confusion. If, for instance, you speak of race segregation, there is objection to any racial segregation which is compulsory. Negroes say with perfect good logic that they do not want to be compelled to classify themselves on so unreal a basis as color. They want to be classified by other human beings, according to their ability, education and culture. If you answer this by saying that with the present temper and dislikes of the white world, racial separation cannot at present be avoided, then the Negro answers that inforced segregation does not mean simply separation, it means subordination. That what the Negro needs is not separate schools, but purely schools under the domination of white officials, who are elected to keep Negro schools poorer. That the Jim-Crow car is not a separate car, it's a second-class car where Negroes are compelled to pay first-class fares. Now against compulsory separation and segregation which involves subordination, what is the American Negro going to do? Two paths are usually indicated: one of which we may call co-operation, and the other individualism. In the one case, it is suggested that Negroes voluntarily organize so as to advance their interests as a group. On the other hand, it is argued that their interests are best advanced by individual accomplishment rather than by group action. Or, the argument for co-operation may go further and advocate unification. That is, a determined movement to strengthen power of the Negro by united effort covering wide fields and leading to the enlargement of groups and the consentration of Negro population. Such a program always brings violent opposition from Negroes. They say that the segregation of the Negro lies in dispersion rather than unification. That the race problem will be solved as the Negro becomes a small and comparatively unimportant percentage in Northern communities, rather than a majority in a black-belt county of the South. The difficulty with both the last two programs is that in the first place, the individual who is not backed by group power has a hard time getting his abilities recognized or getting promotion according to desert, and that what happens continually is that the Negro, lost in a mass of white people, is either unrecognized, despite his ability, or foregotten after he has done his work, and the Negro race gettsno credit for what he has done, and it is no easier for other Negroes following in his footsteps to accomplish their work. Such thoughts lead to a more intense demand on the part of certain Negro leaders for an integration of Negro group power with the resultant responsibility, so that the Negro will see that other Negroes get renumerative work, decent wages, decent living quarters, and so that the Negro group will assume responsibility for its own delinquency, sickness and poverty. The answer to this is always clear and emphatic. Neither Negroes nor white people believe that the American Negro group is capable of assuming any sufficient or bearing any sufficient responsibility. It is looked upon , and looks upon its , as a dependent group, as the recipient of charity and benevolence, as depending upon its advance upon whites, and, therefore, unable to assert itself or realize its aspectations, except by permission of the whites. Moreover, it is said that any such group integration would mean eventually permanent separation from the mass of the nation, even leading perhaps to immigration and the attempt to set up separate states. It is declared that this is group particularism, as contrasted with particularism. But on the other hand, and in answer to this, Negroes and others say that unless the Negro race is capable of standing alone and assuming group responsibilities, it cannot expect that it is ever going to achieve strength and recognition from the white group, and that paticularism toward the United States on the part of the Negroes is an impossible sentiment until they have achieved real liberty, and they will achieve this through patricularistic efforts. When the ideal of humanity is, therefore, raised against the ideal of race, it is answered that after all, we have not achieved humanity; that humanity is still curiously divided into races and nations and social classes, and that in the absence of that vaster union toward which we overlook, the oppressed races and groups have got to fend for themselves. This is the history and philosophy of racial segregation, and out of this it is imperative that understanding and united effort be agreed upon by responsible Negro leaders and a practical program adopted. The present policy of drift is impossible.

The situation in which the Liberian Government finds itself at the present time, has given a great deal of concern to American Negroes. They have observed it in its three-fold phases. First, the relation of the Liberian Government to the natives; secondly, the problems of sanitation, health, forced labor and education and third, the Liberian financial problems, and their relation to the foreign powers.

We realize that the Liberian Government itself, like all small governments, in poor and backward areas, has been one of the causes of an internal conflict between the peoples of the interior and the Americo-Liberians in control of the government. An antagonism has developed and has been intensified recently between a small governing class and a larger class of the governed who have taken less interest through the years in the changes in the Liberian administration. Unless the hands of the present government are strengthened so that it may prove to be of assistance to the Liberian people in the advancement of their economic and social life, this antagonism may continue. It seems imperative, therefore, to strengthen the Liberian government for the sake of its own maintenance.

The second aspect of the situation concerns the matter of sanitation, health, forced labor and education. Health conditions in Liberia have been the cause of disasters within the republic and to the foreign peoples who have come to Liberia. The Liberian Government, being weak, has not been able to take effective steps to improve conditions of health. The report of the American

Financial Adviser shows that a special tax was levied for this purpose but that this tax has been sufficient for the needs of the improvements in the health conditions of the republic. These, of necessity, retard its economic and social development, but again, the Government can do little to improve these conditions unless it has a financial basis.

Moreover, the effective cessation of forced labor and pawning cannot be successful unless the Government has the aid of outside authorities in the maintenance of its finances. Other governments, stronger and older than Liberia, have not been able to stamp out conditions of forced labor within their borders, - our own country not excepted, - and Liberia should not be held up to ridicule for a condition which seems to be more general than particular. We do not excuse, however, these conditions within the Liberian republic, but we do object to the specific criticism of the Republic on this account and to its ridicule by press releases. These releases have tended to cite Liberia as an instance of the black man's inefficiency. It may be that there are certain characters among the rulers who are incompetent, and this may be admitted, but the same condition may be true of any government, including our own.

It would appear, therefore, that the real difficulty in Liberia is its financial condition. This deplorable financial situation results in a large measure from the unusually high proportion of Liberia's revenues that have been necessary to meet the payments on the 1926 loan. Whereas, at the beginning of the World War the country's affairs were in good condition, at the present time the commitments made necessary by the 1926 loan have prevented the government from performing essential public services. No government should be forced to conform to the terms of a contract with a private foreign corporation when those terms mean the destruction of the state.

In spite of the objections of many Liberians, the Firestone proposition came before the Legislature and was ratified. Since that time, the Liberians have found it impossible to carry out the terms of the loan and maintain their government as in the past.

In view of the foregoing aspects of the Liberian situation we would recommend the recognition of the Liberian Government. Even if the Liberians have been the aggressors in the opening of the breach, it may well be that the occasion for it came through the apparent alliance of the American Government with a corporation which throttled the Liberian Government.

Secondly, We would urge the appointment of a commission for the Republic which will be liberal in its thought and action and which will have the interest of the Liberian Government mainly in view rather than the interests of a corporation. We are apprehensive when we take into consideration the possibility of the subtle control of this Commission by the corporation which now has a major interest in Liberia. The conduct of some of the American officials who have handled the business of the Republic in the past has been severely criticized and present conditions will not justify the appointment of one who takes the attitude of a white dictatorship for a black republic. In some instances the men who have been recommended for service in Liberia have been men of Southern birth and training who have presumed that they knew the Negro best. These individuals have gone to the African Republic with all of the prejudices and superiority complexes which have developed in the American racial situation. They have frequently regarded the independent spirit of the Liberians as they would regard a similar attitude on the part of Negroes who live in America. The best white friends of the Republic must be those who sympathize with it, who see its errors and help to correct them, who point the way to an efficient government and assist the governmental officials to find and follow the best way for themselves. In short, the best commission for Liberia would be one which would help the Government to help itself. In this connection, Liberia should not be compelled to surrender its sovereignty in exchange for a dictatorship. Its independence should be encouraged rather than surrendered upon demand.

We view with great satisfaction the liberal attitude of the Roosevelt administration in social and economic matters as they concern the American people. Would not Liberia give this Government an opportunity to show in an international way, its liberal attitude by appointing liberal-minded individuals upon the commission to the Republic? Some members of this delegation are of the opinion that this commission should be headed by a European, preferably a Scandinavian, and in expressing this sentiment, they agree with the opinion of the Liberian Government. Others of our delegation believe that there can be found some individuals in the American nation who are just as fair-minded and free from partisanship in matters of interracial concern as any European.

In the third place, we would urge that in the personnel of the commission, a capable American Negro and a competent Liberian should be included in positions of major responsibility. We believe that the point of view of these two individuals would be of practical assistance to any American or European who would now approach this problem. Through these two elements the point of view of American Negroes who are naturally and traditionally interested in this part of Africa, and through the native Liberian, the point of view of the people of the Republic itself could be maintained. In this same connection, we would protest the appointment of any other person than an American Negro as our diplomatic agent or minister in the Republic. Liberia is the only diplomatic field open to us, and there are many where whites are acceptable. This avenue should not be closed to American Negroes.

Fourth, we would urge that there might be provided an increase of governmental support to education in Liberia. We disagree with the recommendation of the American Financial Adviser who urges that missionary organizations increase their funds for the support of schools. We are of the opinion that just as in the progress of the Negro in the United States, the federal and state governments have undertaken the maintenance of institutions for Negro education which were originally started by missionary organizations, the same progress which has marked the development of these institutions and the people whom they serve could be developed in Liberia. This again calls for an increase in the governmental revenue of the Republic and can only be maintained in this way.

Another element in the situation is a more equitable distribution of the governmental income. Under present conditions Liberia would go further into debt and disaster might ultimately overtake the Republic. Its expenditures for 1932 exceeded its revenues by over $200,000 and this with the advice of an American Financial Adviser. The debt of the Government, exclusive of the loan obligations was over $600,000. Unless the governmental income can be more equitably distributed by the allotment of necessary and adequate sums to governmental maintenance and service as well as to the loan obligations, the Liberian Government cannot maintain itself. In a period when European nations are urging that they cannot pay their war debts to the United States, when they are spending millions upon the maintenance of armies and navies, surely it cannot be considered an unusual procedure for the Liberian Government which spends a paltry amount in these channels to demand that its government have an opportunity simply to continue its existence. Its governmental expenditures may need to be reduced but the loan payments should also be revised in line with Liberia's capacity to pay. Liberia's good faith has been shown in that it is one of the few foreign countries to pay its war loan to the American Government.

The Negroes of the United States are whole-heartedly joining in a movement which is designed to give encouragement and moral support to Liberia. They are coming to the conclusion that they will not join Liberia's critics until Liberia's side of the controversy has been made known, for it seems that the point of view of an American corporation has corporation has the opportunity to be heard. We are confident that the present administration will find a way through this difficulty and we are taking this opportunity of informing the Government that the united effort of the Negro citizens of America is behind an effort to support Liberia's right to existence.

1934? Segregation

Extreme opponents of segregation act as though there was but one solution of the race problem, and that is complete integration of the black race with the white race in America, with no distinctions of color in political, civil or social life. There is no doubt but what this is the great end toward which humanity is tending, and that so long as there are artificially emphasized differences of nationality, race and color, not to mention the fundamental discriminations of economic class, there will be no real unanimity.

On the other hand, it is just as clear that not for a century and probably not for ten centuries, will any such consumation be reached. No person born will ever live to see national and racial distinctions altogether abolished, and economic distinctions will last a long time.

Since this is true, the practical problem that faces us is not a choice between segregation and no segregation, between compulsory interferences with human intercourse and complete liberty of contact; the thing that faces us is given varying degress of segregation: How shall we conduct ourselves so that in the end human differences will not be emphasized at the expense of human advance.

It is perfectly certain that not only shall we be compelled to submit to much segregation, but that sometimes it will be necessary to our survival and a step toward the ultimate breaking down of barriers to increase by voluntary action our separation from our fellowmen. It may be and often has been that oppression and insult has become so intense and so unremitting that there is no alternative left to a self-respecting man but to herd by himself in self-defense until the attitude of the world changes. It happens that today is peculiarly a day when such voluntary union for self-expression and self-defense is forced upon large numbers of people. That is the meaning of Hitlerism and the Jews, of Indian nationalism, of Japanese Jingoism. We may rail against this. We may say that it is not our fault, and it certainly is not. Nevertheless, to do nothing in the face of it; to accept opposition without united opposition is the progress of fools.

If association and contact with Negroes is distasteful to you, what is it to white people? Remember that the white people of American cities certainly never want us until we want ourselves. We excuse ourselves in this case and say we do not hate Negroes but we do hate their condition, and immediately the answer is thrown back on us. Whose job is it to change that condition? The job of the white people or the job of the black people themselves, and especially their uplifted classes?

If it is said that race separation is war, then who began the war?

A

LIBERIA

What is wrong with Liberia? It is significant that this is the form the question always takes in America. That there is something wrong is always assumed. Why? Liberia is not growing in size or population; it is not increasing remarkably in wealth; it wants to borrow money; it is not "developing". Now all citizens of the 20th century assume that unless a nation is growing in numbers and annexing territory, and increasing the amount of private profits, it is decadent. Moreover in the present organization of world industry one can pretty easily separate countries by these criteria. Whereupon the query arises: are small, poor countries the victims of present conditions or are they evidences of inferior ability?

That Liberia is an "inferior" country is easy for America to believe for two reasons: First, it is ruled and inhabited by Negroes. Second, nearly all books and magazine articles say so. The first, of course, is not proof. And in the case of the second one must note that most of the books on Liberia have been written by people with an axe to grind: Englishmen who believe that Liberia is a natural adjunct to British Sierra Leone; Germans who wanted Liberia to piece out German West Africa; Frenchmen who realize that Monrovia could be made a better port than Dakar, a port nearer to America on the one hand and to French Equatorial Africa on the other. Finally, nearly all white writers who are "patriotic" know that a successful and independent Negro government in Africa would be the beginning of the end of European imperialism in Africa. Therefore Liberia must not be successful. It must not even be thought to have any possibilities of ultimate success under its present management.

Liberia was established at the beginning of the Industrial Revolution and just after the Napoleonic wars. It represented an attempt to transfer to Africa such of the American Negro Problems as interfered with the growth of the Cotton Kingdom. The development of Liberia was coincident with the spread of the New World commerce of the 19th century and the Economic Imperialism of Europe in Africa.

Liberia is usually studied without the slightest reference to all this. She is looked upon as an isolated, self-steered, steam craft, instead of being, as she is, a canoe tossed on raging economic currents which eddied out of the slave trade of the 18th century to the wild swirl of World War in the 20th. Liberia's political history is but the other side of this economic turmoil, and as such it has an interest far beyond its actual physical extent.

At first Liberia was neither country, colony nor protectorate. She was a black waif cast out of the civilized world who declared her independence because there was none on whom she could depend. England recognized her independence because she herself had at the time a twin problem in Sierra Leone whom she expected to cast off with her other African interests after the death of the slave trade.

Meantime, however, the attitude of Europe toward Africa suddenly changed. Instead of a transfer of black labor to new rich land in the west, it was seen that land and labor in Africa could be used to raise valuable raw materials. But in this case of course African land and labor must be under European control and Africa could not be regarded as existing for its own benefit or capable of self-rule.

Lord Bathurst early foresaw this change and warned England not to recognize Liberian independence. Succeeding colonial officials of England in West Africa made it their business to curtail Liberia's territory and impede her progress in all possible ways, and France immediately took note of what was going on.

There began a game of battledore and shuttlecock, with England and France as batters and Liberia as ball. "Liberian natives are interfering with our trade", yelled an English slave trader on the frontier between Liberia and Sierra Leone where Liberia had already paid cash to settle the boundary. "Tut tut!" cried abolition England; "You're on English soil and interfering with Englishmen!" "No," answered Liberia, "its our own soil which we bought from you for $100,000 and we can curb the natives and stop illicit trade if you let us. Or if you insist that the soil is still yours, how can we be held responsible for the acts of the natives?" "Very well," replied England. "We'll take jurisdiction over the territory, return you $20,000 and charge the balance against you as damages for interfering with Englishmen"; and an English warship came and enforced the decision!

"Oh ho!" said France. "Is England stealing a march? All this territory here to the south and this and this, is French; we've treaties in our archives signed by native chiefs giving us your whole coast line." "Not according to your own maps," retorted Liberia "Well, we'll take this as an earnest of good behaviour and if you're docile we may hot bother to produce the treaties"; and France took over 100 miles of coast up to the Cavallo River and drew the international boundary not in the center of one of Liberia's most navigable rivers but on its Liberian bank as defined by the summer floods! And England did the same with the Mano!

Liberia was neither ~~united~~ invited to the conferance of Berlin in 1885 nor were her just claims to the hinterland regarded. No sooner was the pact for the partition of Africa sealed than the aggressions of France and England cut off a full half of Liberian territory, Liberia protested:

"We appeal to all the civilized nations of the world.--Consider, we pray you, the situation. Having been carried away into slavery, and, by the blessing of God, returned from exile to our fatherland, are we now to be robbed of our rightful inheritance? Is there not to be a foot of land in Africa, that the African, whether civilized or savage, can call his own? It has been asserted that the race is not capable of self-government, and the eyes of many are watching the progress of Liberia with a view to determining that question. We only ask, in all fairness, to be allowed just what any other people would require--free scope for operation. Do not wrest our territory from us and hamper us in our operations and then stigmatize the race with incapacity because we do not work miracles."

Liberia's appeal was not only unheeded but unheard and her fate would have been sealed long since but for international jealousies. All Europe wanted Liberia and no country was sure of America's claims and attitude. Liberia early realized this and acted accordingly. Talent in any nation great or small is limited: Liberia has produced for her size an unusual number of exceptional men. But their whole genius has been needed to defend the political integrity of their land. She catered to German trade and made Germany a watch-dog against any foreign aggression in which Germany had no part. France and England were skillfully played off against each other and America was always a shadow in the background. As a result, despite the loss of more than half her original territory Liberia still lives with forty three thousand square miles of the richest territory on the west coast - well-watered, with fine forests, mountain, plateau and plain; with harbors and rivers.

But surely Liberia's troubles did not end with sheer physical defense - they began there. White Imperialism today knows that conquest is only one method of domination. Economic onslaught with all its intricacies and propaganda is often much more profitable and it was that attack that Liberia ~~must~~ had next to face and to face it only partially realizing its meaning and portent.

Liberia was and is "undeveloped". This is, of course, the severest charge that modern imperialism brings against a small independent country. To most folk it seems quite unanswerable. It connotes laziness, inefficiency, waste, inferiority. It was an excuse in the case of Liberia for wounding her sensibilities, insulting her and sneering at her. And yet "develppment" today means many things, from ordinary thrift and industry to being a cog in the great machine of world industry. Liberia is, for the most part, virgin, unexplored or half explored forest; she has no railroads, she does not feed herself, she is to ~~a considerable~~ some extent living on borrowed funds - a "Croesus feeding on crusts". There is no doubt but that the economic situation of Liberia is precarious but there is much doubt as to the reasons for this.

Viewing the situation of Liberia clearly it is manifestly not simply a case of the difficulty of earning a living according to modern standards in a primitive land. There is to be sure a tropical climate to over come, a problem of skilled labor, a vast problem of transportation, and a still vaster problem of markets. But if Liberia reduced her problem to the lowest terms and worked simply for her own food and shelter she would face a greedy world at her doors demanding palm oil, rubber, coffee, sugar, piassava and a dozen other world commodities and threatening the overthrow of the present government unless these materials were forthcoming and at low prices. And world public opinion, backed by science, philanthropy and religion and "business" would justify that threat.

The fear of this ~~backed by~~ added to a natural desire for something of modern comfort and convenience beyond primitive food and shelter forced Liberia to become more than a self-contained, economic entity on a simple self-supporting scale; she had to become a cog in the circle of world commerce. She had to leave her safe waters and shove out into great currents where she was an almost helpless victim of forces that not only cared nothing for her but even desired and plotted her extinction. Here was no particular problem of color or race - it was the world wide problem of private profit backed by the irresistable power of great empires and the unanswerable propaganda of books and newspapers.

The obvious and direct way to enter world commerce is to sell in the world markets such domestic produce as brings a good price. It was at first not easy for Liberia to find such commodities for the African trade was in transition from human beings to palm oil. But a chance came during the American Civil war. The secession of Louisiana deprived the North of sugar. In Liberia were American Negroes who knew how to grow sugar cane, and soil and sun favored it. Liberia flew to work. The broad low banks of the St. Paul began to gleam with sugar plantations and landings were scarred into the yellow clay while sturdily manned long boats with singing black boys carried the sweet brown sugar down to the bar. Vessels were scarce, but what of that? The forests bowed and sailing ships were built and soon were plying the seas. For ten years the trade grew; Liberia began to accumulate some wealth and more confidence. Her new college perched itself on the crowning height of the Cape and became a center of real education. Monrovia the capital was laid out in broad streets and Liberia sang her new national hymn:

"All hail Liberia. Hail!

"In union strong, success is sure.

"We cannot fail!"

The world masters of fluid capital and credit were beginning to dominate the markets and prices of the world and to direct commerce. They were rapidly building a new Imperialism by depressing the prices of raw materials and through monopoly of skill, machinery, and transport elevating the prices of manufactured products, like refined sugar. It was at this time ~~when~~ that Liberia, facing the ruin of her raw sugar industry tried to secure European capital with which to open up roads to the interior, build necessary public works, stabilize the currency and consolidate a small floating debt.

If the financial powers of the world had desired that Liberia survive and develope as a self governing land of repatriated Negroes carrying on agriculture and industry for their own support and happiness and incidentally to supply the world with certain raw materials - if the masters of the world had wanted this, nothing would have been easier than to have accomplished this by loans, by technical advice, by industrial, medical and ethical mission work. But the world did not want this. The world wanted the land and labor of Liberia for the purpose of making a maximum of profit for Europeans. What became of the Liberians was entirely secondary in its thought. The result was that when in 1870, Liberia tried to borrow $500,000 in London, she was put into the hands of loan-sharks, encouraged, cajoled and in the end cheated brazenly and unmercifully, receiving only $100,000 in cash against an issue of $500,000 in bonds.

In vain and for a generation Liberia protested and urged the unfairness and iniquity of this debt; but England and the world held her failure to settle as a proof of her shiftlessness and incapacity

There ensued two changes: One was natural. Louisiana returned to the union and began sugar-raising again. The beet sugar industry arose and encouraged by bounties flooded the markets. The West Indian fields met the competition on account of nearness to markets and lowered wages. This ruined Liberian sugar profits while her long distance from markets and the new steam navigation made readjustment difficult if not impossible.

But a second sinister economic change occurred.

to govern and spread a propaganda against her which she has never been able to live down. She was compelled finally to acknowledge the debt and ~~pay~~ start paying it with the accumulated back interest.

Meantime the world demand for African raw materials was spreading and becoming definite and wide markets developing. After the failure of sugar Liberia turned to other crops and articles. Her coffee was of fine quality and she planted coffee plantations; but the Brazilian and Java fields dominated the market. Great capital invested there used new machinery for hulling and new methods of grading and blending and the price of Liberian coffee with its primitive methods of preparation fell from twenty five to eight cents a pound. Palm oil and kernels grew in price and importance but again Liberian methods and lack of machinery made them low-priced in the market. Camwood had temporary importance but German dyes displaced it. Fibres like piassava sprung to favor and brought high price for a season, until the monopolists of the coast carrying trade ~~in~~ at a single stroke ~~season~~ raised the freight charges 500%.

And so it went. Liberia worked - not indeed always with the keenest intelligence or with modern machine-like skill, but continuously and perseveringly with honest intention in the face of puzzling discouragement. She felt herself in the grip of Leviathan, slowly, surely, relentlessly being crushed; but she struggled on now blindly , now with gleams of encouragement. Missionaries continued to visit her and tell her that Christ came into the world to save sinners.

C The Crisis came in 1908. Apparently matters had been improving. The annual customs revenue had increased from $237,000 in 1890 to $376,000 in 1908, and that year Liberia exported $900,000 worth of materials. If she could keep on the right side of the market and perhaps save a little home capital or find honest ~~leaders~~ lenders abroad all ~~might~~ would yet be well. But there was one sinister fact: Germany was displacing England in Liberian trade and in 1908 had 55% of the tonnage. England saw a menace to her supremacy. France had had a series of understandings with England as to West Africa and was quiescent. Annexation and direct loan entanglements had not yet swamped Liberia and the method of concessions was next attempted. In 1904 ~~to~~ and 1906, Sir Harry Johnston, the English colonial servant and writer, visited Liberia and published two sumptuous volumes on her resources. Various English companies sought large concessions and finally one in which Johnston was a director received the prize. The "Liberian Development Company" was an English concern financed with a capital of $500,000 borrowed on the credit of the Liberian government. This capital was to be used under English direction for roads, mines and rubber plantations. In a few years ~~it~~ the Company failed miserably and completely and left Liberia with another vast debt.

Immediately the English government stepped in. The resident consul notified Liberia that she did not consider the "Liberian government stable or effective." She demanded an English receiver of her customs revenues, a gunboat in the harbor and a frontier force on land under "white" officers. Liberia bowed, but before ~~colored~~ Colonel Mackay-Mackay, the English organizer of the Frontier force, could carry out his clear plan to foment mutiny in Monrovia and seize the Liberian government, the government quietly forced him to resign and appealed to the American Negro.[1] For a long time ~~they~~ Liberia had given up all hope of American aid. But they began to notice that black folk in America were growing in strength, wealth and power. They followed the rise of Booker T. Washington. Councils were divided. Some urged further reliance on British justice. But the American party prevailed and a commission was sent to Washington in time to arrive at the beginning of a Presidential campaign in which the Negro vote was important. Through the influence of Booker T. Washington they got the ear of President Roosevelt. The president and his Secretary of State, Mr. Taft, needed the colored vote and they were easily pursuaded to send a commission to Liberia. ¶ This commission of white and colored men of experience and standing studied the situation and said, as all men have said of Liberia; it is a rich country; It has patriotic and willing people of average intelligence. There is no reason but that, with a chance, this country should not develop as an independent, self-supporting republic. The Commission did not, of course, go into the matter of the method by which international trade and the owners of capital could be induced to give Liberia a chance, but they did lay down a plan by which the debts of Liberia were so funded that the interest could be met and a sinking fund established; and especially they gave tacit notice to Europe that America did not want Liberia annexed either to the British, French or German empires.

¶ And here, with the interruption of War, the matter stands. Liberia was terribly shaken by the war but she is recovering. What can she do to find a stable industrial status upon which to base a sound economic independence? One thing, of course is prerequisite: her territorial integrity must be guaranteed. If the Negroes throughout the United States through their political power can in the future, as they have in the past, guarantee this integrity, there still remains the problem of industry in a small country with little capital and skill and far from markets. If Liberia can work this out the world ~~would~~ will be her debtor. If she cannot work it out, in the face of the terrific power of Industrial Imperialism, the failure will not be entirely hers nor that of the Negro race. It will be largely the failure of modern economic organization.

LIBERIA

What is wrong with Liberia? It is significant that this is the form the question always takes in America. That there is something wrong is always assumed. Why? Liberia is not growing in size or population; it is not increasing remarkably in wealth; it wants to borrow money; it is not "developing". Now all citizens of the 20th century assume that unless a nation is growing in numbers and annexing territory, and increasing the amount of private profits, it is decadent. Moreover in the present organization of world industry one can pretty easily separate countries by these criteria. Whereupon the query arises: are small, poor countries the victims of present conditions or are they evidences of inferior ability?

That Liberia is an "inferior" country is easy for America to believe for two reasons: First, it is ruled and inhabited by Negroes. Second, nearly all books and magazine articles say so. The first, of course, is not proof. And in the case of the second one must note that most of the books on Liberia have been written by people with an axe to grind: Englishmen who believe that Liberia is a natural adjunct to British Sierra Leone; Germans who wanted Liberia to piece out German West Africa; Frenchmen who realize that Monrovia could be made a better port than Dakar, a port nearer to America on the one hand and to French Equatorial Africa on the other. Finally, nearly all white writers who are "patriotic" know that a successful Negro government in Africa would be the beginning of the end of European imperialism in Africa. Therefore Liberia must not be successful. It must not even be thought to have any possibilities of ultimate success under its present management.

Liberia was established at the beginning of the Industrial Revolution and just after the Napoleonic wars. It represented an attempt to transfer to Africa such of the American Negro Problems as interfered with the growth of the Cotton Kingdom. The development of Liberia was coincident with the spread of the New World commerce of the 19th century and the Economic Imperialism of Europe in Africa.

Liberia is usually studied without the slightest reference to all this. She is looked upon as an isolated, self-steered, steam craft, instead of being, as she is, a canoe tossed on raging economic currents which eddied out of the slave trade of the 18th century to the wild swirl of World War in the 20th. Liberia's political history is but the other side of this economic turmoil, and as such it has an interest far beyond its actual physical extent.

At first Liberia was neither country, colony nor protectorate. She was a black waif cast out of the civilized world who declared her independence because there was none on whom she could depend. England recognized her independence because she herself had at the time a twin problem in Sierra Leone whom she expected to cast off with her other African interests after the death of the slave trade.

Meantime, however, the attitude of Europe toward Africa suddenly changed. Instead of a transfer of black labor to new rich land in the west, it was seen that land and labor in Africa could be used to raise valuable raw materials. But in this case of course African land and labor must be under European control and Africa could not be regarded as existing for its own benefit or capable of self-rule.

Lord Bathurst early foresaw this change and warned England not to recognize Liberian independence. Succeeding colonial officials of England in West Africa made it their business to curtail Liberia's territory and impede her progress in all possible ways, and France immediately took note of what was going on.

There began a game of battledore and shuttlecock, with England and France as batters and Liberia as ball. "Liberian natives are interfering with our trade", yelled an English slave trader on the frontier between Liberia and Sierra Leone where Liberia had already paid cash to settle the boundary. "Tut tut!" cried abolition England; "You're on English soil and interfering with Englishmen!" "No," answered Liberia, "its our own soil which we bought from you for $100,000 and we can curb the natives and stop illicit trade if you let us. Or if you insist that the soil is still yours, how can we be held responsible for the acts of the natives?" "Very well," replied England. "We'll take jurisdiction over the territory, return you $20,000 and charge the balance against you as damages for interfering with Englishmen"; and an English warship came and enforced the decision!

"Oh ho!" said France. "Is England stealing a march? All this territory here to the south and this and this, is French; we've treaties in our archives signed by native chiefs giving us your whole coast line." "Not according to your own maps," retorted Liberia. "Well, we'll take this as an earnest of good behaviour and if you're docile we may not bother to produce the treaties"; and France took over 100 miles of coast up to the Cavallo River and drew the international boundary not in the center of one of Liberia's most navigable rivers but on its Liberian bank as defined by the summer floods! And England did the same with the Mano!

Liberia was neither united to the conferance of Berlin in 1885 nor were her just claims to the hinterland regarded. No sooner was the pact for the partition of Africa sealed than the aggressions of France and England cut off a ful half of Liberian territory. Liberia protested.

"We appeal to all the civilized nations of the world.--Consider, we pray you, the situation. Having been carried away into slavery, and, by the blessing of God, returned from exile to our fatherland, are we now to be robbed of our rightful inheritance? Is there not to be a foot of land in Africa, that the African, whether civilized or savage, can call his own? It has been asserted that the race is not capable of self-government, and the eyes of many are watching the progress of Liberia with a view to determining that question. We only ask, in all fairness, to be allowed just what any other people would require--free scope for operation. Do not wrest our territory from us and hamper us in our operations and then stigmatize the race with incapacity because we do not work miracles."

Liberia's appeal was not only unheeded but unheard and her fate would have been sealed long since but for international jealousies. All Europe wanted Liberia and no country was sure of America's claims and attitude. Liberia early realized this and acted accordingly. Talent in any nation great or small is limited: Liberia has produced for her size an unusual number of exceptional men. But their whole genius has been needed to defend the political integrity of their land. She catered to German trade and made Germany a watch-dog against any foreign aggression in which Germany had no part. France and England were skillfully played off against each other and America was always a shadow in the background. As a result, despite the loss of more than half her original territory Liberia still lives with forty three thousand square miles of the richest territory on the west coast - well-watered, with fine forests, mountain, plateau and plain; with harbors and rivers.

But surely Liberia's troubles did not end with sheer physical defense - they began there. White Imperialism today knows that conquest is only one method of domination. Economic onslaught with all its intricacies and propaganda is often much more profitable and it was that attack that Liberia must face and face it only partially realizing its meaning and portent.

Liberia was and is "undeveloped". This is, of course, the severest charge that modern imperialism brings against a small independent country. To most folk it seems quite unanswerable. It connotes laziness, inefficiency, waste, inferiority. It was an excuse in the case of Liberia for wounding her sensibilities, insulting her and sneering at her. And yet "develppment" today means many things from ordinary thrift and industry to being a cog in the great machine of world industry. Liberia is for the most part virgin, unexplored or half explored forest; she has no railroads, she does not feed herself, she is to a considerable extent living on borrowed funds - a "Croesus feeding on crusts". There is no doubt but that the economic situation of Liberia is precarious but there is much doubt as to the reasons for this.

Viewing the situation of Liberia clearly it is manifestly not simply a case of the difficulty of earning a living according to modern standards in a primitive land. There is to be sure a tropical climate to over come, a problem of skilled labor, a vast problem of transportation, and a still vaster problem of markets. But if Liberia reduced her problem to the lowest terms and worked simply for her own food and shelter she would face a greedy world at her doors demanding palm oil, rubber, coffee, sugar, piassava and a dozen other world commodities and threatening the overthrow of the present government unless these materials were forthcoming and at low prices. And world public opinion, backed by science, philanthropy and religion and "business" would justify that threat.

The fear of this backed by a natural desire for something of modern comfort and convenience beyond primitive food and shelter forced Liberia to become more than a self-contained, economic entity on a simple self-supporting scale; she had to become a cog in the circle of world commerce. She had to leave her safe waters and shove out into great currents where she was an almost helpless victim of forces that not only cared nothing for her but even desired and plotted her extinction. For this land and labor in Africa must be controlled and black Africa can never be regarded as existing for its own benefit or capable of self-rule.

Lord Bathurst early foresaw this change and warned England not to recognize Liberian independence. Succeeding colonial officials of England in West Africa made it their business to curtail Liberia's territory and impede her progress in all possible ways. France

When Africa was partitioned at Berlin in 1885 the United States was represented at the conference by Henry M. Stanley and Liberia thought she would be represented by the United States. Liberia's claims to a large part of the Hinterland were good; financed by Scheiffelin of New York. Anderson of Liberia had made two journies inland and visited and began the organization of much of the territory now held by the French and English. Stanley, however, was not thinking of this if he ever knew it. He represented Leopold of Belgium even more than the United States and as a result the claims of Liberia were completely ignored by the conference. Immediately the inroads of France and England upon Liberia were renewed. France operating on the Niger consolidated her colonies of Guinea, High Senegal and the Ivory coast thus cutting off the whole of the Liberian Hinterland in the Sudan. England preemptorily seized thickly populated territory near Sierra Leone on pretense that Liberia was not keeping order among the natives. France "rectified" some five hundred square miles of the best rice land to the east deforming Liberia with a great wedge, Against this Liberia alone protested.

"We appeal to all the civilized nations of the world. -- Consider, we pray you, the situation. Of course territorial integrity was fundamental and Liberia put all her talent into this defence. Her plaintive appeal was, of course, not only unheeded but unheard. And yet she stemmed the tide against her by adroit playing of international interests one against the other.

Talent in any nation great or small is limited: Liberia has produced for her size an unusual number of exceptional men. She had to leave her safe waters and shove out into great currents where she was a helpless victim of forces that not only cared nothing for her but even desired and plotted her extinction. Here was no particular problem of color or race - it was the world wide problem of private profit backed by the irresistable power of great empires and the unanswerable propaganda of books and newspapers.

To realize how this worked in the case of Liberia let us follow briefly her economic history.

First, in the years from 1822 to 1849, from settlement to independence, she relied on food supplies from America and barter with the natives - a precarious and difficult job. Gradually, however, she began to raise some of her own food, to buy more from the natives and to export materials. Trade conditions were changing. New Machine-made goods appeared, cheaper to buy than make and better suited for barter. The character of the trade of Liberia changed. In return for palm oil and coffee she procured European goods for better food and clothes, for native barter and she began to foresee economic independence, i.e. a good share of the profits of international trade. Her great and spectacular chance came with the American Civil War. The secession of Louisiana deprived the North of sugar. In Liberia were American Negroes who knew how to grow sugar cane, and soil and sun favored it. Liberia flew to work. The broad low banks of the St.Paul began to gleam with sugar plantations and landings were scarred into the yellow clay while sturdily manned long boats with singing black boys carried the sweet brown sugar down to the bar. Vessels were scarce, but what of that? The forests bowed and sailing ships were built and soon were plying the seas. For ten years the trade grew; Liberia began to accumulate some wealth and more confidence. Her new college perched itself on the crowning height of the Cape and became a center of real education. Monrovia the capital was laid out in broad streets and Liberia sang her new nationaly hymn:

"All hail Liberia. Hail!
"In union strong, success is sure.
"We cannot fail!"

VOLUNTARY SEGREGATION

This paper is defending the thesis that American Negroes have got to take refuge in a limited amount of voluntary self-segregation in order to accumulate and apply sufficient strength for self-defense and self-assertion and eventual equality with other men. It would naturally be easy by extreme interpretation to make this thesis either too obvious or absolutely inadmissable. For instance, if one means by self-segregation such groups as card parties and picnics, visit and study groups, then naturally all people who have [redacted] interests practice this. On the other hand, if self-segregation implies extreme separation in work and social activities, in dwelling places and even in thought, the sort of Chauvinism of which I have sometimes lately been accused, then again the thesis would be indefensible in view of the obvious tendencies and ideals of our day.

But between these two extremes, there is, I think, room for considerable argument and difference of opinion and I am especially attacking a state of mind all too current among American Negroes today, that the Negro problem is largely a matter of their own volition. That if they stop calling themselves "Negroes"; if they cease regarding themselves as "a problem"; if they act and think simply as Americans and modern civilized men, that then gradually of its own accord the race prejudice of the United States and of the modern world will disappear. Suffice it to say that no one could possibly be happier than I if I thought this were the truth. But I know perfectly well that it is not. I am convinced that the Negro problem is an attitude of mind and a will to action on the part of so large a number of Americans and other citizens of the world; that nothing but positive action is going to do away with it; and that whatever is done is going to require a long time and great sacrifice. Those Negroes who do not realize this resort to peculiar habits and tactics. If they are not actually ashamed of their distinctive color and other racial traits; they conduct themselves as though they were. They avoid appearing together in crowds in public; they prefer to mingle with white people singly lest too much attention be called to their color. They will not attend picnics in public parks or go on colored excursions, partly for cultural reasons of behavior, but very largely because they are afraid of being publicly identified with a group which so often invites ridicule and discrimination by its very appearance. This summer, I saw on the boardwalk at Atlantic City a black girl in white beach pajamas. It was startling among the predominating pale, bloodless and rouged faces. I know that most of the colored people who saw her were more or less consciously incensed. Why did she want to walk there and attract attention; and yet she was not "trying" to attract attention. She was walking and talking with her escorts; and by itself and outside of its American complications, her appearance was interesting and even beautiful.

It is perfectly true that her appearance there and almost anywhere in America, and the coming, going and working of any people of pronounced skin color, and even beyond that, the attempt of people whose Negro descent is unknown and discovered, involves every degree of difficulty. This is the stark reality of the situation. There is no need to laugh or curse about it. It is simply so and we know it.

This summer, two English ladies, one a lecturer to the University of London, and the other American-born, but employed by the United States government in research work in England, came to America to meet a government official. They went to a hotel in New Hampshire in the White Mountains and the proprietor noticed that the hair of one of them was crinkly and her complexion sallow. He asked her if she were colored and she immediately with some surprise said that she was. She had been out of America for twenty years. He asked her to leave the hotel. In many respects, this is a minor incident, but we must remember how far this goes. The tendency in probably most American industries or offices is that the discovery that a fellow worker had any degree of Negro blood would lead to grave discussion if not actually to summary dismissal, no matter what the efficiency of the employee was. The admission of Negro students to Northern colleges, while possible, is continually and increasingly a matter of debate and in women's colleges and preparatory schools, such admission is very difficult. In housing, the line is drawn with strictness and bitterness if not with open rioting; and as one goes toward the South, the Color Line becomes more and more distinct and congealed into discriminatory and caste legislation. This of course is of a twice told tale.

Now comes the question: what is going to be done about it; and we can think of it from two points of view: first, what are the white people of America going to do about it; that is a question which I am not discussing. Whatever they do must be done of their own volition, helped by such influence and appeal as colored people can direct toward them. In the last twenty years organized effort has been made with my own hearty and perhaps sometimes vociferous help, to place the facts of color caste system before the thinking people of America. I think the effort has had considerable effect and I think that in the long run the civilized people of America cannot escape facing this problem and settling it in accordance with justice.

But in the meantime, the race prejudice and discrimination is here; it is abating only slowly and spasmodically and there is no reasonable hope that any person now living will see the entire disappearance of color discrimination in America. It is (and perhaps that is quite natural) a matter of hundred or five hundred years. Meantime, however, twelve million people and their children from generation to generation are living here. They have got to have education; they have got to have employment. None of these matters can wait until the Negro problem is settled. What are we going to do to insure the survival and development of the Negro race toward reasonable goals and ideals during the time that race prejudice is gradually abating? Or, suppose we face another uncomfortable eventuality? If human culture continues, race discrimination must stop. Nevertheless there may be eras when it will increase and much as we may regret this, t his seems to be such an era. Hitlerism in Germany, the Italian aggression in Africa, the niggardly granting of very limited concessions to Indian autonomy, the plight of the workers and peons in the West Indies and South and Central America, all these indicate that the world may have to face a period of increase in race discrimination before it finally decreases.

This makes it all the more necessary that any group discriminated against fend for itself and adopt a program of action which will insure its survival. At present, the situation in America, so far as Negroes are concerned, is this: the prejudice against them is not mainly spasmodic and occasional, it is to a very large extent organized, united and purposeful, standing continuously on guard and fighting bitterly any breahh in the walls of caste. This, of course, is perfectly clear in the Southern United States, but it is much more true in the North than most people casually think. Now against this attitude of aggression, there is so far as Negroes are concerned, only limited and spasmodic resistance and most of this of a negative character. Negroes today are fairly well prepared by joint action to protest against injustice in the courts, the breaking of contracts solely on account of color, the planning of compulsory "Jim-Crow" institutions, etc. But most of all this is negative and most of it assumes that justice is the rule and injustice the exception; that equality is the law and discrimination the breaking of the law. This in fact is not true. When one asks a colored person if they suffer discrimination in New York or Chicago, the answer is usually, "no," and it is both truth and untruth. As a matter of fact, the person is not discriminated against very often and the reason is that he carefully avoids the places and occasions where he will meet discrimination; which means that his life is a curiously segregated and limited life. He takes care not to get hungry on Fifty Avenue or Michigan Avenue; he does not apply for an apartment in Scarsdale or Hyde Park and if his child is ill-treated in a mixed school, he sends the child to a Southern Negro school or lets him drop out entirely. In a world where color discrimination is so much the rule, there must be more than negative protest against it. There must be positive united action and this united action must have two fronts: first, so far as possible to discourage discrimination and dissuade people from it, or compel them to stop it by law. This line of action, howeverm is after all limited to the desire of the mass of white people. It was natural and correct for the colored people of Pennsylvania to secure a law against discrimination in public places, but the enforcement of that law depends entirely upon white public opinion and very largely that public opinion is not going to stand back of it; and it will be only partially enforced. Protest, therefore, against discrimination is necessarily limited by the public opinion of white people and tha t is going to change slowly if at all and sometimes we must see actual retrogressi on.

There must be, therefore, on the part of colored people, a set point of attack, and that is to see that the Negro group itself does not suffer in income and education, in self-respect and self-assertion, in happiness and ideal, because of the discrimination which it suffers and which it will be compelled to suffer for many many years. Such action involves a degree of voluntary self-segregation and

and it is this that I am a dvocating. I mean that there must continue to be a considerable number of separate Negro public schools and colleges and this for the simple reason that it is impossible for Negro youth today to be educated as it should in the white schools and colleges. The impossibility is obvious in the South; it is widespread in the Southern tier of Northern states; it is not absent even in New England. There must be conserted effort so that colored children no matter here they are educated, or how, will in the course of their training learn naturally and sanely that color is neither a disease nor a plight; that peoples with colored skins have done creditable work in the world, ancient and modern, and that there is no reason why a black boy should not be an efficient, upstanding, self-respecting man. This kind of training can only be done by careful, direct and continuous teaching, example and organization. Above all, colored people have got to unite to see that their productive power is so used as to give each other employment and income. I have reiterated this time and time again and many have laughed at it and insisted on its impossibility. They have assumed that the economic organization of the United States is such that there is no escape from the exploitation of the white race in work and income and that it is impossible for the colored race to escape the lowest wages and the worst conditions of work, except by grace of the whites. I admit that it is difficult, but I deny that it is impossible. I believe that twelve million people with brains and determination, and particularly with a belief in themselves, can so organize their work and co-operation in industry, that they can insure themselves a decent living. This economic organization need not and cannot be entirely separate from the white economy; but it can be separate enough as to insure self-sustaining and self-guiding economic activity.

The outlook, then, for the intelligent planner among American Negroes is toward a field where for many generations he has got to organize Negroes as Negroes to do certain things for Negroes which only Negroes can do. His disinclination to do this arises from two reasons: first, because he doesn't want to be a Negro and secondly, because he fears if Negroes act together as Negroes they invite increased enmity and discrimination from others.

Voluntary Segregation

The first reason does not need discussion. It is the natural reaction from people born under a regime of insult and prejudice. It can only be escaped through the integrity and growth of one's own soul. The second is, I admit, a very grave matter. There is no doubt but that a disposition on the part of American Negroes to unite and work together will call for opposition. The classic example of this is the case of the Jews. Because of their oppression in the Middle Ages, they had to form an almost autonomous self-governing community with an internal economy. The success of this was the primary cause of anti-Semitism, and yet what else could the Jews do? Self-defense made segregation and union absolutely indispensable. But this is the price and danger which is inevitable, from which we cannot escape. We can only hope that the efficiency which union gives will be offset, not simply by increased enmity, but by the far greater increase of respect and appreciation on the part of the white world. But even suppose this should not happen? Suppose that despite segregation and because of it and whether there was united internal effort or not, the organized prejudice against Negroes and darker races in America should increase. That the experience which Negroes would have accumulated by working together as a group would certainly be their greatest help and refuge in any movement that thus would be forced upon them.

Mr. William H. Baldwin, Jr., was introduced to the Negro Problem from the Southern side, that is, he was associated with Southern people and heard their views and then came to hire Negroes in various capacities. He had all the difficulties that a Northern man under such circumstances must have. His workmen were lazy inefficient and cringing. They were ignorant and their ignorance was not simply illiteracy. From this Mr. Baldwin came to di definite sharply defined views. These Negroes might with training be made into an efficient working class. They could do common labor and they could even be trained to some sorts of skilled labor. They could be used to offset the growing demands for white union labor and thus make the South in some degrees a capitalistic paradise. On the other hand the Negro must be kept strictly in his place. He was not a white man and this fact must be impressed upon him. He must come to recognize that he was of a lower caste and while he had well defined rights they were not the same as the rights of white men. He should for instance, have no vote and social intercourse and intermarriage should be prohibited. And the education of Negroes should be arranged so as to bring about this consumation. This I believe was Mr. Baldwin's attitude up until say the time of the first "Ogden party". When the Ogden party came to Atlanta and certain members of the party including Mr. Ogden himself proposed to visit Atlanta University, Mr. Baldwin in a burst of indignation said in plain words "It will be a disgrace to this party for any of us to visit that institution." His attitude at the time was clear and consistent with his views: Atlanta University was primarily a Negro College. It sought to develop men to the breadth of their capacity and height of their ambition, regardless of their color. This attempt seemed to Mr. Baldwin both impossible and dangerous. In the first place the Negro had no particular capacities to develop, and, in the second place to fire the ambition of half-developed men for the impossible was nothing less than crime. From this time on, however, Mr. Baldwin's development on the Negro Problem was rapid and revolutionary: first, he began to come in contact with certain leaders of the Negro race. His attitude toward them was characteristically dictatorial. It was not so much learning from as teaching them and telling them what to do. He was impatient with the common specimens of upper class Negroes who did not take this education cheerily. When for instance, a young black man applied to his office for clerical work he was indignant and told him frankly that he had no business to be hunting for a white man's job, that his business was to work among his own people. At the same time the more he came in contact with colored people the more he had to recognize that hard and fast lines of demarcation of the ambition etc. did not square with the truth; that as a matter of fact, it was wrong, not to say preposterous in certain cases, to say to a certain man "Thus far shalt thou go and no further" simply because this man's skin happened to be black. No sooner did Mr. Baldwin realize this than his honesty came to the rescue. He recognized these men frankly, treated them as fellows and pointed out to them the splendid work they had to do in raising and guiding their people; but he still assumed that he knew how this raising and guiding had to be done. Even here, however, he gradually came across certain disturbing facts which he viewed squarely. For instance, he once visited the industrial exhibit of the colored school children at Athens, Ga. It was unusually well done and represented voluntary work on the part of colored teachers, for the school authorities would give them no appropriation. He said with enthusiasm "This is exactly the kind of work needed. Where were these teachers trained?" and then he found out to his great surprise that all except one had been graduated at Atlanta University. Here again Mr. Baldwin's open mind immediately began to learn and he began to realize that the process of educating the people was not nearly so simple a thing as he had assumed. He began to see that he had made certain mistakes and he proceeded straightway to rectify them. An organization was being planned in New York about this time by Mr. Baldwin and others to secure work for colored artisans in New York. Mr. Baldwin arranged a meeting of colored and white men to this end and wired me to come. I went and spoke at the conference and then Mr. Baldwin insisted on my going home with him. We went to his Brooklyn home, and he and his wife and I sat up until long after midnight discussing the Negro Problem. We resumed the discussion at breakfast, and came to New York together still discussing the matter and lunched at the Grand Union Hotel. Then I left him after ten or twelve hours discussion. In that discussion Mr. Baldwin began frankly by saying that I had probably heard of certain remarks of his which he wanted to explain. He acknowledged that he had said that it was a shame for any of the "Ogden" party to visit Atlanta University, but he said "I did not know Atlanta University then and I would not say it now." He spoke about the Negro applicant asking for a white man's job and explained that he was perhaps a little brusque in the matter and that he was thinking of how much there was for the black man to do for his own race without attempting this other work. Then he acknowledged frankly that there was need for some higher training among Negroes, and he used the phrase which he afterward repeated "The best education which it is possible for the recipient to use." * Then turning to more practicable matters he said "We want you at Tuskegee. I know and you know that Tuskegee is not a well organized school and I want you to go there and help organize it." At this I demurred. I spoke of Mr. Washington's and my widely divergent views on the matter of the Negro progress. He sought to impress me with the fact that Mr. Washington's whews after all were not so different from mine and finally he asked "What is it that you want Mr. Washington to say? You write out a statement of what you think Mr. Washington ought to say and send it to me?" To this I assented but afterward I concluded that it would not be right for me to do it. A mere private criticism of this sort was not going to accomplish as much as a frank open criticism. I therefore published the criticism which appeared in the "Souls of Black Folk" in 1903. Mr. Baldwin also proposed that if I could not see my way to unite with Tuskegee that at least some method of cooperation between Mr. Washington and those of us whoddid not believe in his methods should be found. To this I very gladly assented and out of the attempt sprang a conference of Negroes in New York which, however, amounted to nothing and Mr. Baldwin soon after died. His death to me was a matter of very great regret, because I was sure that he was slowly and surely coming to see the truth of the Negro Problem

* He wanted Negroes when fitted to be allowed to vote, to have civil rights and he said: "The 15th amendment shall not be repealed even if we have to take guns again."

and that when he had once grasped it his thought and work would be all the more valuable because he knew the North and South and was beginning to know the Black Man, and had worked his way through the maze ~~through~~ with long earnest effort. He had the ear of the South, and spoke as one who knew their side of the problem, and yet saw it largely. He had the ear of the North and believed in real freedom and democracy; and more and more, if he had lived, would he have known the side of the Negro because of his growing intimate and sympathetic contact with the colored man. He was, for instance, furious when he realized the discrimination against colored men on Pulman cars. He hired lawyers and had briefs prepared and was about to enter suit when other more conservative counsels induced him to wait a while.

The thing that impressed me in Mr. Baldwin's attitude toward the Negro was not so much his knowledge of the Negro Problem as his fearless desire to know and his determination to follow in the way that truth pointed.

A Pragmatic Program for a Dark Minority

1. There is today widespread apprehension, indecision and hesitation on the part of minority groups the world over. Such groups comprise religious, racial and cultural minorities within the confines of larger nations. Analogous to these groups are on the one hand the colonies and on the other hand the independent small nations. The colonies while in many cases actually numbering more inhabitants than the mother countries are constructive minorities in that they have little or no voice in their own government or the government of the mother country. The small nations also resemble minorities in that their political independence is conditioned by their economic dependence upon one or more of the larger countries.

2. Minority groups, colonies and small nations occupy today an anomalous position in the world. Together they form a major part of the world's population. Separately they are dominated by majorities who wield political, economic and social power over them. Ordinarily they cannot hope to become majorities. The Jews in Europe; the Negroes in America; religious sects of various kinds in various lands; nations like Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Scandinavia and the Balkan States together with colonies in Africa and certain states in Asia and South America.

3. What now must be the clear objects and aims of minority groups within the larger nations? Must they in self defence become segregated, narrowly racial, nationalistic and sectarian, iconoclastic; or shall they seek quiet unobtrusive self-suppression with eventual absorption into the larger groups or even self annihilation or group suicide?

4. To what may the colonies look forward: to eventual inclusion within mother countries or to separate national existence? This means the eventual recognition of a series of black and brown nations. Are they then to be treated as equals of the white nations and if not how shall they be kept in subjection?

5. An intermediate case is posed by certain nations of Asia and South America which already have asserted and to a degree maintained independence but whose independent economic and political existence is only partially recognised by the leading nations.

6. On the other hand what shall be the object and ideal of the great national states? If following the lead of Italy and Germany and certain tendencies of thought in England, France and the United States, they aim to become states of uniform racial type in physique and culture with the exclusion, actual or spiritual, of all alien elements, what is to become of these elements? Driven out of the main states they must seek refuge in minority states as in the case of Jewish Palestine or a restored status in states whence they have migrated as in the recurrent back to Africa proposal in the United States and in the exclusion or return of certain immigrants from nearly all modern countries. So that homeless, stateless wanderers become an increasing world problem. Can the great nations continue to withstand the cumulative numerical increase of such minorities together with the clamour and demands of colonies and the economic unrest of small and hampered nations? May not these minorities and colonies and unstable states in time find union and cooperation, with increasingly effective leadership; and in this case what future can the world face but long continued war and hatred? Not the war of rivalry between proposed masters of the world as in the twentieth century but a much more bitter and destructive war which would be the uprising of the oppressed throughout the universe.

7. In any case tolerance, understanding and every attempt at cooperation is today inevitable if civilization is to progress and is especially necessary since economic survival and progress depend upon world-wide cooperation in the production and distribution of wealth. The modern preeminence in technique, production and commerce is built on close world unity and not on national self-sufficiency and racial segregation. Certainly then war and domination cannot be envisaged as a permanent program and a world peace movement to be effective cannot be simply a program of understanding and cooperation between rival dominant nations but must become fundamentally a matter of tolerance and understanding between dominant majorities and minority groups; between ruling and subject peoples; between large and small nations.

8. This era of interracial and inter-group tolerance is not, as it has been so often pictured, merely a matter of philanthropy, on the part of the larger nations. The world's majorities, its dominant groups and great nations are facing difficulties which do not make the plight of the minorities a matter of indifference to them. No matter how much a nation may purge itself of physical or cultural alien elements, it is still by the conditions of economic development, divided into classes of rich and poor and various middle groups.

9. Moreover, in our day comes evidence of an economic change of world-wide proportions. This arises because of the economic expansion of Europe which began with the African slave trade and culminated in the Industrial Revolution. World-wide interchange of goods and services, with a marvelous technical efficiency and series of discoveries so increased the possibilities of ~~wealth~~ production that the whole problem of wealth and its distribution has changed. Instead of poverty being the natural and inevitable heritage of the mass of men, it has become conceivable that a better distribution of wealth and services would make most men comfortable and thus open the gates to wider intelligence and deeper art. Consequently the economic class structure of past days, which put wealth and power in the hands of a few and made the masses poverty-stricken workers, is tending in all of the leading countries to break up into new economic alignments. This economic class structure has not yet been abolished but the distribution of wealth more equitably than formerly, and the abolition of extreme poverty, is increasing.

10. This brings the problem as to how this wealth is to be shared between the great nations, the lesser nations, the minority groups and the backward peoples. ~~This~~ It complicates the relations of these groups and nations because the work of all these peoples is necessary to the continued production of wealth ~~and~~ while the exclusion of any of them from power means their lessening share. Thus a new slavery looms different from the slavery of the ancient world and even that of the African slave trade, analogous to the subjection of the working classes and yet presenting new problems in human relations.

11. In the case of the separate small nation or of the physically segregated group within the nation or the segregated national group called colonies, it is clear under what disadvantages they may labor in this economic readjustment. They may be cut off by tariffs or subject to various economic oppressions at the same time that the main nation is moving toward more equitable distribution of wealth. This increased equity may even be made to depend upon continued injustice toward minorities, small nations and colonies.

12. The changing nations must therefore ask first of all, how many of the inhabitants of the nation can be included in this newly conceived equalization of wealth and income, and how shall the rest be excluded? Moreover, the possibilities of intensive production and the amount of available income has depended in the past upon the subjection of certain classes and peoples. If this subjection disappears; if the working classes become increasingly sharers in the national income and if the alien groups in large states, the inhabitants of small states and particularly of the colonies, are regarded as prospective sharers of wealth, will the possibilities of production be such as can bring reasonable economic comfort to all these people; and in this world-wide economic equalization of peoples what will be the result on civilization and human culture? Can the mass of men be civilized or is culture facing another Dark Age of fatal proportions? In the face of this staggering problem the first reaction of great nations has been a stiffening of requirements for citizenship; of recognition of those who have a right to share in national benefits and exclusion of other elements, by means varying from serfdom of South African natives; to the caste of American Negroes, the economic paralysis of the West Indies and the physical expulsion and robbery of German Jews.

13. On the other hand, among these minorities, groups and small nations themselves there is equal paradox and frustration. Their social philosophy in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries included a recognition of the economic class structure in great nations as normal and inevitable. They sought social salvation through efforts to gain admission to these social classes and to rise from lower to higher status. The Jews beginning much earlier than most minority groups and having a great deal to do with the original formation of the capitalist hierarchy, early gained admission to place and power among these classes. In the case of the smaller nations, a division of the world economic field and cooperation with the larger nations established their economic status with their own inner gradations of economic classes similar to that of the larger nations. They thus often became economic provinces of the larger nations, with restricted political and cultural autonomy. Their wealthy and dominating economic classes enjoyed full recognition and reciprocity with the great nations, so that there was no essential distinction between a Dutch and English capitalist or a French, Italian or Hungarian investor. In fact their international alliances ruled the world. On the other hand in the colonies the rise of native capitalists and leaders was feared and their recognition less easy; and yet the economic class structure was recognized by Chinese, Japanese and African thinkers and philosophers, as normal and ideal; escape, equality, progress and freedom meant to them, inclusion among the dominant rich rulers of the world and continued subjection for their masses.

14. Thus these minorities themselves have generally accepted the economic class structure as natural and definitive. Its tendency to disappear today leaves them therefore curiously hampered in their philosophy. Shall the Jews embrace a social theory which looks toward an equalization of income, when their survival in the past has depended upon their ability to escape poverty and oppression through sharing the power of the higher income classes? Should the American Negro continue his older effort to seek escape through an elite which joins the higher economic classes of the whites leaving the great mass of black people as a poor and ignorant proletariat? Can small nations progressively equalize income and not suffer from ceasing to be represented in the inter-nation by powerful capitalists? Can a colony of backward people develop social control and education without monopoly of capital and compulsory labor?

15. The effect of such problems upon international and interracial relations must be tremendous and increasingly dangerous. The great nations face clarification of policy toward the rest of the world which involves contradiction or sacrifice. Contradiction if they try to combine more reasoned production and a more equitable distribution of wealth among their own citizens and at the same time continue to exploit colonial peoples and exclude smaller groups and nations. Sacrifice of wealth and power if white England, France and America share their income with Negroes and Chinese. On the other hand the minority groups and smaller nations whose interest have for a century and more been impelling them toward world activities and the breaking down of national and racial barriers, now face the compulsion of integrating their efforts, increasing their group solidarity and using force and propaganda to protect themselves and increase their efficiency. All this must inevitably move toward an increase of race hate and war.

16. Moreover, the fight of little nations, colonies and minorities can be made in one of two divergent directions: at present it would be more natural to adjust themselves to the older economic system which they have long seen and imitated among the conquering nations. Their working masses could be easily made to submit to this and they could evolve a powerful economic aristocracy, capable of leading their fight against the dominant nations. But what interest would their own masses have in this program and why should the dominant nations encourage such leaders?

17. On the other hand, these minority groups, colonies and smaller nations might attempt themselves to build an economy without economic classes and without poverty. This would be new and an experiment, and its success a matter of doubt since they would have no norms to guide them, and above all no adequately developed social leadership. A missionary movement in the dominant nations to supply such leaders is conceivable. But nineteenth century missionaries were economic morons when they were not secretarian bigots. Their philanthropy and sacrifice were thus only partially effective. On the other hand if both worlds - the majorities and minorities; the great nations and the colonies, both faced economic reconstruction for all peoples, an era of human cooperation of astonishing possibilities would dawn. Is this possible?

18. Here is a place where, as never before, the calm reason of mankind, implemented by scientific knowledge and motivated by men of good will can and must plan a crusade of cultural survival for civilization. We are headed toward War - not simply war of rival white Empires but a real death struggle of Worlds against perpetual poverty and continued degradation. A broad platform to counteract this is clear: the extension of the ideal of more equitable distribution of income through reasoned production and more just interchange of goods and services, not simply among people of favored nations but among all men. How far and how quickly this can be done depends upon the world-wide distribution of human ability and the triumph of good will. Here science, - anthropology, the new psychology, and international as contrasted with national economics, and a re-born and honest sociology, can and must help; and all the frustration and superstition of religion must be turned to practical ethical conduct.

19. The first problem of such scientific and philanthropic collaboration would be the possibility of cooperation in human effort and the production of goods for the benefit of all mankind together with the protection and increase of human culture. This involves the collaboration not simply of the representatives of the leading peoples but even more especially for the cooperation and free voice of the peoples of the earth and the assuming of responsibility by all groups. A new conception of democracy must come, - a democracy of minorities which becomes a reservoir of openly expressed opinion and desire, out of which those who rule the state may know the truth. Knowing Truth how can it be realized? Only by guiding the world under the control of able, unselfish and far-sighted men. There always have been such men; there are such men today; but their efforts are not guided by science, but misguided and frustrated by false economic and social theories.

20. Such movement and collaboration is conditioned on one assumption - a conviction which is unprovable until its truth is evident and then is so axiomatic that men cannot conceive that it was ever doubted or denied: this assumption is the perfectibility of mankind; not its absolute sameness, but its boundless possibilities even in difference. It is clear that the present world culture is upheld and advanced by a mere handful of those human beings whom education and opportunity might render capable of sharing in and contributing to. The present cultural leadership of the world is simply a small earnest of human possibilities, revealed by the last century of education and wealth, and selected largely by chance and arbitrary power rather than by wide design.

21. The possibilities of culture have not begun to be plumbed in the human ability which hitherto has led and developed the world and which has been discovered by chance and arbitrary power; and ~~that~~ among the depressed masses of peoples in culture states, and among the oppressed masses of the world, there are reservoirs of human ability and efficiency which can by world-wide education and cooperation be developed for the service of mankind. The narrow conception which assumes that the salvation of the earth depends upon the English aristocracy or the French elite or the Nordic race, must be supplemented by a conviction that the same time and trouble and opportunity that went to the development of these peoples, can give equal and even greater results among other peoples. On the other hand it would be made equally clear that the possibility of such development is not its realization and that neither popular vote nor wishful thinking can in a day make a Kaffir capable of successfully guiding the British Empire. Nor does the present subjection of Kaffirs to Englishmen prove the superiority of the white race.

22. What is called for are wide plans of educating all men for human development on the broadest scale and not schemes for using most men for private profit or personal or national aggrandisement. This can be done, but it calls for effort, wealth and sacrifice, sustained by an abiding faith in Man. Above all the wealth created by poor workers not simply within a nation but throughout the world must be used increasingly for their own uplift and not for their continued slavery.

23. Turning now from the general to the specific, let us consider our own land. There is proceeding in the United States a readjustment in the direction of production and the division of wealth. It is clearly recognized that the present organization of industry does not give employment to the available workers despite the social need for their efforts; and is furnishing even our workers an average income which is below the requirements of decent living. There is wide divergence of opinion as to how this situation is going to be remedied but there is no essential difference of opinion as to the necessity of remedy of some sort.

24. However in every concrete program of readjustment there appears here, as elsewhere in the world, the question as to what people really constitute America and what groups must be more or less excluded either because they are not an integral part of the American nation or because their inclusion will make the whole program impracticable. In relief, housing, re-settlement, model towns, labor organization, wage standards, public education, job, age, health and accident insurance - in all these matters there is not only the problem of the mass of recognized Americans, but the additional problem of certain excluded groups, of which the most conspicuous and universally excluded are Americans of known Negro descent. It matters not how morally wrong this is, or socially dangerous, or legally forbidden; the fact remains that Negroes are usually unwelcome as physical neighbors, undesired as fellow workers, unwanted in many schools, and additional liabilities in relief and insurance. The historical excuse for poverty and crime among Negroes is not recognized, because the majority of Americans not only recognize the Negroes' present social inequality, but would not actively make effort entirely to remove it, even if this were possible. Argument, agitation and appeal for one hundred years supplemented by proof of increasing ability and accomplishment has not essentially breeched this wall of prejudice which is based in part on the biologic fear of blood deterioration and in part on the old desire for a permanent inferior caste.

25. The older philosophy was that intelligent, gifted and deserving members of this suppressed group, children of former slaves, would escape into the majority group by a process of scaling off through accomplishment; that consequently the triumph of a black athlete, a Negro musician or a colored scholar was the beginning of the end of race discrimination. But not only is such a process slow but it is hindered and nullified by prevailing opinions; so that while some of the worst manifestations of color discrimination in the United States have disappeared, a residuum persists which will not be markedly altered during the life time of the present generation; and indeed its recrudescence and growth is being encouraged today by world conditions.

26. The next step according to American tradition would be to apply force in order to correct injustice against Negro Americans. That is, force in the sense of agitation and publicity with political and economic pressure and even violence. This program, however, is strictly limited by the amount of sympathy and cooperation that it will receive from white Americans. No disadvantaged minority can successfully use force against a determined majority. The majority of white Americans today are adverse to certain forms of Negro oppression. They dislike lynching and mob law. They would prefer to have disfranchisement accomplished by legal methods universally applied. But on the other hand, they do not regard Negroes as equals; they do not wish them to receive the same income as whites; they do not want them advanced according to ability and while they sincerely believe that the ability is not present save in sporadic cases they are often unwilling to test this fairly. The result is that the only program which American Negroes can successfully follow, is that of publicity and appeal, with such legal defense as is possible while they are waiting for public opinion gradually to change. If, of course, the Negro continues to develop in intelligence and ability this change in opinion is certain to come but can he develop intelligence and ability unless he can maintain an economic status and a purposeful internal organization?

27. It is this maintenance of economic status, in the face of and in accord with the economic revolution going on throughout the country generally and indeed throughout the world, that makes the present plight of the Negro so baffling. His earlier philosophy accepted the economic class structure of the American nation; its domination of wealth and the eventual rise of Negroes by gaining admission into the upper economic classes. If now in accordance with the better thought of the world the economic class structure is bound gradually to disappear and the distribution of wealth among the masses to become more equitable, what is to be the plan and program of the American Negro group?

28. This is the crux of the present Negro problem. The differentiation of Negroes into classes and groups has progressed swiftly. They are today divided according to economic status, education and physical distribution. They vary from well-to-do college-trained business and professional men to servants and laborers, farmers and farm-tenants, and a great mass of casual workers, paupers, outcasts and semi-criminals.

29. What common aim can this widely differentiated group have? In other days they would flay apart into antagonistic, self-conscious, exploiting and exploited groups. Today because of their social history they have a common bond in the color bar; but does this furnish a common program? On the contrary we may think of three different programs: a program to develop an upper class of rich, powerful and educated Negroes who would exploit the Negro masses and other poor peoples and form cultural and economic alliance with corresponding white classes in the nation. Or we might think of an effort to develop the main mass of Negroes as workers and servants in alliance and cooperation with the white labor movement. These two possibilities are both hindered by race prejudice. Segregation and group effort within the color bar is, therefore, to some extent inevitable and leads to a third possible program which would envisage equalization of wealth within the group, a degree of economic self-sufficiency and group cooperation with the white nation.

30. The first program has been tried with only partial success and is meeting today the criticism of those who believe in greater equalization of wealth. The second program is being tried but meets continued opposition in a large part of the labor world. The third program brings us to a crucial problem affecting the relation of major and minor groups within nations and of stronger and weaker peoples throughout the world. How far can these groups into which the world is settling have common, open and frank objects and strive together for them, or how far will this group, national and racial segregation lead to a fatal division of the world's peoples within and without the leading nations? Hitherto any attempt of a minority to lay down and follow a group program has lead to suspicion, resentment and often open violence between minorities and majorities. It has always been an excuse for reaction and pushing the parties to greater separation rather than less. On the other hand the program of racial and minority exclusion adopted by the majority of the nation, leaves the minority a helpless victim unless it organizes in turn.

31. May this not be because the reciprocal problem has not been openly recognized? There must be peace, cooperation, tolerance and forbearance between the different groups of the world or else an attempt to exterminate each other. Such extermination is today neither necessary nor desirable. Such a program would deprive human culture of that physical and spiritual diversity which has been regarded usually as the life blood of developing civilization. Not dead uniformity of body, mind and raiment but tolerance between diverse groups, thoughts, emotions and beliefs, has always been the idea of most enlightened men. Neither physical nor spiritual exclusion is a practical human program today. On the other hand a social grouping according to wish and desire, so long as it hurts and hinders no one, is not only permissible but a legimate tool of human culture. It is desirable and necessary that the best minds of the land representing the majority groups and culture and the best minds representing the minority groups, should seek to develop a frank and open program which would include segregation as a legitimate tool but not as a final end and would recognize that the advance of Jews, Negroes, Indians and others is just as much to the advantage of America as the advance of New Englanders of English descent or the white Scotch-Irish of the South.

32. Negroes, moreover, must agree upon an economic program and if they are going to work with the main forward movement of the world, that program must include the equalization of wealth and a gradual disappearance of economic classes. Such union will involve internal stress and increased voluntary and involuntary racial segregation: the maintenance of the separate Negro church, the increase of the Negro system of education and a certain increase of Negro neighborhoods, towns and even sections; especially a Negro economy for producing and distributing wealth and services. Already the reaction among Negro physicians against group medicine, the refusal to attempt the burden of Negro relief, and the growing bitterness of the black labor masses toward the richer and more successful Negroes and the rise of fantastic demogogues as leaders, forecastes the coming minor class struggle.

33. The danger here is that reaction and prejudice on the part of whites should seize upon segregation and group action as in itself desirable and so help to increase it beyond necessity or social safety. This can only be stopped by earnestly pointing out that an increase of group segregation in a nation and in the world is the most dangerous of modern tendencies, the most direct threat to the maintenance and spread of human culture, the widest cause of war.

34. The frank facing of this situation in the United States and working in accordance with it, should lead to similar orientation in the West Indies where, with a segregated island proletariat and absentee economic control, an extraordinary impasse has been reached; and in Africa where there are gathering all the elements of a racial, economic and national struggle within another century, increased by the bitterest memories. Finally and above all the problem of the relation of Europe to the peoples of Asia and of South America can only be finally settled when these people see in the treatment of racial minorities by Europe and the United States, an evidence of good will and an effort to advance the real and permanent interests of all humanity not at the expense of the majority of the world's people but with their frank and open cooperation.

1935 Mss. by DuBois

A LITTLE JOURNEY IN THE WORLD

37-10-35

The whole oddyssey of our trip from Atlanta to New York and return in the winter of 1935 deserves to be set down with some particularity, both as warning and encouragement.

We started Friday afternoon, December 20, at half-past four. There were Mrs. Cannon and Mrs. Duncan of the Red Oaks School, Alonzo Lowry, a Morehouse student, and myself.

We sailed on easily and with fair speed, aiming to stop at Spartanburg, South Carolina, for the night. But there were certain omens that should have warned us. First of all, I think Lowry killed two dogs; one of which probably had been run over before.

We came into Spartanburg later than we had planned, but in good condition and spirits, save for the dogs. The next morning, Saturday, things began to happen in earnest. It was bitter cold in Spartanburg, colder than I thought South Carolina capable of. The car which had been housed in an out-house refused to start, partly on account of the sleeve valves, but more on account of frozen brakes; a kind of accident I had not encountered before.

Dr. Gregg got a mechanic and then finally we got started about eight o'clock instead of at six, as we had planned. Near Norlina, about 1 P.M., we discovered a flat as we were at a gas station; we bought a new inner tube, rode on and ate lunch. Later passers-by hailed us and we discovered another flat and had to change the wheel. This was ominous, but not nearly as much so as the incident after dark eight miles north of Wise which we agreed to mark with an "X" and not to mention aloud. We went on after stopping at a garage and reached Richmond finally between eight and nine o'clock at night, instead of at six, which we had planned. There, we had an excellent supper, got up early the next morning, and had breakfast and got started at eight. We had hardly gotten to the corner by the second light turning into the highway toward Washington, when the brakes jammed again so that the back wheels did not turn. By coaxing, we got as far as a garage. It was Sunday and only one mechanic, a colored man, was on duty. At first my passengers were quite sure that he didn't know his business, buthe really did. It was so cold, however, that it took some time.

We finally got into a closed garage and after three hours' work, we started again. This of course meant that we got into New York at eleven o'clock stead of seven o'clock keeping up our bad record for promptness. In New York, of course, we all generally, had our pleasant celebrations at Christmas, but evidently Mrs. Cannon got cold feet. Husband recommended that she return directly from New York to New Orleans to her conference which would give her nearly a week extra in New York. We could not object and we did not. On Friday at noon, we started for the South.

The weather was pleasant without snow and not very cold. Everything went nicely until we got to Richmond. At Richmond, when we arose Sunday morning, lo and behold, there were four inches of snow on the ground and it was snowing with steady determination. But we argued this way: snow in Richmond could not last long, and moreover, as we go South, itis bound to disappear. Probably we would run out of the snowstorm by noon. The hotel dining room was not opened, so we went across the street to a little joint where we caused considerable curiosity, but got a good breakfast of bacon and eggs, and then off to the South.

I drove, knowing the way and being a little afraid of skidding in the snow. We got to Petersburg without trouble, but from Petersburg to South Hill, the snow increased in quantity and we found it difficult and dangerous to pass cars. Little had been done in cleaning the roads. From South Hill to Durham, we had a pretty bad time. The road was narrow, the snow had hardened to a corduroy formation and it was especially bad between Oxford and Durham.

Durham was a pain. The city sat under a coat of six inches of snow, with snow still falling and with nobody apparently doing a single thing. The streets were not cleared, the sidewalks were not cleared, the stores closed, and it was already getting dark at four o'clock in the afternoon. We drove down to the depot and had our lunch and then when we planned to start, the car wheels skidded in the snow and we had a terrible time pushing and backing and getting hold of ashes and papers in order to get started. This was the first of perhaps ten times during the rest of the trip when we had to get out and push and pull and haul and bring in the help of neighbors--and neighbors, white and black, were very kind. In Durham, a second time, we got stuck on one of the city hills and could only get out by letting the car drift down under a culvert where it was level and without snow. With the start we got, we approached the top of the hill and met a red light, but I turned right on the red light. Mrs. Duncan declares that it was against the rule and that a policeman saw me, but he considerately turned his back.

Then the question was: what to do? Should we stop for the night in Durham or drive the car on, our goal being Spartanburg. We were especially bothered by ice forming on the windshields. It formed rapidly and froze and for a while we had to get out every hundred feet or so and brush it off. Then I remembered that glycerine was a cure for this and we bought a small bottle which cured that difficulty. If we did not reach Spartanburg that night, we could not reach Atlanta in time for classes Monday. Very foolishly and stupidly, we all decided to go on. From Durham to Greensboro, we could make only about twenty miles an hour and the bright lights of Sedalia tempted us, but still we pushed on grimly ahead.

On we went from Greensboro to Charlotte. The road was in better condition and had been for the most part fairly well cleared. We got to Charlotte at nine o'clock and determined to go on to Spartanburg. I telephoned in a drug store. The white proprietor was very curious and when he heard me tell Mrs. Jones at Spartanburg we would be there at mid-night, he said, laughingly, "You won't get there at mid-night. It will be two or three o'clock." It proved that he was quite right. The road grew worse, especially that bad bit of raod between North and South Carolina through Kings Mountain. The snow was so thick, we couldn't tell where the bad, dirt road ended and the good, concrete began and we had a merry time making wagers about it. We passed cars in ditches and got stalled ourselves, but finally arrived in Spartanburg at three o'clock in the morning. We had coffee and Smithfield ham and fell wearily into bed. I set the alarm of my clock for Five A. M. At Five A.M. Monday, after two hours' sleep, we got up. It was hard to awaken Mrs. Duncan and Lowry, but I finally did, and then came the very worse part of the trip!

First of all, the car which we had cannily left in front of the house instead of trying to get it in the garage, refused to move out of the snow. Its wheels whirled, simply whirled, helplessly around. Mr. Lowry and I worked and worked and finally got it started. I was at the wheel and drove it down the road. Then came the problem as to how to get it back up the road. I did not know where the road went, so I tried turning out into a side street that looked safe in order to turn around. The result was that I again got stuck. Lowry came down and again we worked and pushed and two or three different persons helped us. Finally, by getting a shovel and digging down into the ground and putting sticks under the car, we finally got it started again. This time Lowry was driving and inconsiderately turned out for a coming car. The result was we were in the ditch again and again we had to push and pull and get help.

Finally, we got it started a third time. I was at the wheel and I drove straight up to the main street and parked in a garage where I was sure we could start again. Then I went back and ate breakfast and got Lowry and Mrs. Duncan and we walked a half-mile back with some of the baggage and got into the car. This was about nine o'clock. There was, of course, no chance to make the two hundred miles to Atlanta at eleven-forty o'clock, but stubbornly, we went on. We had all sorts of adventures. Two or three times, we got stuck in the snow again and kindly travelers helped push us out. We were literally surrounded by wrecks and stalled cars. Trucks, especially, had difficulty. The road had been cleaned for the width of one vehicle and when you turned out for a car, especially for a truck, there was no way of knowing whether you were getting off the payment or not. You went into the deep snow with frantic prayers and if you did not miss the payment, came on again. One on-coming car struck a truck and tied up the traffic for a half-hour.

When we reached Greenville, matters went more smoothly and we went skipping merrily on to Athens. I calculated that we would get into Atlanta about six o'clock at night and that I would get supper and go to the Omega ball. Suddenly about fifteen miles the other side of Athens, the car sighed and stopped. Lowry and I got out, examined the gas and the spark and lights. The horn acted all right, there was plenty of gas, and so I concluded the trouble must be in that mysterious part of the car called the electrical system. Two colored men came by, one teacher in the local school, and told us where there was a garage and mechanic about two miles back. Lowry went back with them. About three o'clock, the mechanic came. I do not know what his real name, was, but he was called "J.B." and the man that brought him in the car was called "Cecil". They were white men. Cecil had a summer suit and no vest and literally shivered in the intense cold. The other man was fat and dressed as a mechanic, but got pretty cold before he could finish the work.

They were both good-natured and did their best. They said the difficulty, undoubtedly, was with the coil and the condenser and the only thing they could do was to drive fifteen miles into Athens to get new parts and bring them out and put them in. This they did while we sat and waited, eating the rather scanty remains of the lunch, and looking at the beautiful snow and icy trees and sunshine. They came back, finally, and made the repairs. I paid them $11.25, (by the way, I had to borrow it from Mrs. Duncan,) and off we started merrily. That was about four o'clock. We would be in Atlanta about seven or eight.

We had gone about four miles when the car sighed again and stopped. I was prepared to scream and do damage, but Mrs. Duncan was a brick. She didn't complain and was very encouraging. For the first time in my life, I hailed a passing traveller and asked him if he would take Lowry back to the garage. He did. Lowry said that he had a bottle of whiskey under the seat and took frequent potations on the way; but Lowry got back there. Then "J.B." couldn't find anybody to bring him up and Mrs. Duncan and I sat waiting. Finally, Mrs. Duncan sat up and said: "I tell you what I am going to do. I'm going to hail a motorist and go into Athens and get a wrecking car." We both of us knew people there, including the Harris's.

A Little Journey in the World

I told her that would never do. It was dark and lonely. It would be dangerous and she wouldn't dare. "Oh, yes I will," she said brightly, and knowing it was about our last chance, I let her get out. The first car that came by, she raised her hand. The man stopped very obligingly and took her to Athens. She said he was an ordinary white working man, but acted very pleasantly. She paid him for taking her in, which he at first refused, but finally was prevailed upon. She went to Dr. Harris's and made arrangements to get a car to come out and drag us in.

In the meantime, I was quite alone on this dark, lonely road with the cars rushing by on the snow and ice and I was not certain just when or where one was going to hit me. Moreover, Lowry had not returned. I pictured him as getting into a fuss with "J.B." and "J.B." refusing to return; and I pictured Mrs. Duncan getting into all sorts of unspeakable trouble. It was a very lovely wait. About five o'clock, Lowry returned with the mechanic and another man who drove him and a little boy. They worked and worked on the car and said that undoubtedly through a short circuit the two new coils had been burned out; and finally, the mechanic threw up his hands and said he couldn't do anything more that night. I would have to wait until morning. I didn't go through the useless gesture of asking him for a refund, but simply said: "All right, we'll wait for the car from Athens." And he forgot to tell me that he had broken the little arm in the distributor and could do nothing until they got the new part from Athens!

So Lowry and I sat and waited and waited. About nine o'clock, two cars appeared: Dr. Harris and Mrs. Duncan in one, and a garage man in a small Plymouth. We had a difficult time getting started on the icy road. We went forward and slid back. The Plymouth pulled my car with Dr. Harris pushing. Finally, however, we pulled my car back to a level space and got it started and then made a dash for the nine miles to Athens.

I have taken a good many wild rides in my life, but this ride I think was the most hair-raising that I have ever had. The road was full of slush, ice and snow. Cars and even trucks and busses were passing. To turn out might mean getting into a ditch if not in a gully, and yet we reaced into Athens at forty miles an hour. The boy in the Plymouth said that that was the only way to get it in there. If my car had skidded, weighing as it did twice as much as the Plymouth, we would hardly be here to tell the tale. The Plymouth swayed crazily from side to side and the La Salle glared from behind and came up and bumped at intervals. We got into the town at last--how I don't know--and were deposited in a garage where another workman, a kindly old man, started in with the repairs.

We went into the drug store and then went across to a restaurant. It was a little place, but clean, with some rough laborers as customers, but with good food. The proprietor called me "Brother" and told me where to hang up my hat, and we congregated around the little rusty stove in the back. Then we had excellent oyster stew, steak and potatoes and some desert, although I have forgotten what. Then we went back over to the garage. The man had had to pause and go out and drag in another wrecked car, and then he tinkered over ours. He furnished new coils and still the car wouldn't start and he confessed finally that he didn't know what was the matter. But a half hour after mid-night, the engine whirred and we started out again. By that time, I had lost all hope and fully expected to be stranded somewhere between Athens and Atlanta and spend the night. I let Lowry drive because I was too tired and for the first time in my life I actually slept while somebody was driving my car. We got into the city limits about three o'clock and I noticed with astonishment that there were no lights, and finally on Ponce De Leon Avenue, I found a tree across the street, and for a moment was quite lost. Only then did we realize what the ice storm had done to Atlanta. But we reached the Spelman campus at half-past three. At four o'clock, I was at the men's dormitory. I left the car outdoors to its surprise and went up to my suite to find no lights there, but an ornamental yellow candle did very well, and I slept.

THE HANDS OF ETHIOPIA

By W. E. Burghardt DuBois

The hands which the Land of Burnt Faces is today stretching forth to the God of Things-that-be are both physical and spiritual; and both today and yesterday they have twined gnarled fingers about the very roots of the world. Physically Ethiopia's fingers are those rough mountain masses of North East Africa which form the defensive rampart of the continent and against which historically Egypt and Persia, Turk and Egyptian, British, French and Italian have so far hammered in vain.

Abyssinia is a pear-shaped mountain ~~clump~~ mass, cut into island-like sections which are separated by deep gorges and ravines. It is nearly as large as France and Spain combined, and looms high on the northwest toward the Valley of the Nile, slopes on the southwest toward the Great Lakes, and drops on the east to the sea. It rises in three great terraces: a plane of rocky strata; a plateau about eight thousand feet above the sea, and above this snow-capped mountains which sometimes rise nearly another eight thousand feet. "It looks," says the traveller, "like a storm-tossed sea, suddenly solidified."

In these highlands, both the Blue Nile and the Atbara rise, and thus Abyssinia commands a full half of the waters of the Nile. It was a German who said that the power which held the Abyssinian highlands could dominate the imperialism of Europe in Africa. On these stark physical facts is built a spiritual history almost as old as the world and yet half forgotten even in this recent revival of strained interest in this Land of the Blacks.

Why for instance is Haile Selassie, Emperor of "Ethiopia"

4-8-15-23

and not of Abyssinia as his predecessors often called themselves? Abyssinia is a word of Semitic origin, but Ethiopia is Negro. Look at the pictures of Abyssinians now widely current. They are as Negroid as American Negroes. If there is a black race they belong to it. Of course, there are and never were any "pure" Negroes any more than there are "pure" whites or "pure" yellows. Humanity is mixed to its bones. But in the rough and practical assignment of mankind to three divisions, the Ethiopians belong to the black race.

And always did. Abyssinia is the fourth great step of dark human culture in North East Africa backward — or shall we say forward — from the Mediterranean to the Great Lakes, paralleling perhaps a pre-historic movement northward; and every step has shaken the world. Physically the steps have been almost equal - 500 miles from the Nile delta to the First Cataract. Then 500 miles from Napata to Meroe; and at last 500 miles from the capital of the Candaces to their shield-like island formed by the Atbara and Blue Nile, to Axum and Adowa where the retreat — or advance of black Africa ended until 1935.

All this vast movement and development was stretched over more than 5,000 years, but it affected essentially similar, though not identical groups of African people: the mulattoes of Egypt, more and more drowned in the black blood from the South, which ever threatened and gave them sanctuary. This southern land, called from the beginning "Ethiopia", had its surging boundaries finally fastened at the First Cataract, until these gates became an opening and refuge where Egypt retreated before Persia; and Ethiopia, eventually, became a new and conquering Egypt which ruled the Nile valley from Napata and was the greatest power in the western world from 750 to 600 B.C.

But Asia and the Desert pressed South again, until at Meroe, 500 further miles South and 500 years later, Ethiopia developed a new capital and new dynasties which resisted the power of Greece, Rome and Arabia. Then the land of the Blacks crumpled again, before black foes sweeping in from the forests of the west, before the New Mohammedanism pressing relentlessly down from the north, before the ever encroaching desert.

Ethiopia again retreating took her stand with her back against the last great ramparts of the east - the Hills of Abyssinia. Here the black hordes of the region of the Great Lakes had been infiltrated with Semitic blood from the shores of the Red Sea, where Asiatic upheavals drove Jews and Arabs before them and hurled remnants on the African shores. The trading station at Axum, near modern Adowa, was a gateway for merchants and brought Ethiopia and Abyssinia in contact.

This kingdom took its name, "Abyssinia", from a Semitic tribe, "Habesh"; but the people of Habesh were neither contented nor safe in being simply Abyssinians. Trade and defense forced them toward ancient Ethiopia, and they disputed with the Arabs and Nubians over the domination of the island of Meroe. Here they claimed sovereignty as early as 356 A.D., and actually destroyed the capital a century later. Greek and Roman influence filtered into Abyssinia from the East, and trade made Axum flourish. Myths of its obscure origin began to arise: the Jewish myth of descent of its royal house from Solomon; the Negro myth of its descent from Aethiopis, whose tomb was pointed out at Axum.

The new Christian religion came to Abyssinia in the Fourth Century after Christ, and thus a third great center of Christianity, in contrast to Rome and Constantinople, was established. Then came the red wave of conquest from the North, and the history of

Abyssinia becomes dim and shadowy. As Gibbons has written, "Encompassed by her enemies, Ethiopia slept a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom she was forgotten."

It was not until the 16th Century that the Portuguese again brought Abyssinia to the attention of the world, by locating there the source of the legend of Prester John, that ghostly Christian ruler, who during the Middle Ages was supposed to be reigning in Africa or India.

Abyssinia from early times was divided into a number of great districts, each administered by an hereditary chief called a Ras. Over these chiefs ruled a Negus, called "King of Kings." When this overlord was a strong man, he ruled a powerful country. When he was weak, there was anarchy and confusion.

Such a period of disintegration was in progress about the middle of the 19th Century under Johannes; but he was succeeded in 1855 by the Emperor Theodore, a gifted, ruthless man, who came to the throne at the time when European imperialism was being organized and stretching out inquiring hands toward Asia and Africa. Scientists, traders, missionaries and adventurers wandered into Abyssinia. Theodore was well-disposed toward Europeans, and curious about their countries; but inevitable misunderstanding occurred, both in matters of etiquette and religion. "I know the tactics of European governments," said the observing Theodore, "when they try to acquire an Eastern state. First, they send out missionaries; then consuls to support the missionaries; then battalions to support the consuls. I am not a Rajah of Hindustan to be made mock of in that way."

Theodore needed alliance and friendship with Europe, if they came to him on honorable terms, to help organize his kingdom and beat back the threatened domination of Turks and Egyptians.

He considered himself insulted, however, when the British and others after making fair promises, forgot all about him and ignored his overtures; in angry retaliation he seized and imprisoned the British minister and other Europeans.

Thereupon, in 1867, the British taking advantage of a rebellion, sent Napier with an army of 12,000 men to invade Abyssinia. Theodore was surrounded in his capital where the British troops with superior rifles killed two thousand Abyssinians, while losing only 20 whites. Theodore surrendered and released the prisoners, but Napier had promised the rebel chiefs to degrade and dethrone him. The English artillery opened fire on Magdala and Theodore shot himself dead. His body was allowed to be mutilated by a mob, while Napier received a peerage. Anarchy ensued in Abyssinia between 1868 and 1872, with two rival claimants to the throne, Johannes of Tigre and Menelik of Shoa.

This is historically the land that in 1935 came suddenly to the world's attention as a threat of imminent World War, as a test of international agreements, as a curious crisis in the Christian religion. How did this come about?

Italy became a united nation at the time when modern international imperialism was just beginning. Its outlines were clear in the British Empire whose wide colonial dominion was becoming an imperial domain for investing capital in cheap colored labor. Germany had as yet no colonial dream and France had lost hers. Italy had two too pressing problems of unification and the Catholic church to make wider plans, but she had a tradition - almost she was hampered by a tradition, of Imperial Rome. And if modern Rome had a claim to any part of the world which was not hers, it was surely to Carthage or modern Tunis. France blundered into possession of Algiers as early as 1830 and at the Congress of Berlin in 1878, Bismark and Salisbury offered her Tunis as a consolation prize after Sedan.

The scramble for Africa began in the last quarter of the 19th century and imperial industry took cleaner, firmer outlines. France and England took dual control of Egypt in 1876. In 1881 France seized Tunis and England ~~took control~~ firmer hold of Egypt. Italy was aroused. Despite her poverty and internal problems she resented the loss of ancient Carthage. She staked her claim ~~felt forced to imperial aggression. In 1882~~ to Tripoli and in 1882 she seized Eritrea, a part of the natural coast line of Abyssinia; but England and France blocked her further extension south; and it was not until 1892 that she joined England and Germany in the loot of Zanzibar and got Italian Somaliland.

These first imperial ventures of Italy had little significance. The Abyssinian highlanders cared little about the coast and took no note of its seizure; but the whole situation changed when native rebellion arose in Egypt and the Sudan.

4/8-15-27

Egypt was groaning under the debt which had been deliberately encouraged by France and England. Her rulers, who had squandered the proceeds, sought to keep up the interest by ruinous and exhaustive taxation. In desperation, the natives rebelled. Ahmed Arabi, a mulatto colonel, led a successful revolt but the English turned their guns upon Alexandria and defeated Arabi. This left the Egyptian ~~former~~ rulers still in nominal control of the whole of Egypt but in actual control only of the Sudan, ~~while the English held the real power along the Lower Nile.~~

Rebellion in the Sudan naturally ~~followed~~ continued. ~~The Araby rebellion had its echo in the Sudan.~~ In 1878, the mulatto Rabah had swept through the Bahr-El-Ghazel and the regions south of Lake Chad. Then there arose a greater leader and a vaster motif. Mohammed Ahmed, son of a priest in Dongola, had established headquarters 150 miles above Khartum. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, majestic black man, with great eyes. He had visions. Disciples gathered around him, and eventually he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammedan revelation.

The country, groaning under misrule, went into the throes of a religious crusade against Egypt. A holy war was proclaimed, and a strong army organized. The Mahdi put down blasphemy, feasting, drinking, smoking and swearing. ~~Thousands followed him.~~ The Egyptians in 1883 sent an army of 10,000 under the Englishman, Hicks Pasha. They were annihilated, ~~with only 500 left alive~~. Kordofan, Dafur and the Bahr-El-Ghazel surrendered. Only a German, Emin Pasha, still upheld Egyptian power down in the Equatorial provinces next to Uganda. By the end of 1883, the Mahdi was master of a territory equal to Spain, France and Germany, and his army was closing in on Khartum, the capital of the Sudan. Ancient Ethiopia lived again.

England hesitated. She still had the liberal tradition and Gladstone even went so far as to say that the Sudanese were "rightly struggling to be free." But his "little Englanders" were fighting growing and expanding imperialism and as Chamberlain put it - "Empire is Commerce." Eventually came together in Berlin in November, 1884, and laster through February, 1885. The Congo was recognized not as an international state but as the personal property of the King of Belgium. Certain rules of procedure for the further seizure of Africa were adopted, and before the conference was ended, the German colonial party forced Bismark's hand, seized Zanzibar and East Africa, and Germany appeared as a full-fledged African colonial power.

The scramble for Africa was bitter. England was encroaching upon the Portuguese colonies; Germany had appeared in the field; France was at work in North Africa. France, England and Italy had seized the coast of Abyssinia, and in the vast Valley of the Congo, comprising the whole center of Africa, little Belgium had proposed an international state. An European conference to settle the rules of the game for the further looting of Africa seemed necessary. It

In the midst of this, the imperialists forced Gladstone to make Chinese Gordon Governor of the Sudan, and Gordon, a tippling fanatic with fits of courage and murder, sought by every subterfuge to force Gladstone to conquer the Sudan. The bluff failed, Gordon died and Gladstone was reviled as a murderer and traitor.

Khartoum fell. For thirteen years, the Mahdi and his successor, the Khalifa, ruled. Thus the whole of the Sudan was lost to Egypt and England. The Egyptian garrisons on the northern border of Abyssinian were finally withdrawn in 1886, and French, British and Italian possessions on the coast were in danger of being overwhelmed by the Mahdi.

The English Tories, returned to power in June 1885, did not dare attack the Mahdi, and resorted to a web of diplomacy which entangles England today. She signed a treaty of alliance with Johannes II of Abyssinia and thus enlisted his aid to keep the Mahdi from the coast. Turning on top of this she suggested that Italy seize the port of Massowah which belonged to Abyssinia. To hand over to the Italians Massowah which belonged to the Abyssinians, and to which Italy had no shadow of claim, was an extraordinary breach of faith. Italy proceeded to take Massowah, as Giolitti says, as "a consolation prize", having been cheated out of Tunis, held back in Tripoli; out-manoeuvered both at the Congress of Berlin and the Berlin Conference; as well as losing her chance to participate in Egypt.

Once having placed her foot in Massowah, Italy proceeded to make alliance with Johannes' chief ~~enemy~~ rival, Menelik of Shoa, a pretender to the Abyssinian throne. Johannes found himself between two enemies, Italy and the Khalifa, and eventually was killed in battle by the latter in 1889. Imediately, Menelik proclaimed himself King of Kings, and in May signed with the Italians the celebrated treaty of Uccialli.

To prove his gratitude to the Italians for their alliance and help with the armies, Menelik ceded Italy the territory which they had already seized. But the Italians, drunk with new ambition, swept on, calmly crossed into Abyssinia, and toward the end of 1889, seized Adowa, while Menelik was busily subduing his enemies. They even penetrated into the Harrar, the trading region inland from the coast, thus coming into direct dispute, not only with Abyssinia, but with the claims of France and Great Britain. Thereupon, France and Great Britain made a secret treaty which allowed them to oppose Italy's advance if they pleased; a treaty which again put Great Britain in the unenviable position of "double-crossing" Italy, just as she had previously deceived Abyssinia.

were seeking to fall heir to Egypt in Central Africa. England arrived first in 1888, and found Emin at first unwilling to be "rescued." He wanted to hold these provinces and turn them over to Germany. The Khalifa, however, was pressing him hard, and when Stanley appeared, Emin finally reluctantly followed him, and they met Karl Peters and the German expedition which had been busily engaged in making treaties with the local chiefs for German expansion. Emin, with his black wife and mulatto daughter, finally arrived at Zanzibar, where he accepted the post under the German administration in East Africa.

Meantime, the stage was set for Italy's final coup. In the seventeenth clause of the Treaty of Uccialli, there arose a characteristic misunderstanding. The Abyssinian text, which was the only one actually signed, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, shall be at liberty to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments." The Italian translation, which was made in Italy, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, consents to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments."

The treaty was signed May 2, 1889. October 12, 1889, Crispi notified the powers by circular letter under the general act of the Berlin Conference of 1884-1885 that Abyssinia was an Italian protectorate. On May 5, 1894, he signed agreements with England in which England recognized Abyssinia as an Italian protectorate. A map of Africa by treaty was published in 1894, with the sanction of the English Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which this rape of Abyssinia was recognized!

But both England and Italy had reckoned without their host.

There is no doubt but that the Treaty of Uccialli was a clumsy forgery of the same sort that had previously transferred sovereignty of a larger part of Africa from black men to white. Menelik, however, did not choose to submit. He not only denounced the treaty but he took up arms. He declared by proclamation: "Ethiopia has need of no one. She stretches out her hands to none but God." The French willingly supplied these hands with arms and munitions. The forces of Italy and Ethiopia met at Adowa, and Italy's army of ~~100~~ 20,000 was annihilated March 1, 1896.

Suddenly, the headwaters of the Nile, the Nile Valley, the Egypt, the domination of the Red Sea, the path from the Cape-to-Cairo, - all these were in the hands of black men, - the black dervishes of the Sudan, and Menelik II, King of the Kings of Ethiopia and Emperor of Abyssinia. An English officer wrote: "If I were the Mahdi, I would make Egypt pay for every quart of water that runs down the Nile."

With Abyssinia in Italian hands, the British would have been willing to wait in order to clinch their eventual domination of the Nile Valley. She had in 1894 annexed Uganda (thus ending the dreams of Peters and Emin Pasha) and ~~thus~~ definitely curbing German expansion ~~in East Africa~~ toward the Nile valley. In 1895, the Jameson raid had taken place in South Africa as the first step toward a war destined to crush the Dutch and make South Africa a British province. The Cape-to-Cairo idea, fostered by Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes, had seized the imagination of the empire. An agreement with Leopold of Belgium even secured a perpetual lease of a large bloc of territory at the headwaters of the Nile, and filled in the gap between the Great Lakes; but this so alarmed the French that this lease was eventually cancelled.

The French, thereupon, took a forward step, and determined to push from French Africa eastward to the Nile, and send a French expedition through Abyssinia westward to the Nile, and establish claims which would unite French Africa and cut off the hinterland of Tripoli even if Italy annexed it, which she had long planned to do. Menelik gave aid and comfort, and in 1894, made a concession to the French to build a railway from Djibuti through the Harrar to Addis Abeba and the White Nile. French officers trained the Abyssinian army. Great Britain warned France that she claimed the whole of the Nile Valley and would consider any attempt to dispute this claim as an unfriendly act. Paris, hesitated, and the Abyssinian expedition was ~~called off.~~ held back two years.

But the Battle of Adowa changed the whole situation. Italy could no longer pull English chestnuts out of the fire, and French plans were ~~manifest~~ renewed. Salisbury, again at the English helm, moved quickly. March 5, the news of Adowa reached England, and March 12, England suddenly learned that Chinese Gordon was a Christian martyr, who had been murdered by heathen. She ordered the conquest of the Sudan. Kitchener, with the new Maxim-Nordenfeldt guns, moved up the Nile. He captured Khartum in September, and ordered the tomb of the dead Mahdi publicly desecrated, as an "example."

England was not a minute too soon. That very month, Marchand, the Frenchman, was at Fashoda awaiting the French and Abyssinian expeditions from Abyssinia. Indeed, one Abyssinian expedition under a royal prince had already reached the river but had been decimated by fever. The other expedition under a French commander did not materialize. For a moment, the world stood still with World War in the air.

Congo, April 25, with instructions to march to the White Nile. They again arranged an Abyssinian expedition to join him. The idea was that the two expeditions should meet on the Nile and establish a French claim to the Upper Valley of the Nile. When Kitchener arrived, he would find the French and Abyssinians stretched across the Capte-to-Cairo path. The Abyssinian expedition failed through the negligence of the French governor of Djibuti. When Marchand reached Fashoda in 1898, there was no fortress and no expedition of French and Abyssinians from the east to support him. Kitchener proceeded south to meet Marchand and his small body of Senegalese soldiers. The sympathies of the world were with Marchand. [illegible] But the French fleet was not equal to the British and the French army at Fashoda was greatly inferior to the British army. March 21, 1899, an Anglo-French declaration was issued, which definitely gave the Nile Valley to Great Britain.

Imperial Italy remained intensely dissatisfied. Her treatment by France in the matter of Tunis and Tripoli, and by England, in the case of Abyssinia, threw her into the arms of Germany and Austria, and she became part of the Triple Alliance. By taking Tripoli from Turkey in 1911-1912, Italy ~~had~~ helped precipitate world-wide conflagration, and ~~had~~ gained for herself a strip of barren sand by "a perfect nightmare of horror...a veritable carnage." Nevertheless, on the eve of the World War, Prime Minister Salandra declared that Italy's policy would be dictated by "Sacred Egoism". Thus, in 1914, Italy, holding herself aloof, offered herself to the highest bidder.

It is said that ~~at one time~~ in 1915 France dangled the Port of Djibuti with its Abyssinian railway terminal before Italy, ~~and even the Colony of Tunis, in 1915.~~ At any rate, in the secret treaty of London, it was expressly agreed by Great Britain, France, and Russia, not only that Italy was to receive large portions of Austrian territory, in event of victory, but that (Article XIII. of the Treaty of London of April 26, 1915):

"In the event of an extension of the French and British colonial possessions in Africa at the expense of Germany, France and Great Britain recognize to Italy in principle the right of demanding for herself certain compensations, in the form of an extension of her possessions in Eritrea, Somaliland, Libya, and the colonial districts bordering on French and British colonies."

Italy immediately entered the war on the side of the Allies, and started a lively discussion of future colonial development. For her entrance into the war, Italy paid a terrible toll. Six hundred thousand lay dead and a million were wounded. The country seethed with disillusion and discontent, and the Paris Conference, by ignoring the Treaty of London, gave Italy what she regarded as a "mutilated victory", despite the territory which she gained from Austria. As a result, the Socialists, who had opposed Italy's entrance in the war, captured the government in 1919, and the beginnings of proletarian revolution in the form of sydicalism appeared. Italy chose Fascism.

Confidence and faith in Italy, and peaceful submission to the burdens of war and oppression, were accomplished by a subtly conceived psychological onslaught, which revived in the minds of young Italy the glory of Rome and the expansion of colonial empire. For glory, it appealed to youth in its curiously illogical national hymn: "Youth, springtime of beauty! Fascism is the safeguard of our liberty." What could thrill Italy more than revenge for Adowa?

"I heard Mussolini say on one occasion, speaking from the balcony of the Chigi Palace on the Corso in Rome--this was before he moved over to the palazzo Venezia - 'Camice Nere (Blackshirts) when you look at the map, you see that the island of Sicily is the southernmost limit of our empire. But I swear to you that the day will come when the island of Sicily will be the geographical center of our empire.'"

The history of Rome was invoked, and Mussolini began sabre-rattling on a tremendous scale, and particularly emphasized the fact that Italy proposed to have colonies where she could settle her expanding population, and that also that her population must expand. Moreover, Mussolini said frankly that Tripoli and Eritrea were not enough. "These two colonies alone cannot solve our population problem, mark this well." He emphasized the plight of the Italians in Tunis. There were ninety thousand of them against seventy-one thousand Frenchmen, and the French were threatening to turn Italian children into French citizens. Mussolini protested bitterly, and demanded a great navy to protect a future empire.

In the meantime, Abyssinia was bestirring herself. Menelik, the great emperor, died the year before the World War. He was succeeded by a daughter; and then by a grandson, whose hatred of Europeans and fanatical attitude on religion made him no fit instrument for a diplomatic role. Finally, Ras Tafari, a leading prince, was nominated as successor; he was crowned King in 1928 and Emperor, November 2,1930, amid the pomp of one of the oldest branches of the Christian Church. Significantly, he determined to call his country, "Ethiopia, the land of the Burnt Faces," and not Abyssinia, from the Semitic tribe of Habesh.

To the far-sighted, the coronation of Haile Selassie II.. presented at once foreboding and encouraging omens. He represented the beginning of a new era. Forces were at work to end the whole system of European aggression upon colored countries. In the formation of the League of Nations they saw the idea of a world tribunal where the lesser nations could at least be heard. ~~The idea of the mandates was to put certain colonies under the guardianship of the League of Nations, and prevent at least the extremes of exploitation.~~ In Abyssinia there seemed to lie an excellent chance for the new development. An unhampered tradition went back thousands of years that enabled these black men and brown to be proud of their color, their ancestry, their history. Surely, here was a chance to begin a new world.

But if Abyssinia thus represented a beginning of new things, it also represented a continuation of the old, and this fact, too, was clear at the coronation. Representatives of thirteen countries braved the difficulties of travel and were present at Addis Ababa. There was the Duke of Gloucester, son of the King of England; there was the Duke of Udine, son of the King of Italy; there was Marshal Franchet d'Esperey, representing France; and a royal prince of Japan. The British representative stood, always, at the emperor's right hand, and the Italian at his left. It looked almost like a fore-gathering of cormorants watching a feast, ~~where each was seeing that one did not get all and each maneuvering for the largest possible share.~~

Haile Selassie II, was born in 1871, is by tradition the 384th King to sit upon the throne; and leaving out mere tradition, we know of at least 200 Abyssinian kings in historic times. He is a slight brown man with curly hair, dignified and serious, educated in France, and eager for the advance of his country. As Prince, he had visited England, France and other parts of the continent, and wished to come to the United States; but the United States did not invite him. He began sending a few Abyssinians to be educated abroad; he began to re-organize the system of justice, and tried to re-build the state in many ways.

There were difficulties. Some were internal; Abyssinia is two thousand years old with an unbroken tradition, strong feudal princes, old families, and inbred customs opposed to change. The emperor had to attack evils like domestic slavery slowly and with care. Yet in this case, European philanthropy, with rapacious commercialism back of it, hammered at the reformer and forced him to set a pace which time may prove far too fast for his slow changing nation. It is quite possible that the new emperor, by his inovations and European policy, has strained dangerously the allegiance of some of his powerful followers, linked as they are to ancient allegiance and hoary customs.

The international relations of Ethiopia, coupled with old efforts at economic intervention, made the situation of the country difficult. In 1906, the agreement between Great Britain, France and Italy to respect and preserve the integrity of Abyssinia was really designed to prevent industrial concessions made to one from injuring the claims of any of the others. The notes between Great Britain and Italy in 1925, secretly divided Ethiopia into spheres of influence with Great Britain deominant in the regions of Lake Tsana and the headwaters of the Nile, and Italy along the borders of Eritrea and Somaliland. Ethiopia brought this treaty to the notice of the League of Nations. Mussolini explained, and MacDonald half apologised; and yet later when certain American engineers in 1927 signed a $20,000,000 contract to dam the waters of Lake Tsana, England insisted upon her prior rights, and by quiet diplomacy broke the contract. In 1928, despite opposition, Ethiopia joined the League of Nations.

The murder of the ~~prime minister of~~ Austria by the German Nazis halted an understanding between ~~France~~ Germany and Italy which might have forced France and England to disgorge the German colonies in Africa and grant Italy's African demands in full. But Italy feared

Pan-Germany more than France; France feared Hitler's militarism; and England feared German industrial competition. The cards were quickly re-shuffled. Laval and Mussolini renewed the old efforts to come to an understanding. Exactly what their written understanding was has not been published, but it is pretty clear from subsequent events. Some ~~concessions~~ arrangements were made as to Italians in Tunis; and some territorial concessions in the hinterland of Tripoli, probably not large in actual extent, but important in opening one of the main trade routes from Lake Chad ~~to Tripoli.~~

The main concession undoubtedly ~~was in Abyssinia, and that concession consisted, first, in promising~~ must have a tacit if not written assurance to withdraw all opposition and to keep hands off if Mussolini should make war upon Abyssinia, and seize ~~any part of~~ her territory. Secondly, to grant Italian capital additional power in Abyssinia. It is rumored that three thousand shares of the Djibuti Railroad have been turned over to Italy, and that a rectification of frontier between Eritrea and French Somaliland has been so arranged as to give Italy direct access to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb.

All this means a tighter economic cordon around Ethiopia to make her access to foreign markets more difficult, and to keep out capital from countries other than Italy, Great Britain, and France. Behind this movement, and tending to strengthen the common interests of ~~these imperial~~ European powers, are two menaces from Asia; the new independence of the ~~kingdom of the~~ Arabs opposite Abyssinia across the Red Sea. At best this is going to cut ~~with~~ Italian trade ~~with Eritrea~~, and at worst, it is going to encourage every Arab in North Africa to remember the trail of blood through which Italy walked to secure the barren victory of Tripoli. Again, the recent appearance of Japan in Abyssinian industrial development, has alarmed the West. It is rumored that Japan has already captured ~~one-third~~ a large part of the commerce of Abyssinia, and the French charge that the Japanese wish to equip Ethiopia industrially, and furnish technical help for [redacted] new machines.

Italy then mobilizes against Ethiopia; in spite of the League of Nations; in spite of her treaty of arbitration; in spite of reported efforts at conciliation and adjustment, her troops are piling soldiers and equipment into Eritrea. She intends to seize Ethiopian territory, ~~on one pretext or another; to secure oil, and to draw a tighter broad base of economic and military aggression about her.~~ She may not attempt complete subjugation - the inner citadel is very strong; but annexation of the plateau and economic strangulation can accomplish what direct force cannot do immediately.

Here, then, is war again. That war which has never ceased since the World War, but now comes nearer the European circle where its sparks are increasingly dangerous. Moreover, let no one think that the demand of Italy in Africa is the end of demands. The reason that Germany refuses to reveal her ultimate objects is because there is still one unmentioned subject, and that is, German colonies, and particularly German colonies in Africa, since the attitude and power of Japan makes colonial aggression in Asia unhealthful just now.

Hitler in his Saar speech, intimated that the work of redeeming German colonies had not been finished, ~~and he doubtless used the word "colony" advisedly.~~ That Germany is going to demand the return of German Africa, before she consents to ~~raise~~ lift the war menace in Europe, is absolutely certain. The scramble, therefore, in Africa, for cheap labor and cheap war material is not ended.

It helped start World War in 1914, and it may easily do it again in our day. All this is not pleasant reading for those who pin their faith on European civilization, the Christian religion and the superiority of the white race. Yet these are the bare facts. They might be differently interpreted, and variously supplemented, but it must remain a story of selfish and short-sighted cruelty, deception and theft, with black men mainly victims and white men usually aggressors.

What of the future? We can envisage three possible results of the present program of Mussolini:

1. The civilized world, remembering the World War and the promise of the League of Nations, not forgetting a series of treaties and understandings, will refuse to allow Italy to attack Ethiopia or curtail her independence.
2. Italy will attack and gradully subdue Ethiopia and make her into an Italian colony and protectorate.
3. Ethiopia will repulse Italy or make conquest so difficult that she will retain her independence.

The probabilities are that Italy, by sheer weight of armament and the inactivity of Europe, will subdue Ethiopia. If this happens it will be a costly victory, both for Italy and the white world. There will be not only the cost in debt, death and hate, but the whole colored world, - India, China and Japan, Africa in Africa and America, and all the South Seas and Indian South America, - all that vast mass of men who have felt the oppression and insults, the slavery and exploitation of white folk, will say: "I told you so!" There is no faith in them even toward each other. They do not believe in Christianity and they will never voluntarily recognize the essential equality of human beings or surrender the idea of dominating the majority of men for their own selfish ends. Japan was right. The only path to freedom and equality is force, and force to the uttermost." Nor will this indefensible aggression prove to the dark peoples their weakness; rather it will point the path to strength: understanding between Japan and China, India will close Asia to white aggressor and need no longer hesitate between passive resistance and open rebellion. Even black men will realize that Europe holds Africa in leash today mainly with African troops, a religion of humility, vague hopes and skillfully encouraged jealousies.

One of these days, the very troops by which Europe holds Africa may cease to play the part so long assigned them. It only needs the guiding thought and the great leader. And then with all that Europe can do in airplane, tank and war gun, let the world remember that a group of determined black men, armed even partially with modern technique, could take their stand on the snow-swept heights of Ethiopia, within sight of the Equator, and in the midst of the black world, and shake the centers of European imperialism.

Suppose, however, that turning from this dreary and age-old prospect of blood and waste, we contemplate the possibility that Ethiopia, helped by courage and terrain, secret European sympathy or ~~even revolution~~ open collapse in Italy, succeeds in repulsing Italy or even holding her for months in check. This does not now seem probable, but it is possible. The result would be a grim chorus from the dark worlds: the spell of Europe is broken. It is the beginning of the end. Europe can no longer depend on brute force to make serfs of Yellow, Black and Brown.

Such reasoning may be fallacious and fail to accord Europe and the white race due credit for bringing the mass of men into the circle of human culture. Yet its logic is inevitable: Italy has forced the world into a position that, wins race hate will increase; ~~and~~ while if Ethiopia is not defeated, the prestige of the white world will receive a check comparable to the defeat of Russia by Japan.

Finally, if as now seems incredible, but is not beyond possibility, the better public opinion of the white world, and its obvious interests, absolutely refuses to allow this brazen public banditry to proceed; if England, France and America hold Italians firmly in check without too deadly impairment of Ethiopian independence; if the Pope of Rome refuses further to quibble and Protestant missions insist on practising their preaching, while Pacifists fight for Peace - in this improbable event, a new hope and faith will course through the veins of men; a new patience with selfishness and wrong; a new hatred the stupidity of war and a new urge to Humanity.

By W. E. Burghardt DuBois

The hands which the Land of Burnt Faces is today stretching forth to the God of Things-that-be are both physical and spiritual; and both today and yesterday they have twined gnarled fingers about the very roots of the world. Physically Ethiopia's fingers are those rough mountain masses of North East Africa which are the defensive rampart of the continent and against which historically Egypt and Persia, Turk and Egyptian, British French and Italian have so far hammered in vain.

Abyssinia is a pear-shaped mountain clump, cut into island-like sections which are separated by deep gorges and ravines. It is nearly as large as France and Spain combined, and looms high on the northwest toward the Valley of the Nile, slopes on the southwest toward the Great Lakes, and drops on the east to the sea. It rises in three great terraces: a plane of rocky strata; a plateau about eight thousand feet above the sea, and above this snow-capped mountains which sometimes rise nearly another eight thousand feet. "It looks," says the traveller, "like a storm-tossed sea, suddenly solidified."

In these highlands, both the Blue Nile and the Atbara rise, and thus Abyssinia commands a full half of the waters of the Nile. It was a German who said that the power which held the Abyssinian highlands could dominate the imperialism of Europe in Africa. On these stark physical facts is built a spiritual history almost as old as the world and yet half forgotten even in this recent revival of strained interest in this Land of the Blacks.

Why for instance is Haile Selassie, Emperor of Ethiopia

and not of Abyssinia as his predecessors often called themselves. Abyssinia is a word of Semitic origin, but Ethiopia is Negro. Look at the pictures of Abyssinians now widely current. They are as Negroid as American Negroes. If there is a black race they belong to is. Of course, there are and never were any "pure" Negroes any more than there are "pure" whites or "pure" yellows. Humanity is mixed to its bones. But in the rough and practical assignment of mankind to three divisions, the Ethiopians belong to the black race.

And always did. Abyssinia is the fourth great step dark human culture in North East Africa backward - or shall we say forward - from the Mediterranean to the Great Lakes, paralleling perhaps a pre-historic movement northward, and every step has shaken the world. Physically the steps have been almost equal - 500 miles from the Nile delta to the First Cataret. Then 500 miles from Napata to Meroe and at last 500 miles from the capital of the Candaces to their shield-like island formed by the Atbara and Blue Nile, to Axum and Adowa where the retreat - or advance of black Africa - ended until 1935.

All this vast movement and development was stretched over more than 5,000 years, but it affected essentially similar, though not identical groups of African people: the mulattoes of Egypt, more and more drowned in the black blood from the South, which ever threatened and gave them sanctuary. This southern land, called from the beginning "Ethiopia", had its surging boundaries finally fastened at the First Cataret, until these gates became an opening and refuge where Egypt retreated before Persia; and Ethiopia, eventually became a new and conquering Egypt which ruled the Nile valley from Napata and was the greatest power in the western world from 750 to 600 B.C.

But Asia and the Desert pressed South again, until at Meroe, 500 further miles South and 500 years later Ethiopia developed a new capital and new dynasties which resisted the power of Greece, Rome and Arabia. Then the land of the Blacks crumpled again, before black foes sweeping in from the forests of the west, before the New Mohammedanism pressing relentlessly down from the north, before the ever encroaching desert.

Ethiopia again retreating took her stand with her back against the last great ramparts of the east - the Hills of Abyssinia. Here the black hordes of the region of the Great Lakes had been infiltrated with Semitic blood from the shores of the Red Sea, where Asiatic upheavels drove Jews and Arabs before them and hurled remnants on the African shores. The trading station at Axum, near modern Adowa was a gateway for merchants and brought Ethiopia and Abyssinia in contact.

This kingdom took its name, "Abyssinia", from a Semitic tribe, "Habesh"; but the people of Habesh were neither contented nor safe in being simply Abyssinians. Trade and defense forced them toward ancient Ethiopia, and they disputed with the Arabs and Nubians over the domination of the island of Meroe. Here they claimed sovereignty as early as 356 A.D., and actually destroyed the capital a century later. Greek and Roman influence filtered into Abyssinia from the East, and trade made Axum flourish. Myths of its obscure origin began to arise: the Jewish myth of descent of its royal house from Solomon; the Negro myth of its descent from Aethiopis, whose tomb was pointed out at Axum.

The new Christian religion came to Abyssinia in the Fourth Century after Christ, and thus a third great center of Christianity, in contrast to Rome and Constantinople, was established. Then came the red wave of conquest from the North, and the history of Abyssinia becomes dim and shadowy. As Gibbons has written, "Encompassed by her enemies, Ethiopia slept a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom she was forgotten."

It was not until the 16th Century that the Portuguese again brought Abyssinia to the attention of the world, by locating there the source of the legend of Prester John, that ghostly Christian ruler, who during the Middle Ages was supposed to be reigning in Africa or India.

Abyssinia from early times was divided into a number of great districts, each administered by an hereditary chief called a Ras. Over these chiefs ruled a Negus, called "King of Kings." When this overlord was a strong man, he ruled a powerful country. When he was weak, there was anarchy and confusion.

Such a period of disintegration was in progress about the middle of the 19th Century under Johannes; but he was succeeded in 1855 by the Emperor Theodore, a gifted, ruthless man, who came to the throne at the time when European imperialism was being organized and stretching out inquiring hands toward Asia and Africa. Scientists, traders, missionaries and adventurers wandered into Abyssinia. Theodore was well-disposed toward Europeans, and curious about their countries, but inevitable misunderstanding occurred, both in matters of etiquette and religion. "I know the tactics of European governments," said the observing Theodore, "when they try to acquire an Eastern state. First, they send out missionaries; then consuls to support the missionaries; then battalions to support the consuls. I am not a Rajah of Hindustan to be made mock of in that way."

Theodore needed alliance and friendship with Europe, if they came to him on honorable terms, to help organize his kingdom and beat back the threatened domination of Turks and Egyptians.

He considered himself insulted, however, when the British and others after making fair promises, forgot all about him and ignored his overtures; in angry retaliation he seized and imprisoned the British minister and other Europeans.

Thereupon, in 1867, the British taking advantage of a rebellion sent Napier with an army of 12,000 men to invade Abyssinia. Theodore was surrounded in his capital where the British troops with superior rifles killed two thousand Abyssinians, while losing only 20 whites. Theodore surrendered and released the prisoners, but Napier had promised the rebel chiefs to degrade and dethrone him. The English artillery opened fire on Magdala and Theodore shot himself dead. His body was allowed to be mutilated by a mob, while Napier received a peerage. Anarchy ensued in Abyssinia between 1868 and 1872, with two rival claimants to the throne, Johannes of Tigre and Menelik of Shoa.

This is historically the land that in 1935 came suddenly to the world's attention as a threat of imminent World War, as a test of international agreements, as a curious crisis in the Christian religion. How did this come about?

Italy became a united nation at the time when modern international imperialism was just beginning. Its outlines were clear in the British Empire whose wide colonial dominion was becoming an imperial domain for investing capital in cheap colored labor. Germany had as yet no colonial dream and France had lost hers. Italy had two too pressing problems of unification and the Catholic church to make wider plans, but she had a tradition - almost she was hampered by a tradition, of Imperial Rome. And if modern Rome had a claim to any part of the world which was not hers, it was surely to Carthage or modern Tunis. France blundered into possession of Algiers as early as 1830 and at the Congress of Berlin in 1878, Bismark and Salisbury offered her Tunis as a consolation prize after Sedan.

The scramble for Africa began and imperial industry took cleaner, firmer outlines. France and England took dual control of Egypt in 1876. In 1881 France seized Tunis and England lost possession of Egypt. Italy was aroused. Despite her poverty and internal problems she felt forced to imperial aggression. In 1882 she seized Eritrea, a part of the natural coast line of Abyssinia but England and France blocked her further extension south; and it was not until 1892 that she joined England and Germany in the loot of Zanzibar and got Italian Somaliland.

These imperial ventures of Italy had little significance. The Abyssinian highlanders cared little about the coast and took no note of its seizure; but the whole situation changed when native rebellion arose in Egypt and the Sudan.

Egypt was groaning under the debt which had been deliberately encouraged by France and England. Her rulers, who had squandered the proceeds, sought to keep up the interest by ruinous and exhaustive taxation. In desperation, the natives rebelled. Ahmed Arabi, a mulatto colonel, led a successful revolt but the English turned their guns upon Alexandria and defeated Araby. This left the former rulers in nominal control of the whole of Egypt but in actual control of the Sunda, while the English held the real power along the Lower Nile.

The Araby rebellion had its echo in the Sudan. In 1878, the mulatto Rabah had swept through the Bahr-El-Ghazel and the regions south of Lake Chad. Then there arose a greater leader and a vaster motif. Mohammed Ahmed, son of a priest in Dongola, had established headquarters 150 miles above Khartum. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, majestic black man, with great eyes. He had visions. Disciples gathered around him, and eventually he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammedan revelation.

The country, groaning under misrule, went into the throes of a religious crusade against Egypt. A holy war was proclaimed, and a strong army organized. The Mahdi put down blasphemy, feasting, drinking, smoking and swearing. Thousands followed him. The Egyptians in 1883 sent an army of 10,000 under the Englishman, Hicks Pasha. They were annihilated, with only 300 left alive. Kordofan, Dafur and the Bahr-El-Ghazel surrendered. Only a German, Emin Pasha, still upheld Egyptian power down in the Equatorial provinces next to Uganda. By the end of 1883, the Mahdi was master of a territory equal to Spain, France and Germany, and his army was closing in on Khartum, the capital of the Sudan. Ancient Ethiopia lived again.

England hesitated. She still had the liberal tradition and Gladstone even went so far as to say that the Sudanese were "rightly struggling to be free." But his "little Englanders" were fighting growing and expanding imperialism and as Chamberlain put it - "Empire is Commerce."

The scramble for Africa was bitter. England was encroaching upon the Portuguese colonies; Germany had appeared in the field; France was at work in North Africa. France, England and Italy had seized the coast of Abyssinia, and in the vast Valley of the Congo, comprising the whole center of Africa, little Belgium had proposed an international state. An European conference to settle the rules of the game for the further looting of Africa seemed necessary. It came together in Berlin in November, 1884, and laster through February, 1885. The Congo was recognized not as an international state but as the personal property of the King of Belgium. Certain rules of procedure for the further seizure of Africa were adopted, and before the conference was ended, the German colonial party forced Bismark's hand, seized Zanzibar and East Africa, and Germany appeared as a full-fledged African colonial power.

In the midst of this, the imperialists forced Gladstone to make Chinese Gordon Governor of the Sudan, and Gordon, a tippling fanatic with fits of courage and murder, sought by every subterfuge to force Gladstone to conquer the Sudan. The bluff failed, Gordon died and Gladstone was reviled as a murderer and traitor.

Khartoum fell. For thirteen years, the Mahdi and his successor, the Khalifa, ruled. Thus, the whole of the Sudan was lost to Egypt and England. The Egyptian garrisons on the northern border of Abyssinian were finally withdrawn in 1886, and French, British and Italian possessions on the coast were in danger of being overwhelmed by the Mahdi.

The English Tories, returned to power in June 1885, did not dare attack the Mahdi, and resorted to a web of diplomacy which entangles England today. She signed a treaty of alliance with Johannes II of Abyssinia and thus enlisted his aid to keep the Mahdi from the coast. Turning on top of this she suggested that Italy seize the port of Massowah which belonged to Abyssinia. To hand over to the Italians Massowah which belonged to the Abyssinians, and to which Italy had no shadow of claim, was an extraordinary breach of faith. Italy proceeded to take Massowah, as Giolitti says, as "a consolation prize", having been cheated out of Tunis, held back in Tripoli; out-manoeuvered both at the Congress of Berlin and the Berlin Conference; as well as losing her chance to participate in Egypt.

Once having placed her foot in Massowah, Italy proceeded to make alliance with Johannes' chief enemy, Menelik of Shoa, a pretender to the Abyssinian throne. Johannes found himself between two enemies, Italy and the Khalifa, and eventually was killed in battle by the latter in 1889. Imediately, Menelik proclaimed himself King of Kings, and in May signed with the Italians the celebrated treaty of Uccialli.

To prove his gratitude to the Italians for their alliance and help with the armies, Menelik ceded Italy the territory which they had already seized. But the Italians, drunk with new ambition, swept on, calmly crossed into Abyssinia, and toward the end of 1889, seized Adowa, while Menelik was busily subduing his enemies. They even penetrated into the Harrar, the trading region inland from the coast, thus coming into direct dispute, not only with Abyssinia, but with the claims of France and Great Britain. Thereupon, France and Great Britain made a secret treaty which allowed them to oppose Italy's advance if they pleased; a treaty which again put Great Britain in the unenviable position of "double-crossing" Italy, just as they had previously deceived Abyssinia.

This looked like a rare opportunity for German imperialism. Between German East Africa and the Egyptian Sudan, lay the great territory of Uganda, where Catholics, Protestants and Mohammedans had been merrily cutting each others throats in their efforts to convert the heathen. The Germans pushed warily up into this country, while shut up in the Equatorial provinces of the Sudan was the German, Emin Pasha. Germany determined to rescue him, while England spent $145,000 on the Stanley expedition. Both nations were seeking to fall heir to Egypt in Central Africa. England arrived first in 1888, and found Emin at first unwilling to be "rescued." He wanted to hold these provinces and turn them over to Germany. The Khalifa, however, was pressing him hard, and when Stanley appeared, Emin finally reluctantly followed him, and they met Karl Peters and the German expedition which had been busily engaged in making treaties with the local chiefs for German expansion. Emin, with his black wife and mulatto daughter, finally arrived at Zanzibar, where he accepted the post under the German administration in East Africa.

Meantime, the stage was set for Italy's final coup. In the seventeenth clause of the Treaty of Uccialli, there arose a characteristic misunderstanding. The Abyssinian text, which was the only one actually signed, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, shall be at liberty to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments." The Italian translation, which was made in Italy, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, consents to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments."

The treaty was signed May 2, 1889. October 12, 1889, Crispi notified the powers by circular letter under the general act of the Berlin Conference of 1884-1885 that Abyssinia was an Italian protectorate. On May 5, 1894, he signed agreements with England in which England recognized Abyssinia as an Italian protectorate. A map of Africa by treaty was published in 1894, with the sanction of the English Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which this rape of Abyssinia was recognized!

But both England and Italy had reckoned without their host.

There is no doubt but that the Treaty of Uccialli was a clumsy forgery of the same sort that had previously transferred sovereignty of a larger part of Africa from black men to white. Menelik, however, did not choose to submit. He not only denounced the treaty but he took up arms. He declared by proclamation: "Ethiopia has need of no one. She stretches out her hands to none but God." The French willingly supplied these hands with arms and munitions. The forces of Italy and Ethiopia met at Adowa, and Italy's army of 100,000 was annihilated March 1, 1896.

Suddenly, the headwaters of the Nile, the Nile Valley, the Egypt, the domination of the Red Sea, the path from the Cape-to-Cairo, - all these were in the hands of black men, - the black dervishes of the Sudan, and Menelik II, King of the Kings of Ethiopia and Emperor of Abyssinia. An English officer wrote: "If I were the Mahdi, I would make Egypt pay for every quart of water that runs down the Nile."

With Abyssinia in Italian hands, the British would have been willing to wait in order to clinch their eventual domination of the Nile Valley. She had in 1894 annexed Uganda, thus definitely curbing German expansion in East Africa. In 1895, the Jameson raid had taken place in South Africa as the first step toward a war destined to crush the Dutch and make South Africa a British province. The Cape-to-Cairo idea, fostered by Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes, had seized the imagination of the empire. An agreement with Leopold of Belgium even secured a perpetual lease of a large bloc of territory at the headwaters of the Nile, and filled in the gap between the Great Lakes. This so alarmed the French that this lease was eventually cancelled.

The French, thereupon, took a forward step, and determined to push from French Africa eastward to the Nile and send a French expedition through Abyssinia westward to the Nile, and establish claims which cut off the hinterland of Tripoli even if Italy annexed it, which she had long planned to do. Menelik gave aid and comfort, and in 1894, made a concession to the French to build a railway from Djibuti through the Harrar to Addis Abbaba and the White Nile. French officers trained the Abyssinian army. Great Britain warned France that she claimed the whole of the Nile Valley and would consider any attempt to dispute this claim as an unfriendly act. Paris, hesitated, and the Abyssinian expedition was called off.

But the Battle of Adowa changed the whole situation. Italy could no longer pull English chestnuts out of the first, and French plans were mainfest. Salisbury, again at the English helm, moved quickly. March 5, the news of Adowa reached England, and March 12, England suddenly learned that Chinese Gordon was a Christian martyr, who had been murdered by heathen. She ordered the conquest of the sudan. Kitchener, with Maxi-Nordenfeldt guns, moved up the Nile. He captured Khartum in September, and ordered the tomb of the dead Mahdi publicly desecrated.

England was not a minute too soon. That very month, Marchand, the Frenchman, was at Fashoda awaiting the French and Abyssinian expeditions from Abyssinia. Indeed, one Abyssinian expedition under a royal prince had already reached the river but had been decimated by fever. The other expedition under a French commander did not materialize. For a moment, the world stood still with World War in the air.

Congo, April 25, with instructions to march to the White Nile. They again arranged an Abyssinian expedition to join him. The idea was that the two expeditions should meet on the Nile and establish a French claim to the Upper Valley of the Nile. When Kitchener arrived, he would find the French and Abyssinians stretched across the Capte-to-Cairo path. The Abyssinian expedition failed through the negligence of the French governor of Djibuti. When Marchand reached Fashoda in 1898, there was no fortress and no expedition of French and Abyssinians from the east to support him. Kitchener proceeded south to meet Marchand and a small body of Senegalese soldiers. The sympathies of the world were with Marchand. War was imminent. But the French fleet was not equal to the British and the French army at Fashoda was greatly inferior to the British army. March 21, 1899, an Anglo-French declaration was issued, which gave the Nile Valley to Great Britain.

Imperial Italy remained intensely dissatisfied. Her treatment by France in the matter of Tunis and Tripoli, and by England, in the case of Abyssinia, threw her into the arms of Germany and Austria, and she became part of the Triple Alliance. By taking Tripoli from Turkey in 1911-1912, Italy had helped precipitate world-wide conflagration, and had gained for herself a strip of barren sand by "a perfect nightmare of horror...a veritable carnage." Nevertheless, on the eve of the World War, Prime Minister Salavdra declared that Italy's policy would be dictated by "Sacred Egoism". Thus, in 1914, Italy, holding herself aloof, offered herself to the highest bidder.

It is said that at one time France dangled the Port of Djibuti with its Abyssinian railway terminal before Italy, and even the Colony of Tunis in 1915. At any rate, in the secret treaty of London, it was expressly agreed by Great Britain, France, and Russia, not only that Italy was to receive large portions of Austrian territory, in event of victory, but that: (Article XIII. of the Treaty of London of April 26, 1915.)

"In the event of an extension of the French and British colonial possessions in Africa at the expense of Germany, France and Great Britain recognize to Italy in principle the right of demanding for herself certain compensations, in the form of an extension of her possessions in Eritrea, Somaliland, Libya, and the colonial districts bordering on French and British colonies."

Italy immediately entered the war on the side of the Allies, and started a lively discussion of future colonial development. For her entrance into the war, Italy paid a terrible toll. Six hundred thousand lay dead and a million were wounded. The country seethed with disillusion and discontent, and the Paris Conference, by ignoring the Treaty of London, gave Italy what she regarded as a "mutilated victory", despite the territory which she gained from Austria. As a result, the Socialists, who had opposed Italy's entrance in the war, captured the government in 1919, and the beginnings of proletarian revolution in the form of sydicalism appeared. Italy chose Fascism.

Confidence and faith in Italy, and peaceful submission to the burdens of war and oppression, were accomplished by a subtly conceived psychological onslaught, which revived in the minds of young Italy the glory of Rome and the expansion of colonial empire. For glory, it appealed to youth in its curiously illogical national hymn: "Youth, springtime of beauty! Fascism is the safeguard of our liberty." What could thrill Italy more than revenge for Adowa?

"I heard Mussolini say on one occasion, speaking from the balcony of the Chigi Palace on the Corso in Rome--this was before he moved over to the Palazzo Venezia - 'Camice Nere (Blackshirts) when you look at the map, you see that the island of Sicily is the southernmost limit of our empire. But I swear to you that the day will come when the island of Sicily will be the geographical center of our empire.*"

The history of Rome was invoked, and Mussolini began sabre-rattling on a tremendous scale, and particularly emphasized the fact that Italy proposed to have colonies where she could settle her expanding population, and that also that her population must expand. Moreover, Mussolini said frankly that Tripoli and Eritrea were not enough. "These two colonies alone cannot solve our population problem, mark this well." He emphasized the plight of the Italians in Tunis. There were ninety thousand of them against seventy-one thousand Frenchmen, and the French were threatening to turn Italian children into French citizens. Mussolini protested bitterly, and demanded a great navy to protect a future empire.

In the meantime, Abyssinia was bestirring herself. Menelik, the great emperor, died the year before the World War. He was succeeded by a daughter; and then by a grandson, whose hatred of Europeans and fanatical attitude on religion made him no fit instrument for a diplomatic role. Finally, Ras Tafari, a leading prince, was nominated as successor; he was crowned King in 1928 and Emperor, November 2,1930, amid the pomp of one of the oldest branches of the Christian Church. Significantly, he determined to call his country, "Ethiopia, the land of the Burnt Faces," and not Abyssinia, from the Semitic tribe of Habesh.

To the far-sighted, the coronation of Haile Selassie II.. presented at once foreboding and encouraging omens. He represented the beginning of a new era. Forces were at work to end the whole system of European aggression upon colored countries. In the formation of the League of Nations was the idea of a world tribunal where the lesser nations could at least be heard. The idea of the mandates was to put certain colonies under the guardianship of the League of Nations, and prevent at least the extremes of exploitation. In Abyssinia there seemed to lie the best chance for a new development. An unhampered tradition went back thousands of years that enabled these black men and brown to be proud of their color, their ancestry, their history. Surely, here was a chance to begin a new world.

For if Abyssinia thus represented a beginning of new things, it also represented a continuation of the old, and this fact, too, was clear at the coronation. Representatives of thirteen countries braved the difficulties of travel and were present at Addis Addaba. There was the Duke of Cloucester, son of the King of England; there was the Duke of Udine, son of the King of Italy; there was Marshal Franchet d'Esperey, representing France; and a royal prince of Japan. The British representative stood, always, at the emperor's right hand, and the Italian at his left. It looked almost like a fore-gathering of cormorants watching a feast, where each was seeing that one did not get all and each maneuvering for the largest possible share.

Haile Selassie II, was born in 1871, is by tradition the 384th King to sit upon the throne, and leaving out mere tradition, we know of at least 200 Abyssinian kings in historic times. He is a slight brown man with curly hair, dignified and serious, educated in France, and eager for the advance of his country. As Prince, he had visited England, France and the continent, and wished to come to the United States, but the United States did not invite him. He began sending a few Abyssinians to be educated abroad; he began to re-organize the system of justice, and tried to re-build the state in many ways.

There were difficulties. Some were internal; Abyssinia is two thousand years old with an unbroken tradition, strong feudal princes, old families, and inbred customs opposed to change. The emperor had to attack evils like domestic slavery slowly and with care. Yet in this case, European philanthropy, with rapacious commercialism back of it, hammered at the reformer and forced him to set a pace which time may prove far too fast for his slow changing nation. It is quite possible that the new emperor, by his inovations and European policy, has strained dangerously the allegiance of some of his powerful followers, linked as they are to ancient allegiance and hoary customs.

The international relations of Ethiopia, coupled with old efforts at economic intervention, made the situation of the country difficult. In 1906, the agreement between Great Britain, France and Italy to respect and preserve the integrity of Abyssinia was really designed to prevent industrial concessions made to one from injuring the claims of any of the others. The notes between Great Britain and Italy in 1925, secretly divided Ethiopia into spheres of influence with Great Britain decminant in the regions of Lake Tsana and the headwaters of the Nile, and Italy along the borders of Eritrea and Somaliland. Ethiopia brought this treaty to the notice of the League of Nations. Mussolini explained, and MacDonald half apologised; and yet later when certain American engineers in 1927 signed a $20,000,000 contract to dam the waters of Lake Tsana, England insisted upon her prior rights, and by quiet diplomacy broke the contract.

The murder of the prime minister of Austria by the German Nazis halted an understanding between France and Italy which might have forced France and England to disgorge the German colonies in Africa and grant Italy's African demands in full. But Italy feared

Pan Germany more than France; France feared Hitler's militarism; and England feared German industrial competition.

Laval and Mussolini renewed the old efforts to come to an understanding. Exactly what their written understanding was has not been published, but it is pretty clear from subsequent events. Some concessions were made as to Italians in Tunis, and some territorial concessions in the hinterland of Tripoli, probably not large in actual extent, but important in opening one of the main trade routes from Lake Chad to Tripoli.

The main concession undoubtedly was in Abyssinia, and that concession consisted, first, in promising to keep hands off if Mussolini should make war upon Abyssinia, and seize any part of her territory. Secondly, to grant Italian capital additional power in Abyssinia. It is rumored that three thousand shares of the Djibuti Railroad have been turned over to Italy, and that a rectification of frontier between Eritrea and French Somaliland has been so arranged as to give Italy direct access to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb.

All this means a tighter economic cordon around Ethiopia to make her access to foreign markets more difficult, and to keep out capital from countries other than Italy, Great Britain, and France. Behind this movement, and tending to strengthen the common interests of these imperial powers, are two menaces from Asia; the new independence of the kingdom of the Arabs opposite Abyssinia across the Red Sea. At best this is going to cut off Italian trade with Eritrea, and at worst, it is going to encourage every Arab in North Africa to remember the trail of blood through which Italy walked to secure the barren victory of Tripoli. Again, the recent appearance of Japan in Abyssinian industrial development, has alarmed the West. It is rumored that Japan has already captured one-third of the commerce of Abyssinia, and the French charge that the Japanese wish to equip Ethiopia industrially, and furnish technical help for her new machines.

Italy then mobilizes against Ethiopia; in spite of the League of Nations; in spite of her treaty of arbitration; in spite of reported efforts at conciliation and adjustment, her troops are piling soldiers and equipment into Eritrea. She intends to seize Ethiopian territory on one pretext or another, to secure oil, and to draw a tighter broad base of economic and military aggression about her. She may not attempt complete subjugation - the inner citadel is very strong; but annexation of the plateau and economic strangulation can accomplish what direct force cannot do immediately.

Here, then, is war again. That war which has never ceased since the World War, but now comes nearer the European circle where its sparks are increasingly dangerous. Moreover, let no one think that the demand of Italy in Africa is the end of demands. The reason that Germany refuses to reveal her ultimate objects is because there is still one unmentioned subject, and that is, German colonies, and particularly German colonies in Africa, since the attitude and power of Japan makes colonial aggression in Asia unhealthful just now.

Hitler in his Saar speech, intimated that the work of redeeming German colonies had not been finished, and he doubtless used the word "colony" advisedly. That Germany is going to demand the return of German Africa, before she consents to raise the war menace in Europe, is absolutely certain. The scramble, therefore, in Africa, for cheap labor and cheap war material is not ended.

It helped start World War in 1914, and it may easily do it again in our day. All this is not pleasant reading for those who pin their faither on European civilization - the Christian religion and the superiority of the white race. Yet these are the bare facts. They might be differently interpreted, and variously supplemented, but in it must remain a story of selfish and short-sighted cruelty, deception and theft, with black men mainly victims and white men usually aggressors.

What of the future? We can envisage three possible results of the present program of Mussolini:

1. The civilized world, remembering the World War and the promise of the League of Nations, not forgetting a series of treaties and understandings, will refuse to allow Italy to attack Ethiopia or curtail her independence.
2. Italy will attack and gradully subdue Ethiopia and make her into an Italian colony and protectorate.
3. Ethiopia will repulse Italy or make conquest so difficult that she will retain her independence.

The probabilities are that Italy, by sheer weight of armament and the inactivity of Europe, will subdue Ethiopia. If this happens it will be a costly victory, both for Italy and the white world. There will be not only the cost in debt, death and hate, but the whole colored world, - India, China and Japan, Africa in Africa and America, and all the South Seas and Indian South America, - all that vast mass of men who have felt the oppression and insults, the slavery and exploitation of white folk will say: "I told you so!" There is no faith in them even toward each other. They do not believe in Christianity and they will never voluntarily recognize the essential equality of human beings or surrender the idea of dominating the majority of men for their own selfish ends. Japan was right. The only path to freedom and equality is force and force to the uttermost. Nor will this indefensible aggression, prove to the dark peoples their weakness; rather it will point the path to strength: understanding between Japan and China, India need no longer hesitate between passiveness and rebellion. Even Africa will realize that Europe holds Africa in leash today mainly with African troops, a religion of humility, vauge hopes and skillfully encouraged jealousies.

One of these days, the very troops by which Europe holds Africa, may cease to play the part so long assigned them. It only needs the guiding thought and the great leader. And then with all that Europe can do in airplane, tank and war gun, let the world remember that a group of determined black men, armed even partially with modern technique, could take their stand on the snow-swept heights of Ethiopia, within sight of the Equator, and in the midst of the black world, and shake the centers of European imperialism.

Suppose, however, that turning from this dreer and age-old prospect of blood and waste, we contemplate the possibility that Ethiopia, helped by courage, and terrain, secret European sympathy or even revolution in Italy, succeeds in repulsing Italy or even holding her months in check. This does not now seem probable, but it is possible. The result would be a grim chorus from the dark worlds: the spell of Europe is broken. It is the beginning of the end. Europe can no longer depend on brute force to make serfs of Yellow, Black and Brown.

Such reasoning may be fallacious and fail to accord Europe and the white race due credit for bringing the mass of men into the circle of human culture. Yet its logic is inevitable: Italy has forced the world into a position that, win race hate will increase. And if Ethiopia is not defeated, the white world will receive a check comparable to the defeat of Russia by Japan.

Finally, if as now seems incredible, but is not beyond possibility, the better public opinion of the white world, and its obvious interests, absolutely refuses to allow this brazen public banditry to proceed; if England, France and America hold Italians firmly in check without too deadly impairment of Ethiopian independence; if the Pope of Rome refuses further to quibble and Protestant missions insist on practising their preaching, while Pacifists fight for Peace - in this improbable event, a new hope and faith will course through the veins of men; a new patience with selfishness and wrong; a new hatred the stupidity of war and a new urge to Humanity.

By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

The hands which the Land of Burnt Faces is today stretching forth to the God of Things-that-be are both physical and spiritual; and both today and yesterday they have twined gnarled fingers about the very roots of the world. Physically Ethiopia's fingers are those rough mountain masses of North East Africa which form the defensive rampart of the continent and against which historically Egypt and Persia, Turk an Egyptian, British, French and Italian have so far hammered in vain.

Abyssinia is a pear-shaped mountain mass, cut into island-like sections which are separated by deep gorges and ravines. It is nearly as large as France and Spain combined, and looms high on the northwest toward the Valley of the Nile, slopes on the southwest toward the Great Lakes, and drops on the east to the sea. It rises in three great terraces: a plane of rocky strata; a plateau about eight thousand feet above the sea, and above this snow-capped mountains which sometimes rise nearly another eight thousand feet. "It looks," says the traveller, "like a storm-tossed sea, suddenly solidified."

In these highlands, both the Blue Nile and the Atbara rise, and thus Abyssinia commands a full half of the waters of the Nile. It was a German who said that the power which held the Abyssinian highlands could dominate the imperialism of Europe in Africa. On these stark physical facts is built a spiritual history almost as old as the world and yet half forgotten even in this recent revival of strained interest in this Land of the Blacks.

Why for instance is Haile Selassie, Emperor of "Ethiopia" and not of Abyssinia as his predecessors often called themselves? Abyssinia is a word of Semitic origin, but Ethiopia is Negro. Look at the pictures of Abyssinians now widely current. They are as Negroid as American Negroes. If there is a black race they belong to it. Of course, there are and never were any "pure" Negroes any more than there are "pure" whites or "pure" yellows. Humanity is mixed to its bones. But in th rough and practical assignment of mankind to three divisions, the Ethiopians belong to the black race.

And always did. Abyssinia is the fourth great step of dark human culture in North East Africa backward--or shall we say forward--from the Mediterranean to the Great Lakes, paralleling perhaps a pre-historic movement northward; and every step has shaken the world. Physically the steps have been almost equal--500 miles from the Nile delta to the First Cataract. Then 500 miles from Napata to Meroe; and at last 500 miles from the capital of the Candaces and their shield-like island formed by the Atbara and Blue Nile, to Axum and Adowa where the retreat--or advance--of black Africa ended until 1935.

All this vast movement and development was stretched over more than 5,000 years, but it affected essentially similar, though not identical groups of African peoples: the mulattoes of Egypt, more and more drowned in the black blood from the South, which ever threatened and gave them sanctuary. This southern land, called from the beginning "Ethiopia", had its surging boundaries finally fastened at the First Cataract, until these gates became an opening and refuge where Egypt retreated before Persia; and Ethiopia, eventually, became a new and conquering Egypt which ruled the Nile valley from Napata and was the greatest power in the western world from 750 to 600 B.C.

But Asia and the Desert pressed South again, until at Meroe, 500 further miles South and 500 years later, Ethiopia developed a new capital and new dynasties which resisted the power of Greece, Rome and Arabia. Then the land of the Blacks crumpled again, before black foes sweeping in from the forests of the west, before the New Mohammedianism pressing relentlessly down from the north, before the ever encroaching desert.

Ethiopia again retreating took her stand with her back against the last great ramparts of the east--the Hills of Abyssinia. Here the black hordes of the region of the Great Lakes had been infiltrated with Semitic blood from the shores of the Red Sea, where Asiatic upheavals drove Jews and Arabs before them and hurled remnants on the African shores. The trading station at Axum, near modern Adowa, was a gateway for merchants and brought Ethiopia and Abyssinia in contact.

The Hands of Ethiopia.

This kingdom took its name, "Abyssinia" from a Semitic tribe, "Habesh"; but the people of Habesh were neither contented nor safe in being simply Abyssinians. Trade and defense forced them toward ancient Ethiopia, and they disputed with the Arabs and Nubians over the domination of the island of Meroe. Here they claimed sovereignty as early as 356 A.D., and actually destroyed the capital a century later. Greek and Roman influence filtered into Abyssinia from the East, and trade made Axum flourish. Myths of its obscure origin began to arise; the Jewish myth of descent of its royal house from Solomon; the Negro myth of its descent from Aethiopis, whose tomb was pointed out at Axum.

The new Christian religion came to Abyssinia in the Fourth Century after Christ, and thus a third great center of Christianity, in contrast to Rome and Constantinople, was established. Then came the red wave of conquest from the North, and the history of Abyssinia becomes dim and shadowy. As Gibbons has written, "Encompassed by her enemies, Ethiopia slept a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom she was forgotten."

It was not until the 16th Century that the Portuguese again brought Abyssinia to the attention of the world, by locating there the source of the legend of Prester John, that ghostly Christian ruler, who during the Middl Ages was supposed to be reigning in Africa or India.

This is historically the land that in 1935 came suddenly to the world's attention as a threat of imminent world war, as a test of international agreement, as a curious crisis in the Christian religion, and above all, as threatening a new orientation in the world problems of race and color.

To understand this, let us note the changes in the color problem before and since the world war. The medieval world had no real race problems. Its human problems were problems of nationality and culture and of religion, and it was only as the new economy of a growing population demanded a laboring class that this class tended here and there to be composed of members of races who were not a part of the main stock. Thus out of the old feudalism and serfdom there grew a new agriculture which more and more in America had a laboring class belonging to a distinct race, an inner labor problem of the relations of this enslaved race to the mass of the nation arose. The attempt, however, to expand this application of a sort of factory system to the new land and the new groups met difficulty. First, the opposition of right-thinking men and women to the methods of slave trading; and secondly, the Democratic movement to lift the laboring classes. With the changes that stopped the slave trade and largely emancipated the slaves, the problems of race did not disappear, but simply transformed themselves. Those nations like Spain, Portugal, France and Great Britain had dominated colonies where they stole and sold slaves. Also, for the most part, had dominions where they traded in the results of native labor. And it was this part of their empire that began to develop and to transform the other parts, so that Portuguese, French and British Colonial Empires became places where native labor was exploited and raw material exported. No problem of race and color need have arisen under such circumstances had there not been so wide a difference in the cultural level of the colonial peoples and the home group. It was a temptation too strong for humankind to withstand to believe that labor differences, based on differences of color and descent, made exploitation of colonies necessary and profitable. When, of course, as a matter of fact, the opposite was the truth; namely, that the profit from exploitation was the main reason of the belief in labor difference.

When Germany, Belgium and Italy saw the immense economic advantage and chances for profit which colonies furnished, they were determined to construct and enlarge their own colonial domain. Indeed, if they must follow the path of modern industrial imperialism, they must have colonies or die. The continents of Asia, Africa and South America were the opposite areas of expansion, but in differing ways. Asia was the seat of old civilizations and the dominion of China, Japan and India involved of influence and dominance and control through the investment of capital rather than actual annexation and direct rule. Nevertheless, before the world war it seemed probable that the larger part of Asia would eventually come under more or less direct European dominance. Japan undertook her own development and for a while held the anomolus condition of being a colored nation not under white rule.

In South America, the rich, indignous white population and the white European immigration, together with the distant and threatening attitude of the United States, made it unlikely, if not impossible, for Europe to exercise control except through investment and military and naval power. The Indian population in South and Central America became, therefore, peons and laborers against whom racial differences existed but not so strongly as in Africa and Asia. In Africa, on the other hand, and in the West Indies, the policy was absolutely to dominate the native labor, pay it low wages, to give it little or no political control and small amounts of education or industrial training and to make the object distinctly and openly a matter of getting the largest profit out of the laboring class.

In India, the great mass of poverty-stricken workers were subjected to the combined dominance of British investors and native brains. The main difficulty was a possibility of subjecting so large a mass of laborers to so small a number of exploiters.

There were several local variations of this economic race problem. In the United States, chiefly in the South, a group of eight or ten million former slaves formed a laboring class with nominal rights of free laborers, but actual subjection to caste. In the West Indies, both British and French, there was a similar condition, except that the exploiting capitalists recruited their ranks with numbers of the rich natives. Three black countries were nominally free: Haiti, by revolution, Liberia, by sentiment, and Ethiopia as a strange survival of one of the most ancient human states.

Across all this economic arrangement buttressed and rationalised by theories of race and color, ran the effort of the Christian religion to spread its propaganda among the natives. It forms one of the most astonishing and baffling phenomena of modern times and makes it almost impossible to argue about race problems because of the contradictory facts. It is, for instance, undoubtedly true, that Christian missions were a great factor in the civilisation of African and American Negroes and American Negroes and American Indians and that they exercised some influence in Asia. On the other hand, there is also not the slightest doubt that industry and economic exploitation continually used Christianity as a smoke-screen in order to reduce the natives to submission and to keep them from revolt. Sometimes the Christian workers were entirely unconscious of their role in this respect. At other times, they revolutionized the whole system and argued that the best thing that could happen to the poor natives was to become docile Christian workers under the profit-makers of Europe. One can see cases of this sort in the work of the White Fathers in Uganda and both Protestant and Catholic missions in the Belgian Congo. This was the situation at the time of the world war. The world war made a revolution of thought with regard to relations of the races of man. Japan, instead of being regarded as the exception, was looked upon as the forerunner of a new arrangement of world power. It was no longer considered the destiny of the white race to rule the world, but to share the world with colored races who more and more would become autonomous. The question was as to how theoretically and how quickly they could assume self-rule. But it was generally admitted that when China got through the birth-pains of a new order, that she was going to be a self-ruling nation freed of white dominance. The movement for self-rule and dominion status in India became formidable and a small measure of self-government has recently been granted with the distinct idea and promise that in the long run India will become a self-ruling dominion within the British Empire. In the French and Portuguese colonies, the doors have been thrown open for the education of a native elite who would join the whites in ruling the colonies, but for the most part these colored rulers have themselves conceived their place as exploiters of the masses rather than leaders of those masses into larger liberty and power. Haiti, after being held in virtual conquest by the United States for twenty years, gained a nominal political freedom at the expense of shouldering an enormous debt which will keep her in chains to the United States for many generations. Liberia was practically mortgaged to the Firestone Rubber Company after being threatened with absorption by both France and Great Britain. Ethiopia, on the other hand, had kept comparatively free of debt, had kept her political autonomy, had begun to re-organize her ancient polity and was in many ways an example and a promise of what a native people untouched by modern exploitation and race prejudice would do. Across these new ideals strikes the program of Italy. It is a program conceived in the worse of the pre-war idiology. It accuses Ethiopia of savagery because she is not an industralized modern country and still has the institution of domestic slavery, forgetting that the slavery which survives in Ethiopia has nothing in common with the exploitation of slaves through the slave trade and the establishment of exploited industrial classes. Italy proposes openly to do what the other colonial powers have done and that is to take the land from the people, which is always the first stage toward poverty and political helplessness of the laboring class. It was accomplished in France, England and India during the Middle Ages. In Africa, it was one of the first measures by England, France, Portugual and Belgium to establish their economic power. In India and in China, it lies at the bottom of economic exploitation, but in most of these cases the process has been hidden by legal phrase and chicanery and by various excuses. It was seldom so openly and brazenly declared as in the present case when Italy simply says that she needs the land of the Ethiopians for her own peasants. What effect now will the Italian conquest of Ethiopia have upon the race problems of the world? First of all, there seems to be little doubt but that Africa and the demand for increased colonial exploitation there was the cause of the world war and the present danger of another and similar conflagation. Germany, before the world war, had a foothold in Asia and Asia Minor which seemed to promise settlement of her economic ambition, but she was not satisfied in Africa, she was not satisfied at her loss of Uganda and of chance to share in the exploitation of the Nile Valley. She undoubtedly proposed sooner or later to dispossess Belgium in the Valley of the Congo and she did not propose to allow France to monopolize Lake Chad and the Valley of the Niger. Her determination to accomplish more and more of these objects led her to welcome war.

Today, in somewhat the same way, Germany is determined to have back her colonial empire and Italy is determined to make France and England yield to her the indefinite but nevertheless clearly understood promises of the Treaty of London of 1915. Toward this end Italy and Germany got nearer alliance, but the movement was suddenly stopped by the attempt of the Nazis to take possession of Austria. This alarmed both France and Italy and threw them into each other arms, with the result that France withdrew her opposition to Italian expansion in Ethiopia. But if Italy takes her pounds of flesh by force, does anyone suppose that Germany will not soon make similar attempts. Then, too, there are fears raised up with these ambitions. The Arabs hate Italy for the ruthless slaughter through which she seized Triopli. Japan has gained a considerable part of Abyssinian trade and Indian merchants have invaded East Africa and raised so great a problem of political rights and civil liberty that their exclusion has been repeatedly asked by the white exploiters.

Italy then mobilizes against Ethiopia, in spite of the League of Nations, in spite of her treaty of arbitration, in spite of reported efforts at conciliation and adjustment, her troops are piling soldiers and equipment into Eritrea. She intends to seize Ethiopian territory. She may not attempt complete subjugation--the inner citadel is very strong; but annexation of the plateau and economic strangulation can accomplish what direct force cannot do immediately.

Here, then, is war again. That war which has never ceased since the World War, but now comes nearer the European circle where its sparks are increasingly dangerous. Moreover, let no one think that the demand of Italy in Africa is the end of demands. The reason that Germany refuses to reveal her ultimate objects is because there is still one unmentioned subject, and that is German colonies, and particularly German colonies in Africa, since the attitude and power of Japan makes colonial aggression in Asia unhealthful just now.

Hitler in his Saar speech intimated that the work of redeeming German colonies had not been finished; that Germany is going to demand the return of German Africa before she consents to lift the war menace in Europe, is absolutely certain. The scramble, therefore, in Africa for cheap labor and cheap war material is not ended. It helped start World War in 1914, and it may easily do it again in our day.

All this is not pleasant reading for those who pin their faith on European civilisation, the Christian religion and the superiority of the white race. Yet these are the bare facts. They might be differently interpreted and variously supplemented, but it must remain a story of selfish and short-sighted cruelty, deception and theft, with black men mainly victims and white men usually aggressors.

What of the future? We can envisage three possible results of the present program of Mussolini:

1. The civilized world, remembering the World War and the promise of the League of Nations, not forgetting a series of treaties and understandings, will refuse to allow Italy to attack Ethiopia or curtail her independence.

2. Italy will attack and gradually subdue Ethiopia and make her into an Italian colony and protectorate.

3. Ethiopia will repulse Italy or make conquest so difficult that she will retain her independence.

The probabilities are that Italy, by sheer weight of armament and the inactivity of Europe, will subdue Ethiopia. If this happens it will be a costly victory, both for Italy and the white world. There will be not only the cost in debt, death and hate, but the whole colored world,--India, China and Japan, Africa in Africa and in America, and all the South Sea and Indian South America,--all that vast mass of men who have felt the oppression and insults, the slavery and exploitation of white folk, will say: "I told you so! There is no faith in them even toward each other. They do not believe in Christianity and they will never voluntarily recognize the essential equality of human beings or surrender the idea of dominating the majority of men for their own selfish ends. Japan was right. The only path to freedom and equality is force, and force to the uttermost."

Nor will this indefensible aggression prove to the dark peoples their weakness; rather it will point the path to strength: understanding between Japan and China will close Asia to white aggression and India need no longer hesitate between passive resistance and open rebellion. Even black men will realize that Europe holds Africa in leash today mainly with African troops, a religion of humility, vague hopes and skillfully encouraged jealousies.. One of these days, the very troops by which Europe holds Africa may cease to play the part so long assigned them.

Suppose, however, that turning from this drear and age-old prospect of blood and waste, we contemplate the possibility that Ethiopia, helped by courage and terrain, secret European sympathy or open collapse in Italy, succeeds in repulsing Italy or even holding her for months in check. This does not now seem probable, but it is possible. The result would be a grim chorus from the dark worlds:

the spell of Europe is broken. It is the beginning of the end. Europe can no longer depend on brute force to make serfs of Yellow, Black and Brown.

Such reasoning may be fallacious and fail to accord Europe and the white race due credit for bringing the mass of men into the circle of human culture. Yet its logic is inevitable: Italy has forced the world into a position that if she wins, race hate will increase; while if Ethiopia is not defeated, the prestige of the white world will receive a check comparable to the defeat of Russia by Japan.

Finally, if as now seems incredible, but it not beyond possibility, the better public opinion of the white world, and its obvious interests, absolutely refuse to allow this brazen public banditry to proceed; if England, France and America hold Italians firmly in check without too deadly impairment of Ethiopian independence; if the Pope of Rome refuses further to quibble and Protestant missions insist on practicing their preaching, while Pacifists fight for Peace--in this improbable event, a new hope and faith will course through the veins of men; a new patience with selfishness and wrong; a new hatred of the stupidity of war and a new urge to Humanity.

There comes, finally, the question as to what the colored world thinks of this Italian venture. It is sufficient to say that black men and brown men have been aroused as seldom before. Mass meetings and attempted movements have taken place in Harlem. The Negroes of the West Indies have been excited in all the islands. In West Africa, despite the attempt of both France and England to keep down agitation, there is widespread and increasing interest. If there were any chance effectively to recruit men, money and machines of war among the one hundred millions of Africans outside of Ethiopia, the result would be enormous. The Union of South Africa is curiously alarmed and in contradictory ways. She is against Italian aggression, not because she is for the black Ethiopians, but because she fears the influence of war on black Africa. The natives of British Kenya, Uganda and the Sudan, standing as they do right next to the theater of war, must in any prolonged conflict, either be kept from participation by strong force, or the whole of East Africa will be aflame. The black world knows this is the last great and definite attempt of white Europe to secure the subjection of black men.

In the long run the effort is in vain and black men triumph

Every time Ethiopia has stretched out her hands, she has gripped the pillars of the world. Five thousand years before Christ and through the succeeding millinnaha, the upsurging of her moving masses against the culture of the Nile and Delta began a world conflict, resulting eventually in a drawn battle which made Ethiopia rather than Egypt the last protagonist of the West against the East before the emergence of Rome.

Against Ethiopia, Rome rallied Nubia and the Western Desert, driving Ethiopia down toward Meroe and Abyssinia. Here, buttressed by lofty ramparts, came a battle between Cross and Crescent fifteen centuries long. Finally, in our day, Ethiopia becomes the last stand of black Africa before white imperial industry which has all but enslaved the whole continent.

How does the darker world regard this 20th Century attempt of a white European nation to conquer the last independent African nation? Let us view the scene in detail.

Japan is regarded by all colored peoples as their logical leader; as the one non-white nation which has escaped forever the dominance, exploitation and studied insult of the white world. No matter what Japan does or how she does it, excuse leaps to the lips of colored thinkers. Has she seized Korea, Formosa and Manchuria? Is she penetrating Mongoria and widening her power in China itself? She simply has done what England has done in Honkong and France in Annan and what Russia, Germany and even the United States intended to do in China, if not in Japan herself. She has used by and large the same methods that white Europe has used, military power and commercial exploitation, and yet in all her action there has been this vast difference; her program can be no program of internal caste and race hate for the conquered, since racially they are one with the Japanese and are recognized as blood relatives. Their eventual assimilation and social equality presents no real problem. The dominance of the whites under these circumstances would have intensified racial differences and increased race hate. Conquest and exploitation are brute facts of the present era, yet if they must come, is it better that they come from your own kin who recognise common humanity and unity rather than from strangers who use science and religion to build a permanent racial caste?

The Hands of Ethiopia

To this Italy is giving a terrible answer. As the center of the Catholic Church and the home of the Renaissance of modern culture, she says flatly and openly: we are going to subdue an inferior people not for their good but for ours. We are going to take the lands of Ethiopia just as we took Somaliland and as England took the land of Kenya and religion of the Congo. We are going to reduce black men to landless serfs without political power and we are going to do this because we can and because no white nation dare stop us and no colored nation can stop us. The moral is: if any colored nation expects to maintain itself against white Europe it need appeal neither to religion or culture, but only to force and force to the uttermost. This is the vast motives back of Japan today and this excuse has the sympathy of the majority of mankind because that majority is colored.

Turning now to China, we have the pathetic instance of a nation trying to reform itself and pressed forward in new paths of advance. The internal difficulties in so ancient a land where custom is so strong and religion so real are endless. If left to herself, China could develop in the course of a half century. She would become one of the great and leading nations of the world, but no such opportunity would be given her if white Europe had its way. She would have been divided up, her political autonomy would have disappeared, her masses brutalessly exploited. The world war gave Japan its chance to replace the dominance of Europe, and China has today an opportunity to develop under the tutelage of Japan or to find refuge and help in the tutelage of Europe. What has Europe to offer? By Italy's action, she can offer nothing. There is no hope in a religion that murders its own co-religionists in Ethiopia, or in a culture that permits the overthrow of Ethiopia. Italy's action, therefore, practically deprives China of her last hope in Europe. She must follow Japan or chaos.

Further on, we have an equally difficult situation in India. A vast country of hundreds of millions of people who are the historical fruit of conquest, domination and caste, who have been conquered and held by England partly by means of direct military power and partly by the internal divisions of the Indians themselves due to rival rulers, differing religions and caste restrictions. On this has been built an industrial and commercial exploitation as complete and ruthless as the world has seen and its efficiency has not been marred by the education and culture which some Indians have absorbed and it was inevitable that this mass of people as they grew slowly in intelligence and writhing in poverty and internal difference, should look toward eventual independence and autonomy. Even with the opposing interests on the part of ruling Briton, the task would have been among the most difficult that a great nation could face. But when all the selfish interests of English investors did not wish an independent autonomous Indian, the task was well-nigh impossible. For its accomplishment, there came the program of Ghandi; passive resistance to the dominance of a great modern power, rather than determined revolt. It seemed fantastic. It was fantastic, but it was magnificent and for a time it almost rose to the point of showing the world a new way to accomplish progress. But its application proved impossible; first, because of the despotism and high-handed determination of English investors and rulers, and secondly, because it put upon a poor and harassed people a moral burden too great for successful bearing. Nevertheless, the better conscience of England forced some gesture and the result was that in the few days when Italy unfolded her program of conquest of Ethiopia, England offers India a step toward autonomy. It is a short step. It gives the Indians a voice in discussion and limited power to make the laws which govern them. But it hedges this about with every protection for English investments, with dominance of the military power, and with every possibility of using the divisions which are a part of Indian life to frustrate the growth of national unity and national opinion. The skillful use of religious differences between Mohammedans and Hindus, between the Upper Caste and the Untouchables, between the princes and the popular leaders, can make real progress in India negligible for many generations.

On top of this comes Italy's demonstration; the open and blatant accusation of inferiority based on color; the re-assertion of the divine right of white people to rule colored people, and the callus ignoring of the basic principles of that very religion which was supposed to have something to teach to Indians. The result of Italy's venture must be to destroy in India whatever faith there is in the justice of white Europe.

Let us turn now to the Africas, of which we may roughly distinguish eight: South Africa, British East Africa, British West Africa, French Africa and the Belgian Congo, Portuguese Africa, the British West Indies and the Negroes of the United States.

In South Africa, a small white minority of Dutch and English descent, armed with the power of capital, have not only already done much to reduce the native populations to landless workers, but proposed to further this by drastic means. They are going to make it increasingly difficult for Negroes to own land in any but strictly segregated areas which include some of the poorest and least accessable land. They are going to take the right to vote, even from those educated natives and mulattoes who have had the right in one province and continue to deny Negroes representation in the legislature. They are either not increasing it or are increasing very slowly the avenues for native education and they are determined to transform as far as possible the —— into workers, paid at the lowest wage, and forming a working caste below the white workers. Not only is the Union of South Africa going steadily forward with this program for its own black citizens, but it is enforcing it in the mandates which it holds under the League of Nations and bringing increasing pressure upon the empire, turning over to the Union of South Africa such dominions as the Rhodesias and the Basutoland. Thus consolidating and concentrating one policy of caste serfdom for all black men at the Southern end of the continent. With this program, quietly but definitely going forward, the open attack of Italy on Ethiopia bringings uneasiness to the South Africans. Italy proposes to do exactly what South Africa has done, but South Africa has not done it, has not worked with such frank open statement of aims, and she fears a resentment and disillusionment of her own blacks who are still being fed with the idea that Christianity and white civilisation is eventually going to do them justice. It is the more radical natives, to the few with education and to those who are beginning to think, the Italian program simply confirms their worst fears.

The dominance of Great Britain in East Africa is in three areas: Tanganyika, the former British East Africa, Kenya, the former German East Africa, and Uganda in Kenya, a system of seizing native land, denying the natives systematic education and all political rights has been persistently followed with little change, even under the labor government.

In Tanganyika and Uganda, there have been different degrees of celebrated English indirect rule, which is a method of supporting in power such native rulers as Shrves native customs, but practically stifles reform and progress and keeps education to a minimum. It brings peace but in most cases peace without development. This is the case in Tanganyika, but in Uganda where native development was considerable before the British came, there is always the chance that native development will burst its leading strings and go forward. Such peaceful and natural development, however, depends upon the faith which the people of Uganda have in the ultimate justice and philanthropic objects of the British. Such faith will not be increased by the action of the Italians and the hesitation of white Europe. This venture of African conquest must bring to the intelligent people of Uganda a memory of the outrageous way in which Protestants, Catholics and Mohammedans murdered natives in Uganda for the glory of God and eventually subdued and ravaged the country.

In British West Africa, there is the widest development of the principle of indirect rule reaching almost autonomy in some cases. Moreover, these colonies were established and had some political power before the policy of land sequestration had begun. Black West Africa, therefore, owns its own land and this gives it an economic power of unusual force. Nevertheless, the power of legislation is largely in the hands of the governors and the British Chambers of Commerce; a curious political development which has not been widely noticed, and there is in West Africa a continuous, open or partly concealed battle between the educated blacks and the exploited British. The British have lately tried to circumvent the black intelligencia by increasing the power of the chief and even to the extent of conferring a knighthood on two of them. Upon this situation, the action of Italy and the League of Nations will make a very unfavorable impression. The leaders of black West Africa, some who have been educated in the best English universities, will be convinced that no policy of submission and dependence upon the good-will of Europe will insure the eventual autonomy and economic justice in black Africa.

French Africa presents quite a different problem. The French have made every effort to make it possible for educated and ambitious natives to be absorbed into the French nation. Contrary to the British custom, the French schools are in blind alleys which keep natives from going too far in education, but are articulate with whole French high schools and academic system. This does not mean, however, that education

By W.E.Burghardt DuBois

The hands which the Land of Burnt Faces is today stretching forth to the gods of Olympus. That be are Abyssinia's hands both today and yesterday. Hands that have gnarled fingers about to very roots of the world. Especially Ethiopia's fingers are those mighty mountain ranges of N.E. Africa which are the defensive ramparts of the Continent and against which historically Egypt, Persia, Turkey, Carthage, Rome, Portugal & Colonial France as far drummed in vain.

The great ramparts of Abyssinia, soaring over seas of hills and mountains, form the greatest stronghold of all Africa, and the one part which has natural barriers for defense. It was a German who said that the power which held the Abyssinian highlands could dominate the imperialism of Europe in Africa.

Abyssinia is a pear-shaped mountain clump, cut into island-like sections which are separated by deep gorges and ravines. It is nearly as large as France and Spain combined, and looms high on the northwest toward the Valley of the Nile, on the southwest toward the Great Lakes, and on the east toward the sea. It rises in three great terraces: a plane of rocky strata; a plateau about eight thousand feet above the sea, and above this snow-capped mountains which sometimes rise nearly another eight thousand feet. "It looks," says the traveller, "like a storm-tossed sea, suddenly solidified."

The highest ramparts of this "citadel of Africa", lying as they do between the fever-infested South and the sun-baked Sudan, form a fortress which would be difficult even for a modern army to storm. It is to her mountains that Abyssinia owes the fact that her population is the only dark race in Africa not yet under European domination.

In these highlands, both the Blue Nile and the Atbara rise, and thus Abyssinia commands a full half of the waters of the Nile, and dominates the most direct route to the Nile Valley, the natural seaboard commands the

This kingdom took its name, "Abyssinia", from A Semitic tribe, "Habesh"; but the people of Habesh were neither contented nor safe in being simply Abyssinian. Trade and defense forced them toward ancient Ethiopia, and they disputed with the Arabs and Nubians over the domination of the island of Meroe. Here they claimed sovereignty as early as 356 A.D., and actually destroyed its capital a century later. Greek and Roman influence filtered into Abyssinia from the East, and trade made Axum flourish. Myths of its obscure origin began to arise: the Jewish myth of descent of its royal house from Solomon; the Negro myth of its descent from Aethiopis, whose tomb was pointed out at Axum.

The new Christian religion came to Abyssinia in the Fourth Century after Christ, and thus a third great center of Christianity, in contrast to Rome and Constantinople, was established. Then came the red wave of conquest from the North, and the history of Abyssinia becomes dim and shadowy. As Gibbons has written, "Encompassed by her enemies, Ethiopia slept a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom she was forgotten."

We catch glimpses of Abyssinian history here and there, as when in 525, at the request of the Emperor Justinian, the Abyssinians in sixty ships landed in Arabia, and captured Yemen, which they held for seventy-five years. In the Tenth Century, a certain Judith or Esther usurped the throne and the Falashas or black Jews, together with the native Zagwes, ruled.

It was not until the 16th Century that ~~the explorations of~~ the Portuguese again brought Abyssinia to the attention of the world, ~~The Portuguese appeared in Abyssinia in 1532 in time to aid them with 400 horsemen against the attacks of the Mohammedans, who had advanced as far south as Massowah.~~ and The Portuguese located in Abyssinia the source of the legend of Prester John, that ghostly Christian ruler who during the Middle Ages was supposed to be reigning in Africa or India, ~~and was~~

Abyssinia from early times was divided into a number of great districts, each administered by an hereditary chief called a Ras. Over these chiefs ruled a Negus, called a "King of Kings". When this overlord was a strong man, he ruled a powerful country. When he was weak, there was anarchy and confusion.

Such a period of disintegration was in progress about the middle of the 19th Century under Johannes; but he was succeeded in 1855 by the Emperor Theodore, a gifted, ruthless man, who came to the throne at the time when European imperialism was being organized and stretching out inquiring hands toward Asia and Africa. Scientists, traders, missionaries and adventurers wandered into Abyssinia. Theodore was well-disposed toward Europeans, and curious about their countries, but inevitable misunderstanding occurred, both in matters of etiquette and religion. "I know the tactics of European governments," said the observing Theodore, "when they try to acquire an Eastern state. First, they send out missionaries; then consuls to support the missionaries; then battalions to support the consuls. I am not a Rajah of Hindustan to be made mock of in that way."

~~But Theodore needed alliance and friendship with Europe, if they came to him~~ on honorable terms, to help organize his kingdom and beat back the threatened domination of Turks and Egyptians. He considered himself insulted, however, when the British and others after making fair promises, forgot all about him and ignored his overtures; in angry retaliation he seized and imprisoned the British minister and other Europeans.

Thereupon, in 1867, the British, taking advantage of a rebellion sent Napier with an army of 12,000 men to invade Abyssinia. ~~The expedition found Theodore busy with a rebellion, and the invading army had the support of these rebels.~~ Theodore was surrounded in his capital where the British troops with superior rifles killed two thousand Abyssinians, while losing only 20 whites. Theodore surrendered and released the prisoners, but Napier had promised the rebel chiefs to degrade and dethrone him. The English artillery opened fire on Magdala and Theodore shot himself dead. His body was allowed to be mutilated by a mob, while Napier received a peerage.

Anarchy ensued in Abyssinia between 1868 and 1872, with two rival claimants to the throne, Johannes of Tigre and Menelik of Shoa. ~~In the midst of this dispute,~~

This is fundamentally the Ethiopian crisis of 1935 comes suddenly to the world's attention as a threat of imminent armed war, as a test of international agreements, as a curious crisis in the Christian religion. How did this come about?

Italy became a united nation as the same other modern national unification was just beginning. Other nations were clear in the lead. United Kingdom whose wide colonial empire was becoming an imperial domain for investing capital in cheap colonial labor. Germany had as yet no colonial dreams. France had lost hers. Italy had two pressing problems of unification of the Catholic church to make modern Roma, and she had a tradition — almost she was hampered by a tradition of Imperial Rome. And if modern Rome had a claim of any kind of the world which it was not then, it was surely to Carthage — modern Tunis. France blundered into possession of Algeria as early as 1830 and at the Congress of Berlin in 1878, Bismarck & Salisbury, Beaconsfield offered her Tunis as a consolation prize after Sedan.

The scramble for Africa began & the nations engaged industrially took cleaner, fairer claims. France & England took dual control of Egypt in 1876. In 1881 France seized Tunis & England took possession of Egypt. Italy was aroused. Despite her pressing internal problems she felt forced to imperial aggression. In 1882 she seized Eritrea, a part of the natural coast line of Abyssinia but England & France blocked her further expansion south by seizing and it was not until 1892 that she forced, or got Zanzibar & got Italian Somaliland. Somaliland.

~~Foreshadowing~~ These imperial ventures of Peking stirred little Ethiopia. The Abyssinian highlanders cared little about the Coast & took no note of its scramble; but the whole situation changed when native rebellion arose in Egypt & the Sudan, Sudan.

.. Egypt was groaning under the debt which had been deliberately encouraged by France and England. Her rulers, who had squandered the proceeds, sought to keep up the interest by ruinous and exhaustive taxation. In desperation, the natives rebelled. Ahmed Arabi, a mulatto colonel, led a successful revolt but the English turned their guns upon Alexandria, and defeated Araby. This left the former rulers in nominal control of the whole of Egypt but in actual control of the Sudan, while the English held the real power along the Lower Nile.

~~Before~~ the Araby rebellion and the debts in the Sudan; in 1878, the mulatto Rabah had swept through the Bahr-El-Ghazel and the regions south of Lake Chad, when there arose a greater leader and a vaster motif. Mohammed Ahmed, son of a priest in Dongola, had established headquarters 150 miles above Khartum. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, majestic black man, with great eyes. He had visions. Disciples gathered around him, and eventually he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammedan revelation.

The country, groaning under misrule, went into the throes of a religious crusade against Egypt. A holy war was proclaimed, and a strong army organized. The Mahdi put down blasphemy, feasting, drinking, smoking and swearing. Thousands followed him. The Egyptians in 1883 sent an army of 10,000 under the Englishman, Hicks Pasha. They were annihiliated, with only 300 left alive. Kordofan, Dafur and the Bahr-El-Ghazel surrendered. Only a German, Emin Pasha, still upheld Egyptian power down in the Equatorial provinces next to Uganda. By the end of 1883, the Mahdi was master of a territory equal to Spain, France and Germany, and his army was closing in on Khartum, the capital of the Sudan. Ancient Ethiopia lived again

8) England hesitated. She still had the Liberal Gladstone & Gladstone even went so far as to say that the Sudanese were "rightly struggling & to free". But his "little Englanders" were highly growing & expanding imperialism & as Chamberlain put it — "Empire is Commerce."

~~Late in 1884,~~ The scramble for Africa became bitter. England was encroaching upon the Portuguese colonies; Germany had appeared in the field; France was at work in North Africa. France, England and Italy had seized the coast of Abyssinia, and in the vast Valley of the Congo, comprising the whole center of Africa, Little Belgium had proposed an international state. An European conference to settle the rules of the game for the further looting of Africa seemed necessary. It came together in Berlin in November, 1884, and lasted through February, 1885. ~~The United States was represented.~~ The Congo was recognized not as an international state but as the personal property of the King of Belgium. Certain rules of procedure for the further seizure of Africa were adopted, and before the conference was ended, the German Colonial Party forced Bismark's hand; seized Zanzibar and East Africa, and appeared as a full-fledged African colonial power.

Khartoum fell.)

For thirteen years, the Mahdi and his successor, the Khalifa, ruled in the Sudan. Thus, the whole of the Sudan was lost to Egypt and England. The Egyptian garrisonson the northern border of Abyssinian were finally withdrawn in 1886, and French, British and Italian possessions on the coast were in danger of being overwhelmed by the Mahdi.

9) The English Tories, returned to power in June 1885, were not attack dare attack the Mahdi, but resorted to a web of diplomacy which entangles England today. She signed a treaty of alliance with Johannes II of Abyssinia & thus enlisted his aid to keep the Mahdi from the coast. Turning on top of this she suggested that Italy seize the port of Massowah which belonged to Abyssinia.

To hand over to the Italians Massowah which belonged to the Abyssinians and to which Italy had no shadow of claim was an extraordinary breach of faith. Italy proceeded to take Massowah, as Giolitti says, as "a consolation prize," having been cheated out of Tunis, held back in Tripoli; out-manoeuvered both at the Congress of Berlin and the Berlin Conference; as well as losing her chance to participate in Egypt.

Once having placed her foot in Massowah, Italy proceeded to make alliance with Johannes' chief enemy, Menelik of Shoa, a pretender to the Abyssinian throne. Johannes found himself between two enemies, Italy and the Khalifa, and eventually was killed in battle by the latter in 1889. Immediately, Menelik proclaimed himself

King of Kings, and in May signed with the Italians the celebrated treaty of Uecialli.

To prove his gratitude to the Italians for their alliance and help with the armies, Menelik ceded Italy the territory which they had already seized. But the Italians, drunk with new ambition, swept on, calmly crossed into Abyssinia, and toward the end of 1889, seized Adua, while Menelik was busily subduing his enemies. They even penetrated into the Harrar, the trading region inland from the coast, thus coming into direct dispute, not only with Abyssinia, but with the claims of France and Great Britain. Thereupon, France and Great Britain made a secret treaty which allowed them to oppose Italy's advance if they pleased; a treaty which again put Great Britain in the unenviable position of "double-crossing" Italy, just as they had previously deceived Abyssinia.

This looked like a rare opportunity for German imperialism. Between German East Africa and the Egyptian Sudan, lay the great territory of Uganda, where Catholics, Protestants and Mohammedans had been merrily cutting each others throats in their efforts to convert the heathen. The Germans pushed warily up into this country, while shut up in the Equatorial provincesof the Sudan was the German Emin Pasha. Germany determined to rescue him, while England spent $145,000 on the Stanley expedition. Both nations were seeking to fall heir to Egypt in Central Africa. England and Stanley arrived first, and found Emin unwilling to be "rescued." He wanted to hold these provinces and turn them over to Germany. The Khalifa, however, was pressing him hard, and when Stanley appeared in 1888, Emin reluctantly followed him, and they met Karl Peters and the German expedition which had been busily engaged in making treaties with the local chiefs for German expansion. Emin, with his black wife and mulatto daughter, finally arrived at Zanzibar, where he accepted the post under the German administration in East Africa. In 1891 the British Ro[illegible]

10/ Meantime the stage was ~~was~~ set for Italy's final coup. In the seventeenth clause of the Treaty of Uccialli, there arose a characteristic misunderstanding. The Abyssinian text, which was the only one actually signed, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, shall be at liberty to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments." The Italian translation, whichwas made in Italy, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, consents to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments."

The treaty was signed May 2, 1889. ~~October 1, 1889, there was an additional treaty by which Menelik was to receive a loan of four million lire from an Italian bank under the guaranty of the Italian government, and on security of the Harrar Custom-House.~~ October 12, 1889, Crispi notified the powers by circular letter under the general act of the Berlin Conference of 1884-1885 that Abyssinia was an Italian protectorate. On May 5, 1894, he signed agreements with England in which England recognized Abyssinia as an Italian protectorate. A map of Africa by treaty was published in 1894, with the sanction of the English Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which this rape of Abyssinia was recognized!

But both England and Italy had reckoned without their host. There is no doubt but that the Treaty of Uccialli was a clumsy forgery of the same sort that had previously transferred sovereignty of a larger part of Africa from black men to white. Menelik, however, did not choose to submit. He not only denounced the treaty but he took up arms. He declared by proclamation: "Ethiopia has need of no one. She stretches out her hands to none but God."

The French supplied Menelik willingly with arms and munitions. The forces of Italy and Ethiopia met at Adowa, and Italy's army of forty thousand was anniliated March 1, 1896.

Suddenly, the headwaters of the Nile, the Nile Valley, and Egypt, the domination of the Red Sea, the path from the Cape-to-Cairo, all these were in the hands of black men,--the black dervishes of the Sudan, and Menelik II., King of the Kings of Ethiopia and Emperor of Abyssinia. An English officer wrote: "If I were the Mahdi, I would make Egypt pay for every quart of water that runs down the Nile."

11) With Abyssinia in Italian hands, the British were willing to make an order & climax their eventual domination of the Nile valley

She had in 1894 annexed Uganda, thus definitely curbing German expansion in East Africa. In 1895, the Jameson raid had taken place in South Africa as the first step toward a war destined to crush the Dutch and make South Africa a British province. The Cape-to-Cairo idea, fosteredby Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes, had seized the immagination of the empire. An Agreement ~~was made~~ with Leopold of Belgium ~~which~~ even secured a perpetual lease of a large bloc of territory at the headwaters of the Nile, and filled in the gap between the Great Lakes. This so alarmed the French that this lease was eventually Cancelled

The French, thereupon, took a forward step, and determined to push from French Africa eastward to the Nile and send a French expedition through Abyssinia westward to the Nile. Menelik gave aid and comfort, and in 1894, made a concession to the French to build a rail ay from Djibuti through the Harrar to Addis Abbaba and the White Nile. French officers trained the Abyssinian army. Great Britain warned France that she claimed the whole of the Nile Valley and would consider any attempt to dispute this claim as an unfriendly act. Paris, hesitated, and the Abyssinian expedition was called off.

But the Battle of Adowa changed the whole situation. Italy could no longer pull English chestnuts out of the fire, and French plans were manifest. Salisbury, again at the English helm, moved quickly. March 5, the news of Adowa reached England, and March 12, England suddenly learned that Chinese Gordon was a Christian martyr, who had been murdered by heathens. She ordered the conquest of the Sudan. Kitchener, with Maxim-Nordenfeldt guns, moved up the Nile. He captured Khartum in September, and ordered the tomb of the dead Mahdi publicly desecrated.

England was not a minute too soon. That very month, Marchand, the Frenchman, was at Fashoda awaiting the French and Abyssinian expeditions from Abyssinia. Indeed, one Abyssinian expedition under a royal prince had already reached the river but had been decimated by fever. The other expedition under a French commander did not materialize. For a moment, the world stood still with world war in the air.

The French had dispatched Captain Marchand to the French Congo April 25, with instructions to march to the White Nile. They again arranged an Abyssinian expedition to join him. The idea was that the two expeditions should meet on the Nile and establish a French claim to the Upper Valley of the Nile. When Kitchener arrived, he would find the French and Abyssinians stretched across the Cape-to-Cairo path. The Abyssinian expedition failed through the negligence of the French governor of Djibuti. When Marchand reached Fashoda in 1898, there was nofortress and no expedition of French and Abyssinians from the east to support him. Kitchener proceeded south to meet Marchand and a small body of Senegalese soldiers. The sympathies of the world were with Marchand. War was imminent. But the French fleet was not equal to the British and the French army at Fashoda was greatly inferior to the British army. March 21, 1899, an Anglo-French declaration was issued, which gave the Nile Valley to Great Britain.

Imperial Italy remained intensely dissatisfied.

Her treatment by France in the matter of Tunis and Tripoli, and by England, in the case of Abyssinia, threw her into the arms of Germany and Austria, and she became part of the Triple Alliance. By taking Tripoli from Turkey in 1911-

1912, Italy had helped precipitate ~~there~~ world-wide conflagration, and had gained for herself a strip of barren sand by "a perfect nightmare of horror...a veritable carnage." Nevertheless, on the eve of the World War, Prime Minister Salavdra declared that Italy's policy would be dictated by "Sacred Egoism". Thus, in 1914, Italy, holding herself aloof, offered herself to the highest bidder.

It is said that at one time France dangled the Port of Djibuti with its Abyssinian railway terminal before Italy, and even the Colony of Tunis in 1915. At any rate, in the secret treaty of London, it was expressly agreed by Great Britain, France, and Russia, not only that Italy was to receive large portions of Austrian territory in event of victory, but that: (Article XIII. of the Treaty of London of April 26, 1915.)

"In the event of an extension of the French and British colonial possessions in Africa at the expense of Germany, France and Great Britain recognize to Italy in principle the right of demanding for herself certain compensations, in the form of an extnsion of her possessions in Eritrea, Somaliland, Libya, and the colonial districts bordering on French and British colonies."

Italy immediately entered the war on the side of the Allies, and started a lively discussion of future colonial development [illegible]

For her entrance into the war, Italy paid a terrible toll. Six hundred thousand lay dead and a million were wounded. The country seethed with disillusion and discontent, and the Paris Conference, by ignoring the Treaty of London, gave Italy what she regarded as a "mutilated victory", despite the territory which she gained from Austria. As a result, the Socialists, who had opposed Italy's entrance in the war, captured the government in 1919, and the beginnings of proletarian revolution in the form of sydicalism appeared. ~~Factories were seized and labor reached for control.~~

Italy must choose and choose quickly between a redistribution of wealth and economic power dictated by the working classes, or a re-organization of industry in the interests of capital but so far restrained that the mass of workers could be kept at labor in peaceful subjection. ~~The resultant Fascism, started by the march on Rome~~ Italy chose Fascism.

in 1922, and gradually developed, faced a tremendous task. It must keep peace, restore confidence, curb the power of capital, furnish more capital, and insure profits. These contradictory objects could be carried out ~~only if the first could be continuously assured, and the last realized in fact.~~ Confidence and faith in Italy, and peaceful submission to the burdens of war and oppression, were accomplished by a subtly conceived psychological onslaught, which revived in the minds of young Italy the glory of Rome and the expansion of colonial empire. For glory, it appealed to youth in its curiously illogical national hymn: "Youth, springtime of beauty! Fascism is the safeguard of our liberty." What could thrill Italy more than revenge for Adowa?

The history of Rome was invoked, and Mussolini began sabre-rattling on a tremendous scale, and particularly emphasized the fact that Italy proposed to have colonies where she could settle her expanding population, and that also that her population must expand. ~~The millions of Italians who had immigrated to North and South America must in the future find homes under the Italian flag.~~ Moreover, Mussolini said frankly that Tripoli and Eritrea were not enough. "These two colonies alone cannot solve our population problem, mark this well." He emphasized the plight of the Italians in Tunis. There were ninety thousand of them against seventy-one thousand Frenchmen, and the French were threatening to turn Italian children into French citizens. Mussolini protested bitterly, and demanded a great navy to protect a future empire.

In the meantime, Abyssinia was bestirring herself. Menelik, the great emperor, died the year before the World War. He was succeeded by a daughter, and then by a grandson, whose hatred of Europeans and fanatical attitude on religion made him no fit instrument for a diplomatic role. Finally, Ras Tafari, a leading prince, was nominated as successor; he was crowned King in 1928 and Emperor, November 2, 1930, amid the pomp of one of the oldest branches of the Christian Church. Significantly, he determined to call his country "Ethiopia, the land of the Burnt Faces," and not Abyssinia, from the Semitic tribe of Habesh. To the far-sighted, the coronation of Haile Selassie II., presented at once foreboding and encouraging omens. He represented the beginning of a new era. Forces were at work to end the whole system of European aggression upon colored countries. In the formation of the League of Nations was the idea of a world tribunal where the lesser nations could at least be heard. The idea of the mandates was to put certain colonies under the guarandianship of the League of Nations, and prevent at least the extremes of exploitation. In Abyssinia there seemed to lie the best chance for a new development. An unhampered tradition went back thousands of years that enabled these black men and brown to be proud of their color, their ancestry, their history. Surely, here was a chance to begin a new world.

For if Abyssinia thus represented a beginning of new things, it also represented a continuation of the old, and this fact, too, was clear at the coronation. Representatives of thirteen countries braved the difficulties of travel and were present at Addis Addaba. There was the Duke of Glouster, son of the King of England; there was the Duke of Udine, son of the King of Italy; there was Marshal Franchet d'Esperey, representing France; and a royal prince of Japan. The British representative stood, always, at the emperor's right hand, and the Italian at his left. It looked almost like a foregathering of cormorants watching a feast, where each was seeing that one did not get all and each maneuvering for the largest possible share.

~~Meantime, the new Emperor, born in 1891, and much travelled in Europe, was evidently an enlightened man who proposed to make Abyssinia a modern country. He~~

Haile Selassie II. is by tradition the 384th King to sit upon the throne, and leaving out more tradition, we know of at least 200 Abyssinian kings in historic times.

He is a slight
~~a little~~ brown man with curly hair, dignified and serious, educated in France, and eager for the advance of his country. As Prince, he had visited England, France and the continent, and wished to come to the United States, but the United States did not invite him. He began sending a few Abyssinians to be educated abroad; he began to reorganize the system of justice, and tried to re-build the state in many ways. There were difficulties. Some were internal; Abyssinia is two thousand years old with an unbroken tradition, strong feudal princes, old families, and inbred customs opposed to change. The emperor had to attack evils like domestic slavery slowly and with care. Yet in this case, European philanthropy, with rapacious commercialism back of it, hammered at the reformer and forcedhim to set a pace which time may prove far too fast for his slow changing nation. It is quite possible that the new emperor, by his inovations and European policy, has strained dangerously the allegiance of some of his powerful followers, linked as they are to ancient allegiance and hoary customs.

~~Nevertheless,~~ the international relations of Ethiopia, coupled with old efforts at economic intervention, make the situation of the country difficult. In 1906, the agreement between Great Britain, France and Italy to respect and preserve the integrity of Abyssinia was really designed to prevent industrial concessions made to one from injuring the claims of any of the others. The notes between Great Britain and Italy in 1925, secretly divided Ethiopia into spheres of influence with Great Britain dominant in the regions of Lake Tsana and the headwaters of the Nile, and Italy along the borders of Eritrea and Somaliland. Ethiopia brought this treaty to the notices of the League of Nations. Mussolini explained, and MacDonald half apologised, and yet later when certain American engineers in 1927 signed a $20,000,000 contract to dam the waters of Lake Tsana, England insisted upon her prior rights, and by quiet diplomacy broke the contract.

The murder of the prime minister of Austria by the German Nazis halted an understanding between France and Italy which might have forced France and England to disgorge the German colonies in Africa and grant Italy's African demands in full. But Italy feared Pan Germany more than France; France feared Hitler's militarism; and England feared German industrial competition.

Laval and Mussolini renewed the old efforts to come to an understanding. Exactly what their written understanding was has not been published, but it is pretty clear from subsequent events. ~~Nothing was probably said about the navy. Italy has little money to build ships, even if she wants to.~~ Some concessions were made as to Italians in Tunis, and some territorial concessions in the hinterland of Tripoli, probably not large in actual extent, but important in opening one of the main trade routes from Lake Chad to Tripoli, ~~and involving some 50,000 square miles of territory.~~

The main concession undoubtedly was in Abyssinia, and that concession consisted, first, in promising to keep hands off if Mussolini should make war upon Abyssinia, and seize any part of her territory. Secondly, to grant Italian capital additional power in Abyssinia. It is rumored that three thousand shares of the Djibuti Railroad have been turned over to Italy, and that a rectification of frontier between Eritrea and French Somaliland has been so arranged as to give Italy direct access to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb.

All this means a tighter economic cordon around Ethiopia to make her access to foreign markets more difficult, and to keep out capital from countries other than Italy, Great Britain, and France. Behind this movement, and tending to strengthen the common interests of these imperial powers, are two menaces from Asia: the new independence of the kingdom of the Arabs opposite Abyssinia across the Red Sea. At best this is going to cut off Italian trade with Eritrea, and at worst, it is going to encourage every Arab in North Africa to remember the trail of blood through which Italy walked to secure the barren victory of Tripoli. Again, the recent appearance of Japan in Abyssinian industrial development, has alarmed the West. It is rumored that Japan has already captured one-third of the commerce of Abyssinia, and the French charge that the Japanese wish to equip Ethiopia industrially, and furnish technical help for her new machines.

Italy then mobilizes against Ethiopia; in spite of the League of Nations; in spite of her treaty of arbitration; in spite of reported efforts at conciliation and adjustment, her troops are piling soldiers and equipment into Eritrea. She intends to seize Ethiopian territory on one pretext or another, to secure oil, and to draw a tighter broad base of economic and military aggression about her. She may not attempt complete subjugation--the inner citadel is very strong, and the Ethiopians too fierce and manly. But economic strangulation can accomplish what direct force cannot do immediately.

Here, then, is war again. That war which has never ceased since the World War, but now comes nearer the European circle where its sparks are increasingly dangerous. Moreover, let no one think that the demand of Italy in Africa is the end of demands. The reason that Germany refuses to reveal her ultimate objects is because there is still one unmentioned subject, and that is, German colonies, and particularly German colonies in Africa, since the attitude and power of Japan makes colonial aggression in Asia unhealthful just now. Hitler in his Saar speech, intimated that the work of redeeming German colonies had not been finished, and he doubtless used the word "colony" advisedly. That Germany is going to demand the return of German Africa, before she consents to raise the War menace in Europe, is absolutely certain. The scramble, therefore, in Africa, for cheap labor and cheap war material is not ended. It helped start World War in 1914, and it may easily do it again in our day.

All this is not pleasant reading for those who pin their faith on European civilization the Christian religion and the superiority of the white race. Yetk these are the bare facts. They might be differently interpreted, and variously supplemented, but in it must remain a story of selfish and short-sighted crulty, deception and theft, with black men mainly victims and white men usually aggressors.

What of the future? We can envisage three possible results of the present program of Mussolini:

I. The civilized world, remembering the World War and the promise of the League of Nations, not forgetti ng a series of treaties and understandings, will refuse to allow Italy to attack Ethiopia or curtail her independence.

2. It aly will attack and gradually subdue Ethiopia and make her into an Italian colony and protectorate.

3. Et hiopia will repulse Italy or make conquest so difficult that she will retain her independence.

The probabilities are that Italy, by sheer weight of armament and the inactivity of Europe, will subdue Ethiopia. If this happens it will be a costly victory, both for Italy and the white world. There will be not only the cost in debt, death and hate, but the whole colored world, -- India, China and Japan, Africa in Africa and America, and all the South Seas and Indian South America,-- all that vast mass of men who have felt the oppression and insults, the slavery and exploition of white folk will say: I told you so! There is no faith in them even toward each other. They do not beleive in Christianity and they will never voluntarily recognize the essentialityx equality of human beings or surrender the idea of dominating the majority of men for their own selfish ends. Japan was right. They only path to freedom and equality is force and force to the uttermost. Nor will this indefensible aggression , prove to the dark peoples their weekness; rather it will point the path to strength: understanding between Japan and China, would of Asia impossible, but the conquest ofof Europe possible. India need no longer hesitate between passive a nd rebellion. Even Africa will realize that Europe holds Africa in leash today mainly with African troops, a religion of humility, vauge hopes and skillfully encouraged jealousies

One of these days, the very troops by which Europe holds Africa, ~~are going to~~ cease to play the part so long assigned them. It only needs the guiding thought and the great leader. And then with all thatEurope can do in airplane, tank and war guns, let the world r member that a group of determined black men, armed even partially with modern technique, could take their stand on the snow-swept heights of Ethiopia, within sight of the Equator, and in the midst of the black world, and shake the centers of European imperialism.

Suppose, however, that turning from this dreer and age- old prospect of blood and waste, we contemplate the possibility that Ethiopia, helped by courage, and terrain , secret European sympathy or even revolution in Italy, succeeds in repulsing Italy or even holding her months in check. This does not now seem probable, but it is possible. The result would be a grim chorus from the dark worlds: the spell of Europe is broken. It is the beginning of the end. Europe can no longer depend on brute force to make serfs of Yellow, Black and Brown.

Such reasoning may be fallacious and fail to accord Europe and the white race due credit for bringing the mass of men into the circle of human culture. Yet its logic is inevitabe: Italy has forced the world into a position that, win race hate will increase. And if Ethiopia is not defeated , the white world will receive a check comparable to the defeat of Russia by Japan.

Finally, if as now seems incredible, but is not beyond possibility, the better public opinion of the white world, and its obvious interests, absolutely refuses to allow this brazen public banditry to proceed; if England, France and America hold Italians firmly in check without too deadly impairment of Ethiopian independence; if the Pope of Rome refuses further to quibble and Protestant missions insist on practising their preaching, wile Pacifists fight for Peace-- in this improbable event, a new hope and faith will course through the veins of men; a new patience with selfishness and wrong; a new hatred the stupidity of war and a new urge to Humanity.

more and more drowned in the black blood from the South, which ever threatened and gave them sanctuary. This southern land, called from the beginning "Ethiopia", had its surging boundaries finally fastened at the First Cataret, until these gates became an opening and refuge when Egypt retreated before Persia; and Ethiopia, eventually became a new and conquering Egypt which ruled the Nile valley from Napata and was the greatest power in the western world from 750 to 600 B.C.

But Asia and the Desert pressed South again, until at Meroe, 500 further miles South and 500 years later Ethiopia developed a new capital and new dynasties which resisted the power of Greece, Rome and Arabia. Then the land of the Blacks crumpled again, before black foes sweeping in from the forests of the west, before the New Mohammedanism pressing relentlessly down from the north, before the ever encroaching desert.

Ethiopia again retreating took her stand with her back against the last great ramparts of the east - the Hills of Abyssinia. Here the black hordes of the region of the Great Lakes had been infiltrated with Semitic blood from the shores of the Red Sea, where Asiatic upheavels drove Jews and Arabs before them and hurled remnants on the African shores. The trading station at Axum, near modern Adowa was a gateway for merchants and brought Ethiopia and Abyssinia in contact.

This kingdom took its name, "Abyssinia", from a Semitic tribe, "Habesh"; but the people of Habesh were neither contented nor safe in being simply Abyssinians. Trade and defense forced them toward ancient Ethiopia, and they disputed with the Arabs and Nubians over the domination of the island of Meroe. Here they claimed sovereignty as early as 356 A.D., and actually destroyed the capital a century later. Greek and Roman influence filtered into Abyssinia from the East, and trade made Axum flourish. Myths of its obscure origin began to arise: the Jewish myth of descent of its royal house from Solomon; the Negro myth of its descent from Aethiopis, whose tomb was pointed out at Axum.

The new Christian religion came to Abyssinia in the Fourth Century after Christ, and thus a third great center of Christianity, in contrast to Rome and Constantinople, was established. Then came the red wave of conquest from the North, and the history of Abyssinia becomes dim and shadowy. As Gibbons has written, "Encompassed by her enemies, Ethiopia slept a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom she was forgotten.

It was not until the 16th century that the Portuguese again brought Abyssinia to the attention of the world, by locating there the source of the legend of Prester John, that ghostly Christian ruler, who during the Middle Ages was supposed to be reigning in Africa or India..

Abyssinia from early times was divided into a number of great districts, each administered by an hereditary chief called a Ras. Over these chiefs ruled a Negus, called "King of Kings". When this overlord was a strong man, he ruled a powerful country. When he was weak, there was anarchy and confusion.

Such a period of disintegration was in progress about the middle of the 19th Century under Johannes; but he was succeeded in 1855 by the Emperor Theodore, a gifted, ruthless man, who came to the throne at the time when European imperialism was being organized and stretching out inquiring hands toward Asia and Africa. Scientists, trades, missionaries and adventurers wandered into Abyssinia. Theodore was well-disposed toward Europeans, and curious about their countries, but inevitable misunderstanding occurred, both in matters of etiquette and religion. "I know the tactics of European governments," said the observing Theodore, "when they try to acquire an Eastern state. First, they send out missionaries; then consuls to support the missionaries; then battalions to support the consuls. I am not a Rajah of Hindustan to be made mock of in that way."

Theodore needed alliance and friendship with Europe, if they came to him on honorable terms, to help organize his kingdom and beat back the threatened domination of Turks and Egyptians. He considered himself insulted, however, when the British and others after making fair promises, forgot all about him and ignored his overtures; in angry retaliation he seized and imprisoned the British minister and other Europeans.

Thereupon, in 1867, the British taking advantage of a rebellion sent Napier with an army of 12,000 men to invade Abyssinia. Theodore was surrounded in his capital where the British troops with superior rifles killed two thousand Abyssinians, while losing only 20 whites. Theodore surrendered and released the prisoners, but Napier had promised the rebel chiefs to degrade and dethrone him. The English artillery opened fire on Magdala and Theodore shot himself dead. His body was allowed to be mutilated by a mob, while Napier received a peerage. Anarchy ensued in Abyssinia between 1868 and 1872, with two rival claimants to the throne, Johannes of Tigre and Menelik of Shoa.

This is historically the land that in 1935 came suddenly to the world's attention as a threat of imminent World War, as a test of international agreements, as a curious crisis in the Christian religion. How did this come about?

Italy became a united nation at the time when modern international imperialism was just beginning. Its outlines were clear in the British Empire whose wide colonial ~~empire~~ dominion was becoming an imperial domain for investing capital in cheap colored labor. Germany had as yet no colonial dream and France had lost hers. Italy had ~~two~~ too pressing problems of unification and the Catholic church to make wider plans, but she had a tradition - almost she was hampered by a tradition of Imperial Rome. And if modern Rome had a claim to any part of the world which was not hers, it was surely to Carthage or modern Tunis. France blundered into possession of Algiers as early as 1830 and at the Congress of Berlin in 1878, Bismark and Salisbury offered her Tunis as a consolation prize after Sedan.

The scramble for Africa began and imperial industry took cleaner, firmer outlines. France and England took dual control of Egypt in 1876. In 1881 France seized Tunis and England lost possession of Egypt. Italy was aroused. Despite her poverty and internal problems she felt forced to imperial aggression. In 1882 she seized Eritrea, a part of the natural coast line of Abyssinia but England and France blocked her further extension south, and it was not until 1892 that she joined England + Germany in the loot of Zanzibar and got Italian Somaliland.

These imperial ventures of Italy had little significance. The Abyssinnian ~~bystanders~~ highlanders cared little about the coast and took no note of its seizure; but the whole situation changed when native rebellion arose in Egypt and the Sudan.

Egypt was groaning under the debt which had been deliberately encouraged by France and England. Her rulers, who had squandered the proceeds, sought to keep up the interest by ruinous and exhaustive taxation. In desperation, the natives rebelled. Ahmed Arabi, a mulatto colonel, led a successful revolt but the English turned their guns upon Alexandria and defeated Araby. This left the former rulers in nominal control of the whole of Egypt but in actual control of the Sudan, while the English held the real power along the Lower Nile.

The Araby rebellion had its echo in the Sudan. In 1878, the mulatto Rabah had swept through the Bahr-El-Ghazel and the regions south of Lake Chad. Then there arose a greater leader and a vaster motif. Mohammed Ahmed, son of a priest in Dongola, had established headquarters 150 miles above Khartum. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, majestic black man, with great eyes. He had visions. Disciples gathered around him, and eventually he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammedan revelation.

The country, groaning under misrule, went into the throes of a religious crusade against Egypt. A holy war was proclaimed, and a strong army organized. The Mahdi put down blasphemy, feasting, drinking, smoking and swearing. Thousands followed him. The Egyptians in 1883 sent an army of 10,000 under the Englishman, Hicks Pasha. They were annihilated, with only 300 left alive. Kordofan, Dafur and the Bahr-El-Ghazel surrendered. Only a German, Emin Pasha, still upheld Egyptian power down in the Equatorial provinces next to Uganda. By the end of 1883, the Mahdi was master of a territory equal to Spain, France and Germany, and his army was closing in on Khartum, the capital of the Sudan . Ancient Ethiopia lived again.

England hesitated. She still had the liberal tradition and Gladstone even went so far as to say that the Sudanese were "rightly struggling to be free". But his "little Englanders" were fighting growing and expanding imperialism and as Chamberlain put it - "Empire is Commerce".

The scramble for Africa was bitter. England was encroaching upon the Portuguese colonies; Germany had appeared in the field; France was at work in North Africa. France, England and Italy had seized the coast of Abyssinia, and in the vast Valley of the Congo, comprising the whole center of Africa, little Belgium had proposed an international state. An European conference to settle the rules of the game for the further looting of Africa seemed necessary. It came together in Berlin in November, 1884, and lasted through February, 1885. The Congo was recognized not as an international state but as the personal property of the King of Belgium. Certain rules of procedure for the further seizure of Africa were adopted, and before the conference was ended, the German Colonial Party forced Bismark's hand, seized Zanzibar and East Africa, and Germany appeared as a full-fledged African colonial power.

In the midst of this, the imperialists forced Gladstone to make Chinese Gordon Governor of the Sudan, and Gordon, a tippling fanatic with fits of courage and murder, sought by every subterfuge to force Gladstone to conquer the Sudan. The bluff failed, Gordon died and Gladstone was reviled as a murderer and traitor.

Khartoum fell. For thirteen years, the Mahdi and his successor, the Khalifa, ruled ~~in the Sudan~~. Thus, the whole of the Sudan was lost to Egypt and England. The Egyptian garrisons on the northern border of Abyssinian were finally withdrawn in 1886, and French, British and Italian possessions on the coast were in danger of being overwhelmed by the Mahdi.

The English Tories, returned to power in June 1885, did not dare attack the Mahdi, and resorted to a web of diplomacy which entangles England today. She signed a treaty of alliance with Johannes II of Abyssinia and thus enlisted his aid to keep the Mahdi from the coast. Turning on top of this she suggested that Italy seize the port of Massowah which belonged to Abyssinia. To hand over to the Italians Massowah which belonged to the Abyssinians, and to which Italy had no shadow of claim, was an extraordinary breach of faith. Italy proceeded to take Massowah, as Giolitti says, as "a consolation prize", having been cheated out of Tunis, held back in Tripoli; out-manoeuvered both at the Congress of Berlin and the Berlin Conference; as well as losing her chance to participate in Egypt.

Once having placed her foot in Massowah, Italy proceeded to make alliance with Johannes' chief enemy, Menelik of Shoa, a pretender to the Abyssinian throne. Johannes found himself between two enemies, Italy and the Khalifa, and eventually was killed in battle by the latter in 1889. Immediately, Menelik proclaimed himself King of Kings, and in May signed with the Italians the celebrated treaty of Uccialli.

To prove his gratitude to the Italians for their alliance and help with the armies, Menelik ceded Italy the territory which they had already seized. But the Italians, drunk with new ambition, swept on, calmly crossed into Abyssinia, and toward the end of 1889, seized Adowa, while Menelik was busily subduing his enemies. They even penetrated into the Harrar, the trading region inland from the coast, thus coming into direct dispute, not only with Abyssinia, but with the claims of France and Great Britain. Thereupon, France and Great Britain made a secret treaty which allowed them to oppose Italy's advance if they pleased; a treaty which again put Great Britain in the unenviable position of "double-crossing" Italy, just as they had previously deceived Abyssinia.

This looked like a rare opportunity for German imperialism. Between German East Africa and the Egyptian Sudan, lay the great territory of Uganda, where Catholics, Protestants and Mohammedans had been merily cutting each others throats in their efforts to convert the heathen. The Germans pushed warily up into this country, while shut up in the Equatorial provinces of the Sudan was the German, Emin Pasha. Germany determined to rescue him, while England spent $145,000 on the Stanley expedition. Both nations were seeking to fall heir to Egypt in Central Africa. England ~~and Stanley~~ arrived first, in 1888, and found Emin, at first unwilling to be "rescued." He wanted to hold these provinces and turn them over to Germany. The Khalifa, however, was pressing him hard, and when Stanley appeared ~~in 1888,~~ Emin, finally reluctantly followed him, and they met Karl Peters and the German expedition which had been busily engaged in making treaties with the local chiefs for German expansion. Emin, with his black wife and mulatto daughter, finally arrived at Zanzibar, where he accepted the post under the German administration in East Africa.

Meantime, the stage was set for Italy's final coup. In the seventeenth clause of the Treaty of Uccialli, there arose a characteristic misunderstanding. The Abyssinian text, which was the only one actually signed, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, shall be at liberty to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments." The Italian translation, which was made in Italy, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, consents to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments."

The treaty was signed May 2, 1889. October 12, 1889, Crispi notified the powers by circular letter under the general act of the Berlin Conference of 1884-1885 that Abyssinia was an Italian protectorate. On May 5, 1894, he signed agreements with England in which England recognized Abyssinia as an Italian protectorate. A map of Africa by treaty was published in 1894, with the sanction of the Englished Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which this rape of Abyssinia was recognized.

But both England and Italy had reckoned without their host. There is no doubt but that the Treaty of Uccialli was a clumsy forgery of the same sort that had previously transferred sovereignty of a larger part of Africa from black men to white. Menelik, however, did not choose to submit. He not only denounced the treaty but he took up arms. He declared by proclamation: "Ethiopia has need of no one. She stretched out her hands to none but God."

The French supplied ~~Menelik~~ these hands willingly with arms and munitions. The forces of Italy and Ethiopia met at Adowa, and Italy's army of 100,000 was annihilated March 1, 1896.

Suddenly, the headwaters of the Nile, the Nile Valley, and Egypt, the domination of the Red Sea, the path from the Cape-to-Cairo, all these were in the hands of black men, —the black dervishes of the Sudan, and Menelik II, King of the Kings of Ethiopia and Emperor of Abyssinia. An English officer wrote: "If I were the Mahdi, I would make Egypt pay for every quart of water that runs down the Nile."

With Abyssinia in Italian hands, the British would have been willing to wait in order to clinch their eventual domination of the Nile Valley. She had in 1894 annexed Uganda, thus definitely curbing German expansion in East Africa. In 1895, the Jameson raid had taken place in South Africa as the first step toward a war destined to crush the Dutch and make South Africa a British province. The cape-to-Cairo idea, fostered by Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes, had seized the imagination of the empire. An agreement with Leopold of Belgium even secured a perpetual lease of a large bloc of territory at the headwaters of the Nile, and filled in the gap between the Great Lakes. This so alarmed the French that this lease was eventually cancelled.

The French, thereupon, took a forward step, and determined to push from French Africa eastward to the Nile and send a French expedition through Abyssinia westward to the Nile, and establish claims which cut off the hinterland of Tripoli even if Italy annexed it, which she had long planned to do. Menelik gave aid and comfort, and in 1894, made a concession to the French to build a railway from Djibuti through the Harrar to Addis Abbaba and the White Nile. French officers trained the Abyssinian army. Great Britain warned France that she calimed the whole of the Nile Valley and would consider any attempt to dispute this claim as an unfriendly act. Paris, hesitated, and the Abyssinian expedition was called off.

But the Battle of Adowa changed the whole situation. Italy could no longer pull English chestnuts out of the first, and French plans were manifest. Salisbury, again at the English helm, moved quickly. March 5, the news of Adowa reached England, and March 12, England suddenly learned that Chinese Gordon was a Christian martyr, who had been murdered by heathen. She ordered the conquest of the Sudan. Kitchener, with Maxim-Nordenfeldt guns, moved up the Nile. He captured Khartum in September, and ordered the tomb of the dead Mahdi publicly desecrated.

England was not a minute too soon. That very month, Marchand, the Frenchman, was at Fashoda awaiting the French and Abyssinian expeditions from Abyssinia. Indeed, one Abyssinian expedition under a royal prince had already reached the river but had been decimated by fever. The other expedition under a French commander did not materialize. For a moment, the world stood still with World War in the air.

The French had dispatched Captain Marchand to the French Congo April 25, with instructions to march to the White Nile. They again arranged an Abyssinian expedition to join him. The idea was that the two expeditions should meet on the Nile and establish a French claim to the Upper Valley of the Nile. When Kitchener arrived, he would find the French and Abyssinians stretched across the Cape-to-Cairo path. The Abyssinian expedition failed through the negligence of the French governor of Djibuti. When Marchand reached Fashoda in 1898, there was no fortress and no expedition of French and Abyssinians from the east to support him. Kitchener proceeded south to meet Marchand and a small body of Senegalese soldiers. The sympathies of the world were with Marchand. War was imminent. But the French fleet was not equal to the British and the French army at Fashoda was greatly inferior to the British army. March 21, 1899, an Anglo-French declaration was issued, which gave the Nile Valley to Great Britain.

Imperial Italy remained intensely dissatisfied. Her treatment by France in the matter of Tunis and Tripoli, and by England, in the case of Abyssinia, threw her into the arms of Germany and Austria, and she became part of the Triple Alliance. By taking Tripoli from Turkey in 1911-

RACE SEGREGATION WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO EDUCATION
By W. E. B. Du Bois

One of the difficulties of getting at the whole truth about this world is the extraordinary number of its contradictions and paradoxes. They are so puzzling that there is always temptation to settle them by denying or ignoring opposite truths. We continually assert, passionately and fiercely, that certain things are so, when we know perfectly well that they are contradicted by facts which cannot be hidden or denied.

One of the world's great philosophers, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel, tried to express this situation and bring a higher and more comprehensive understanding of the world by his celebrated Thesis, Anthithesis and Synthesis; that is; the statement of a great truth; the rise out of that truth of another truth which seems and does contradict the first truth; and then finally, an explanation and combination of these two contradictory aspects of Truth which brings ultimate synthesis and understanding.

The Hegelean dialectic thus expressed has been long discredited as a complete method of explaining the universe, but it till has its practical and intriguing value in clearing up human paradox; and there is a certain higher verity in the fact that one great universally admitted truth continually gives rise to an absolutely contradictory fact; and that in after years, the two become reconciled and understandable in a vast illuminating synthesis.

I want to illustrate this rather abstract introduction by bringing to your minds two contradictory and paradoxical theses: first, let us take the conception of Humanity; of human progress, increasing happiness, peace and good will toward all men. It is a magnificent conception and it calls for the razing of every artificial barrier between human beings. It is a dream of "no segregation", full and sympathetic contact between human beings, knowledge of them and effort toward the greatest and widest human development. It recognizes that hitherto in the world great men, transcendant ability, genius and character, prosperous groups and great families, have been almost accidental in their appearance because of lack of opportunity for developing ability in the masses of men. It believes that the vast majority of mankind are capable of broad education and culture; that they can achieve and create, and that where with the accidental opportunities of today we have ten great men in science, art and philanthropy, we might easily have ten thousand if all children, for instance, had the attention and care that the Dionne quintuplets are receiving; if we really had universal education of children in small classes with full equipment, under thoroughly educated and carefully selected and deeply devoted teachers; if we had family and social surroundings which would encourage the human soul to blossom and expand and express itself; if every individual and family had work reasonably suited to his ability, and an income which would support him in health and decency, with leisure for recreation and further development.

The doctrine of humanity confines itself to no country, continent or race. It welcomes to human brotherhood black, white, yellow and brown; American, Englishmen, Frenchmen; Japanese, Chinese and Africans. It touches and emphasizes the history and contributions of all people; it exalts no man and no group and no race or nation at the expense of it fellows; and it utterly repudiates the barbarous idea that men must rise by enslaving or insulting, or robbing or murdering their fellows. It finds warrant for all this in the teachings of every great religion, every great Christ, every great Leader: in Christianity, in Buddhism among the followers of Mohammed, and evenin the practical precepts of Fetich.

Moreover, no human dream has had more startling and encouraging results. A doctrine of broad humanity has abolished slavery and serfdom; has attempted universal education and has fought poverty and disease; is back of the missionary movement and the International Red Cross, and is the main spring of all philanthropy and social uplift. It has sponsored and is sponsoring today international and inter-racial movements in almost every realm of human activity: in government and law, in commerce and education, in postal and telegraph service, in radio broadcasting, in scientific experimentation, in public health, in trade unions, copyrights, trademarks, weights and measures and Olympic games. It has been emphasized in dozens of international expositions and international conventions. It has been attempted in the League of Nations, and the movement for world peace, and even in something like a Church Universal. It is the broadest and most splendid vision of mankind and it opposes and must logically oppose all artificial separation of human beings by barriers of race or color, of wealth or geography. It demands not a unity of identity and slavish regimentation, but finds the glory of civilisation in the freedom and variety of mankind, in the development of genius and art along all lines, and not simply in accordance with ideals of a few. It especially recognizes that human culture is diffused and enriched by human contact. That social contact always was the key to civilization. I know that my own education has been broader and fuller because of the varieties of human beings with whom I have sat in classrooms and worked at scientific tasks and known and lived with. I have gone to school with white students and black students, yellow and brown. I have had friends in England, France, Germany, Spain and Italy. I have worked with Africans and West Indians, Chinese, Japanese and East Indians. I have in this had a priceless opportunity to understand mankind in most of its chief varieties and many of its most illuminating experiences. In the last month, I have talked and conferred and argued with South Africans, East Africans, Nigerians, West Indians, Englishmen, Dutchmen, Jews and Germans. The finest and broadest education can only be built up through such many sided contacts.

broadest vision of our day.

Yet stretched beside it, contradicting it and confusing it, stands the Antithesis, as Hegel would say, born out of the very Thesis and expressing a terrible Truth which today cannot be denied or ignored or set aside. Behold, for instance, the Negroes of Kentucky. On this dark and bloody ground, they have passed through a development which denies and sneers at human unity and yet typifies and exhibits the most moving passions and efforts of the human soul. This dark and bloody ground belonged to Indians and then was claimed as the heritage of pioneering white men. It became a great endowment for democratic institutions. This free and fertile land was going to mean for the new democracy of the West the abolition of poverty, equality of income, and such breadth of opportunity as would make Americans the richest people on earth in the finest sense of riches. And yet, no sooner did the pioneers set foot upon this gift of God, than they brought black slaves with them and imported into Kentucky an institution which denied every democratic principle upon which their ideals were based. For a brief time, between 1792 and 1799, they allowed black men who were free to vote, and they then did away with even this concession to fairness and logic. They at first filled Kentucky with slaves to raise tobacco, and then made it a breeding ground for human beings to pour slaves into the cotton belt. In the years between 1833 and 1840, it has been estimated that Kentucky exported sixty thousand slaves, and while this total may be too large, certainly it is true, that just as Kansas today exports hogs, so in the fifties Kentucky was exporting Negroes at the rate of from two thousand to five thousand a year. Louisville became the center of the slave trade, especially to supply the newly opening Texas, and in each of five Louisville directories, between 1836-1860, there were from 7-81 dealers engaged chiefly in buying and selling slaves. Moreover, it was not simply a matter of selling adult slaves. John S. Young of 74 Fifth Street advertised in 1849: "I will pay fair cash prices for some thirty or forty Negroes from the age of ten to twenty-five years old, male and female."

Lexington had the best equipped slave markets in the state. The whole sordid drama of fugitive slaves was enacted here with the Ohio River as the boundary line between slavery and freedom. When the Civil War came, Negroes were used by both Confederate and Union troops until the clear promise of freedom from the Northern troops sent the mass of the Negroes into the Union lines and helped to win the war. It was Kentucky that refused desperately to the last ditch to ratify the 13th Amendment, and yet the Negroes stove with every weapon to achieve freedom, to vote, to work. In Frankfort in 1870, came the great convention which was refused the right to meet in the legislative halls. Planters and capitalists tried to import Chinese and foreign labor, and here in Louisville in 1869, two hundred and fifty Negro delegates came together to discuss their political and economic rights, as well as their schools, and to help the ratification of the 15th Amendment, and the purchase of real estate. With the help of Negro labor, the prosperity of the state was restored, and by 1871, the crops had reached the pre-war level. Despite this tragedy of strife and separation, slavery and human barter, war and social uplift, we have today still a group largely segregated and apart, with their separate schools and separate churches, separate sections of cities where they live, concentrated in certain parts of the state, segregated in their travel and in their social life. Especially are they discriminated against today in their right to employment and to reasonable wages, and in their opportunity to do the work which they are fitted to do. They typify a condition true of eight million Negroes in the South and to a degree true of four other millions in the North. American Negroes illustrate a philosophy definitely and passionately believed the world over, and so strong and impregnable today that no one sitting in this room tonight will witness its entire disappearance or even indubitable beginnings of such disappearance.

This philosophy is a doctrine of separation; of walls and barriers between human beings. It is illustrated perhaps better than anywhere else in Europe. Europe is a land about the size of the United States. It is the smallest of the continents, yet it is the center of modern civilization; a land of extraordinary beauty and interests, from the snows of Norway to the Bay of Naples, from the castles of Spain to the forests and steps of Russia. There are great rivers and magnificent cities; there are museums and universities; there are works of art, showing the finest genius of all mankind. To visit Europe, even for a brief time, is a liberal education. No one can see and forget the boulevards of Paris, the dark winding of Piccadilly, Princess Street, Edinburgh, the Unter den Linden of Berlin. No one who has seen the Alps at Berne, the Cathedral at Milan, the Alhambra at Granada, or the golden domes of Moscow, can ever afterward be quite the same. And yet this continent consists of a dozen countries whose frontiers bristle with guns and fortifications, with repressive legislation, and hostile customs. This land has just emerged from a war which left ten million dead men and twenty million wounded and cost some three thousand millions of dollars.

"The total cost of the war would finance a $100,000 hospital and medical dispensary in each of the three million villages, towns and cities of the entire earth--and still leave 37 billion dollars with which to endow medical research.

"The interest on 337 billion dollars at five per cent would itself be sufficient to provide salaries of approximately $1,500 per year for four teachers in each of these three million communities.

"The combined cost of the war would make available a revolving fund of nearly six billion dollars for each of the sixty nations out of which to provide the maintenance of an inclusive scheme of social insurance, covering all risks of sickness, accidents, old age, widowhood, maternity, and unemployment for the entire population. The interest alone would provide 500 million dollars annually for each of the fifteen nations with the largest populations, 300 millions for the next fifteen, 200 millions for the next fifteen, and 100 millions each for the smallest fifteen." (National Defense, Kirby Page, p. 170.)

Today, Europe is spending money at the rate of thousands of millions of dollars a year to prepare for another such effort at human suicide. In the nations of Europe, as in the [redacted] nations of the world, there has grown up a patriotism which not simply lauds one's own country, but lauds each country at the expense of all other countries. It regards other lands with something which is at least suspicion, and at greatest, the most immeasureable contempt. Lands essentially one are split and separated by language and and habit and their written history. Even science embraces the contradictory idea that the French are less than the Germans, and the Germans less than the French; the English greater than the Italians, and the Italians better than the Greeks; the Hungarians superior to the Austrians, and the Spaniards finer than the Rumanians. Every school boy is compelled, not simply to regard his country as the best on earth, but to promise to defend it with his life, whether the country is right or wrong; and to be willing and eager to suppress truth, even if that suppression contradicts history and common sense.

This patriotism extends to a racial loyalty, whereby the dominant races of the world write history and philosophy to show that the world is what it is, simply because of the power and ability of certain races, and that all decadence is due to race mixture and all civilization to race purity; all this in face of the fact that there isn't a single pure race on earth. We do not need to ask how this philosophy has spread to America; how it defended and sustained human slavery and defends color caste today, and how it is made not simply a criterion of truth, but a way of eternal salvation.

Moreover, this passionate provincialism which most men believe in today has had notable and undeniable results. It has sustained and inspired men; it has emancipated groups and individuals who never dreamed of their own importance and possibilities until the group taught them that they must. There was a time when Germany was nothing in the eyes of the world, and yet through war and struggle and hatred, she came to be oneof the great nations of the earth. Nothing has so transformed and uplifted the poor whites of the South as hatred and fear of the Negro. There was a time in the United States when neither white people nor Negroes themselves thought that black people could be educated; or were worth educating; when there were no Negro teachers, physicians, lawyers nor scientists; when there were few free black workers or any belief that there could be more; when there were no Negro schools nor Negro churches, except such imitations as white people furnished.

And yet, out of race segregation and compulsory degradation, arose a new loyalty, a new confidence, a new determination, which has welded the black people of the United States into a nation within a nation, whose development has become one of the wonders of modern history and is not yet really begun. And before us lies whether we will or no, long years and centuries of separation from other human beings; when we must develop our abilities, concentrate our strength, and increase our powers of knowledge and self-defense.

Here, now, stand Thesis and the Antithesis. There is no use denying either set of facts. The union of humanity is the greatest ideal of our time, and the development of mutually hating and warring races and nations is the only apparent present method of developing human beings. What are we going to do about it? It is a fantastic fact. It is a contradiction of logic and religion. We try to gloss it over. We say that race separation in the United States is growing less and is going rapidly to disappear. It is not growing less. It has changed. Its incidence varies largely; its results today are far different and its walls of great different materials and causes and excuses; but the walls of prejudice, as prejudice and separation, are as solid in 1936 as they were in 1836.

We shrink and hesitate to admit this. We whistle to keep our courage and try often to refrain from further racial organization and concentration of effort and development within our race, asserting that the ideal in the United States is one citizenship regardless of race, and that we should not ourselves increase the very discrimination against which we are fighting. And yet despite everything we say, we are every day compelled to go further in segregation.

When I was in a white Northern college, the thought of separately organizing for social or other purposes the Negro students in such colleges, was abhorrent. It was admitting the principle of segregation. But what happened? Today, we have a dozen Negro fraternities represented in practically all colleges, white and colored, and we had to have them, or else go without social life and without the inspiration of our fellows when we were increasingly cut off from contact with our white fellow students, because the segregation which we on our own initiative develop and transform into co-operation and internal strength is absolutely different from the segregation which white America forces upon us with the object of making us weak and pliable and tokeep us in our places.

For us, race segregation is not an End, it is a means. We repudiate it as an End. We embrace it and use it as a means of breaking down the very thing it aims at--our degradation and want. For white folk race segreation is not a means, but an end; a method of isolating us so as to save themselves from either knowledge or contamination.

Using, therefore, segregation not as an end, but as a means, our path is increasingly clear before us. It admits of no hesitation and contradiction. Its clarity is illustrated by one historic example which I cannot refrain from repeating.

St. George's Church in Philadelphia at Fourth and Vine Streets was a great Methodist Church. The Methodists rather prided themselves that they had followed Jesus Christ rather more fully than the Episcopalians in dealing with slavery. The Church of England had met many difficulties in inducing masters to send their slaves to church. The Methodists had invited them in. St. George's had grown to be the most popular church in Philadelphia. But in 1787, there had begun to pour into the city a large number of freed slaves from Pennsylvania with some fugitive slaves from Delaware and Maryland. So that the number of black folk who worshipped God in St. George's brought difficulties. They were not cultivated; they were not always clean; their manners were not the best. They were, nevertheless, welcomed there until it seemed to the good people of St. George's that something had to be done about this influx of dark Christians.

One Sunday morning two black men were on their knees praying, when the verger tapped them on the shoulder and courteously asked them to continue their prayers in the gallery.

Immediately a problem was presented to these men. Richard Allen was a man of good repute, a leader in a colored group of honest, God-fearing men. He didn't like this sort of thing. He hesitated as to what he should do about it. He knew he had not been asked to go to the gallery simply by the man who tapped him on the shoulder. Undoubtedly it was the decision of the church. He asked to be allowed to finish his prayer and then promised that he would leave and would not come again.

Not all the Negroes agreed. Some said: "What of it? They can worship in the gallery just as well." Most of them had never been used to anything else. If they were told to go to the gallery, they went. These Negroes stayed in St. George's Church. Their descendants are still Methodists and number 26,130 members, but they form separate congregations with black ministers and black bishops, and they are the one reason why the Methodist Church South and the Methodist Church cannot today find enough religion to unite them in one great Methodist body.

The little group with Richard Allen and Absolom Jones did not go to the gallery. They walked out of the church and then sat down and thought about where they were going to worship.

They formed a little organization with some insurance features and discussed the future after they had voluntarily segregated themselves from the white congregation. They differed in opinion. One part was invited to form a church under the Episcopalians. Their leader, Absolom Jones, was made rector of the church; but he was never allowed to meet with the white ministers. His group formed a church, but it was a church apart from the other churches. That church has grown; similar churches have grown, until you have 51,502 colored Episcopalians in 7,299 churches in the United States. But the segregation of these churches from white churches has never disappeared.

The men under Richard Allen were not satisfied with this. They said, "We are not going to accept segregated membership in any church. We are going to have our own church." They formed the African Methodist Episcopal Church. This church today has 545,814 members in 6,708 churches. It is a Negro organization, with Negro bishops, and owns 32 millions of dollars worth of property.

Thus, it made no difference in its early days whether Negroes accepted segregation or not. They were segregated and are today.

We have got to develop our own residential sections and homes in sheer self-defense against crime and disease in slums. We have got to make our Negro schools the very best schools possible because no price, even of humiliation and discrimination, is too much to pay for knowledge and the best training of our children. We have got to go even further than we have gone in demanding for these schools not simply decent buildings and civilized salaries, but a voice in the allocation of educational funds; the appointment of teachers; the selection of textbooks, and a share in the duties and powers of superintendence, and state support of professional and higher education. This is not less segregation; it is more; and it is today absolutely unassailable.

What, now, is the Synthesis of this Thesis and Antithesis? How are we going to reconciliate these two points of view? Suffice it to say: they cannot be immediately reconciled. As a practical program, we have got to face and emphasize things as they are and not as they should be. Today, the Negro in the United States has got to emphasize and take advantage of segregation, not simply in education, but particularly he has got to organize more thoroughly his economic life, and he must do this not because he thinks that segregation is best, but because knowing it is the worst thing for this nation and world, he nevertheless knows, too, that it is the only way to serve his group and to develop that power and self-respect without which no pepple can survive today.

On the other hand, beside the practical facts and the immediate and inescapable program, lies deep value and force in spiritual attitude and determined allegiance and Truth and Ideal. We must not worship segregation; we must not for a single second in Eternity call Evil good. The Negro can and must have a clear vision of the ultimate necessity of human union, tolerance and contact. While he builds and teaches and makes efficient Negro schools, he can know that ideal education is absolutely without segregation as to class or race, either among students or teachers. And while he knows that years, if not centuries, must pass by before this ideal can be realized, he need never give up the ideal. Effectual human unity through present diversity can come so long as human eyes remain set toward the morning and humanears hear the singing of the stars. Emphasis continually must change: increased segregation here, increased insistance upon race loyalty and confidence when survival demands, and yet readiness at any time to follow the ideal of one world for all men, whenever and wherever and in whatever degree this ideal becomes real.

Applying specifically to our problem of Negro education, perhaps we can find synthesis of our paradoxin a statement like this: the greatest duty of Negro schools is to educate white folk; to educate them in a realisation of how efficient Negro teachers can be; of how well Negro students can learn, and how fine an organization can be set up by Negro people. This education of white Americans can lead and will lead and should be designed to lead, to a time when such a thing as a Negro school will be anachronism and the silly waste of money and effort in separate school systems will be a thing of the past; a thing to forget along with War and Protective Tariffs and Poverty and race superiority. Work for the Negro race in school and home, in knowledge and power, in pride and aspiration, is work for the races and nations of the world and for their enlightenment in the ideal of one humanity in which there is no discrimination or segregation based merely on race or color. This is the Synthesis of our current Thesis and Antithesis of contradiction and paradox in the race problem.

COLORED CAPITAL AND LABOR

by W. E. B. Du Bois

The Amsterdam News ceased publication last month and went into the hands of a receiver. In itself this was a comparatively unimportant occurrence. This weekly newspaper published by colored people in New York City had a circulation of less than 50,000. It was not the best nor most widely read of the Negro papers; but it was enterprising in its news gathering and it had a bright set of young writers who gave spice and interest to its columns.

It ceased publication because of a strike of its editorial writers. This strike aroused a good deal of interest, partly because it was one of the first successful strikes of the new American Newspaper Writers' Guild and attracted the support of a million members of labor unions in New York City beside the efforts of the mayor and of the principal officials and citizens of Harlem.

More than that, it posed a new and interesting problem of colored capitalists hiring colored laborers; and it was seized upon by radical thinkers, white and colored, as forecasting a division of labor and capital across the Color Line in such a way as to foretell a time when the Color Line would be more or less obliterated by class lines between laborers and capitalists.

There have been weekly colored papers in New York for more than a century and regularly during the last fifty years. For twenty-five years there have been two or three such papers, the oldest, the New York Age, which is over fifty years old, and another, the Amsterdam News, which is more than 25 years old. The News began as the venture of a man with only fair education, little or no capital, but considerable push who carried it on with some success for ten or fifteen years. Then it became the property of a corporation which made the paper the most widely read colored journal in the Northeast. At one time, it was published three times a week and thought seriously of becoming a daily. Later, it confined itself to several editions of one weekly issue.

Colored Capital and Labor

In all these years, its publication took the form of an interesting adventure more than an attempt to make money. The wages paid were low, but after all, income as wage or profit was not the prime object of this paper. The paper wanted to talk about Negroes and discuss their situation and "settle" the Negro problem and everybody enjoyed the game. To be sure, several persons depended on the News for a living, ~~but some of these could have made a better living at other work.~~ There were differences and editorial changes from time to time, but still the paper went on and lately was bought regularly by about 32,000 people each week until the depression settled on it.

The stock of the paper at this time was owned by an elderly woman, widow of an earlier owner her daughter and her second husband. They were not rich people, but thrifty, owning some real estate; and the daughter was one of the first who ventured to establish a millinery shop in Harlem where she did most of her own work and made a tasteful display. It is possible that the paper was profitable in the boom years during and directly following the war, but there is no evidence that it was very profitable and probably most of the profits were reinvested in the attempt to expand the paper. Since 1930 or thereabouts, the Amsterdam News has been in debt and by the end of 1934, heroic measures seemed to be necessary to stem the tide and increase the income.

In July, 1934, the members of the editorial department formed themselves into a unit of the New York Newspaper Writers' Guild. This was a trade union which had many liberals, like Heyward Broun, among its leaders. Contrary to the policy of most American trade unions, it welcomed Negro members, although there were only a few eligible in New York City.

~~It is not clear just why the editorial writers of the News formed the union at this time.~~ Probably there was a thought that after all the Amsterdam News gained all of its significance from the work that these young writers and executives were doing and that they ought to have a voice in its policy. Every member of the home office staff joined the union and while the owner took no action at the time, she confessed afterward that she was: "somewhat apprehensive that the new unit might be the cause of future trouble."

The proprietor's real troubles were of course financial and she was casting about frantically for means to keep her periodical going without impoverishing herself. Experiments were made early in 1935 by adding new features and raising the price, but the deficit reached $800 a week and between May and October, the debt to the printer increased $8,000, while the circulation dropped from 32,000 to 18,000. The creditors began to get nervous. Various employees were dropped from the business department and the work of the printing department was especially curtailed.

Gradually the owner and her family became aware of a phase of modern economic development which they had not realized. Like the capitalists of the nineteenth century, they regarded the Amsterdam News as their "property." The money they had invested in it had been earned as wages and not inherited. All of them gave a considerable amount of their time and labor to the business. Nevertheless, by December, 1934, the situation was so bad that the editorial writers were uneasy for their jobs and the owner less and less disposed to recognize that they had any vested interest in the paper because they were working for it.

It was not, however, until August, that matters came to a head. The owner proposed to cancel the customary summer vacations with pay, while the Guild unit wanted a definite employment contract upon which future wages and conditions of work would be based. This the owner refused. She pointed out that the editors were receiving from $32-$45 a week, the reporters from $26-$30 and the stenographers $15-$18. She admitted that these were depression wages and lower than those formerly paid, but said that they were still as good or better than those paid by other Negro newspapers, and that the employees worked only 4½ days a week and that only one person had been discharged from the editorial department in fifteen years.

Negotiations went on until October when eight members of the editorial staff were dismissed, of whom six were members of the Guild. A strike or lock-out ensued which lasted for eleven weeks and employed the usual strike tactics of picketing and propaganda,--a procedure usual in many labor communities, but almost unprecedented in a colored community and against colored capitalists.

The owner replied vigorously, stressing the fact that a contract with the Guild meant a contract with an organization dominated by white people, and that this was a colored paper dealing with the problems of Negroes. There was cogency in this argument, because after all, the very existence of the Amsterdam News arose from the fact of color discrimination, especially in economic lines, and if the strike on the News failed, or led to the suspension of the paper, the colored unit could hardly expect employment on white papers. The Guild answered frankly, if not completely:

"The Guild does not attempt to dictate to any publisher whom he should hire... The constitution of the Guild forbids any discrimination among its membership on account of race, color, sex, creed or political affiliation. At a general assembly meeting of the Newspaper Guild of New York in October, the organization unanimously went on record as opposing the discriminatory policies of metropolitan newspaper publishers in the employment of Negro newspaper people."

The Guild, however, knew that this fair attitude was unusual among labor unions. When for instance a million union men demanded the reinstatement of the Guild unit and furnished funds and voluntary pickets, they represented laborers who in most cases had formerly refused to admit Negro workers to their unions or work beside them on the job.

~~This was not true of all laborers, but certainly of a majority.~~

Colored labor leaders called this reminder of color discrimination merely an excuse for exploitation; a "Jim-Crow" argument, and a subterfuge for justifying low wages. In rebuttal, the proprietors admitted that they did not pay union wages:

~~"The reason that Negro newspapers cannot pay union salaries throughout and exist is simple. Negro newspapers are shut off from the best local and national advertising accounts."~~

"We believe that some Negro business men do make profits and pay low wages. We do not know whether these Negro businesses pay lower wages than white businesses of similar standing... It has not been true that the publisher of the Amsterdam News has made profits at the expense of low wages. She is as insolvent as her business, except for a few minor and unconvertible properties.

"Is a Negro weekly newspaper prosperous enough to pay current union wages to its employees? Most of them are not. We know of only one Negro publisher who has grown wealthy and has had part union help... He was finally forced to rid himself of union help and although once wealthy, is reported to be in straightened circumstances today. The Amsterdam News has never been able to pay union wages. More than $30,000 of the $43,000 owed the Amsterdam News today is for union printers and engravers. These bills have been allowed to accumulate while she was trying to pay her employees in the business and editorial departments. Her employees in these latter departments were colored; in the other, white. She paid fair wages to her colored employees and forced the whites to wait. Most Negro businesses, harassed by union prices, try to solve the problem by paying low wages to the colored employees."

Despite such disturbing facts, the strikers determined to educate black Harlem and emphasize the thesis that whatever the conditions of work and wages were, the employee had a right to discuss them with the employer and to have voice in the final decision. They, therefore, hired headquarters and spread their propaganda by placards and by the publication of a small one-page paper called "The Reporter", which issued eleven weekly copies.

The owners, on the other hand, absolutely refused to discuss this vital point or make concessions. A colored citizens' committee advised them in September. The mayor of New York urged negotiations in October. An arbitrator whom he appointed held a series of conferences, but only one of the owners of the paper, representing a minority interest, was present. This arbitrator, head of the Federal Regional Labor Board, finally reported to the mayor October 17.

"It seems very clear to me that these workers were fired because of their organization activities and their membership in the Newspaper Guild. If the original discharges were motivated by economy, there is no reason why Mrs. Davis and Mrs. Morse should not have granted the Guild an opportunity to talk it over with them."

Colored Capital and Labor

Meantime, the result of the strike began to be felt. After all, the proprietors were not rich people and had little influence and practically no credit. The paper was reduced from 28 to 16 pages. The wages of the workers who were retained and the strikebreakers were reduced 20% and were in arrears. Thirty-three and one-third percent and more of the advertising was lost. In November, the Minister's Union and other organizations urged conference, but the proprietors replied by having thirty-four of the pickets arrested.

The pickets began to invade ~~"Striver's Row" and other~~ the better colored residential sections to intimidate certain persons who were aiding or sympathizing with the proprietors. This was a new note. It marked for the first time a definite attempt to split colored Harlem into rich and poor, employer and employee, bourgeois and proletariat. It did not go very far because most of the persons who might have been classed as bourgeois were distinctly on the side of the strikers. This was not a matter of economic theory or labor solidarity and in particular; it was not a movement against property and invested capital. It was simply judgment in a concrete case where they believed the strikers right and the owners wrong. On the other hand, many persons were frightened at this new colored radicalism and took sides when they really believed that the proprietors were within their rights.

Nor is this singular at all. After all, the colored people in Harlem who own their homes, including those who bought before and during the war the beautiful residences on "Striver's Row" erected by the "Yellow Dog Fund" of a great white insurance company, were people trained in the thrift, saving and investment creed of America. They believed that the greatest service that they could do to their race was to buy homes, save money and invest it; and especially so to invest it as to increase the employment of colored people by colored people.

Comes now a generation of younger Negro leaders who have joined white labor leaders in the United States recently in emphasizing the fact that the race question in the United States hides and slurs over the class division into bourgeois and proletariat,--capitalist-employer and employees depending upon wages; and the whites have particularly pointed out that in the Negro group there has arisen a black bourgeoisie exploiting black labor in the same way that whites exploit white labor or at least sympathizing with exploitation; and that the only rational fight of the working man is for white and Negro labor to ignore the Color Line and fight all capitalistic exploitation.

This logic faces a clear difficulty. Most Negroes are employed by white capitalists and Negro capital is often invested in white business. The main labor problem, therefore, is the relation of capital owned by white folk and the mass of white and colored laborers. For more than a century, the efforts of Negroes to organize with white labor for the rights and progress of both, have been frustrated by the attitude of white laborers. As late as 1925, Ira Reid estimates that 96% of the labor unions refuse in one way or another to admit colored members. If now white labor has a grievance against Negroes because they scab and underbid white labor and try to become capitalists, the fault is clearly in the attitude of labor unions. Today this attitude is slowly changing. But it still remains true that the masses of the white working population in the United States do not regard the Negro population as fellows. They do not want to live near them; they are not willing in many cases to have their children attend the same schools; they do not want to work at the same bench or in the same establishments, and they particularly object to having Negroes receive equal wages and thus achieve equal economic power.

This racial antagonism is being broken down in some respects, but the breaking is slow and there is no magic power in communism or socialism or reform which will abolish it immediately.

Turning their attention from this basic and pressing problem and appearing partially to ignore it, white labor unions have pointed out with increasing insistence that race solidarity among American Negroes actually shelters and protects a growing number of black exploiters and that the existence of this class and its influence makes the Negro masses more easily the tools of white capital. Most Negroes on the other hand insist that without this racial solidarity they could not in the past have fought as successfully for their rights as they have, and that the time is not yet come when they can afford by giving up their inner organization to leave themselves naked to their enemies. But they are beginning to insist further that racial solidarity need not involve sympathy with exploitation on the part of either white or black investors.

This Amsterdam News strike, therefore, had two aspects: one, an attempt of white labor unions to break a racial solidarity among Negroes which often sheltered and excused an exploiting bourgeoisie; and on the other hand, the attempt of Negroes as a race to compel white labor to join in a fight against the Color Line. Thus the objectives here were not identical, but in some respects contradictory.

The black propertyholders and small capitalists for the most part stood by the workers in this case and helped them win their fight. White labor stood by the black strikers, but only far enough to secure them in their present jobs and not to make their entrance into other jobs easier. Thus it clearly might be possible for labor solidarity across the Color Line to progress only far enough to disrupt Negro unity for self-defense against continuing race prejudice, and still to hesitate against such a real union of labor against the Color Line as would undermine modern imperialism and the world domination of white investors over colored labor.

On the other hand, if the rift between colored capitalists who employ colored labor and their workers is still small, if Negro propertyholders are still so near the status of workers that they can sympathize with their condition and demands, then here is a group not antagonistic to the labor movement, but possibly holding such stragetic position that they can help and forward a solution of both the labor and race problem.

The strike lasted for eleven weeks and was won, but the winning involved the bankruptcy of the Amsterdam News corporation which passed into a receivership dominated by white creditors. In other words, the operation was successful and if the patient did not die, he at least remained dead several weeks andis not yet out of danger.

Negotiations for the sale of the paper went on between the creditors and the proprietor of a colored paper in Baltimore, and also with a group of colored professional and business men in New York. The principal creditor, a white printer, whose bill was $21,000, refused the Baltimore offer because it involved his losing a large printing job.

Colored Capital and Labor

The New York group, however, was similar in many respects to the group who formerly owned the paper and against whom the strike was initiated. In other words, it was petty-bourgeois—small propertyholders, business and professional men. All of them were investors on a moderate scale. The leaders were two physicians, one of them formerly part-owner of a large apartment house and the other a leading stockholder in one of the largest Negro insurance companies. These men tried to save the Amsterdam News, not primarily as a profit-making institution, but as a Negro institution in order that Harlem might have a paper which would fight race prejudice and discrimination.

But on the other hand, they did recognize as their predecessors had not, that the black labor which they employed had a right to a voice in the conduct of the business. They assented to an adjustment committee, severance notice and a union contract. They hired ten of the fifteen strikers and raised the wages of stenographers to $21 and reporters to $30. They gave the editors an increase of 10% in salary.

What light does this strike throw on capital and work among Negroes?

First of all, just how far have Negroes accumulated capital and developed what may be called a capitalist class? Perhaps one of the most recent and interesting answers to this query is the report on Negro retail business made by the United States census in 1932. There are in the United States 25,701 stores operated by Negroes selling a little over one hundred million dollars worth of goods a year. They were chiefly grocery stores, filing stations, restaurants, cigar stores and drug stores, and their average sales per year were a little less than $4,000. Now it has been estimated that a store with $12,000 worth of annual sales earns only a margin of $1,750 for payroll and profit. This means that the 26,000 Negro stores average only $600 a year for payroll and profit and the bulk of this is obviously payroll and not profit.

Beside retail business, Negroes have invested in farms, newspapers, banking and insurance, barber shops and boarding houses; but in all these cases, the group of capitalists as distinct from workers, is small. What we have here is not capitalists and workers, but workers with some capital and with a few exceptions this is a characteristic development of Negro business.

How will this tendency develop in the future?

There are two current theories: one is illustrated by the attitude of the strikers on the Amsterdam News. There must come in the ranks of American labor increasing solidarity and unity of action across and despite the Color Line. The outlook for favorable consummation of this program presents today some lines of hope. But the development of labor solidarity between whites and blacks in the United States is not a matter of years, but of decades, if not indeed of a century or more, and ~~that~~ while it is developing not only must the black worker live, but he must live and achieve in such a way that his value as an ally will be recognized by the white worker.

The problem of capital among American Negroes is a different one than among whites. The whites own the basic mass of accumulated capital with its control of machines and material. White labor can gradually share in that ownership and control through political power and organization or through the use of force. Black labor can share only to the extent that Negroes are a part of the white labor movement. On the other hand, while they are slowly becoming a part of the white labor movement and during the serious and critical years of hesitation and racial barriers, there is a chance for Negroes to accumulate and control some capital. They are, for instance, consumers, which means that they spend each year some two thousand million dollars for the purchase of goods. The direction of this power can become in their hands a method of saving and a weapon for enforcing employment at decent wages. It is today in the South then sole effective right to vote. This was shown in a tense, silent battle lately fought in Atlanta. A large chain store in a Negro section employs white clerks. One of them assaulted a Negro customer. As a result, Negroes withdrew their patronage. I passed the store on Saturday night a month ago. It was brilliantly lighted with a large stock of goods and a number of clerks and not a single customer that I could see, while surrounding stores were fairly well patronized. This boycott with little advertisement or agitation went on for two months. The Ku Klux Klan marched by in sheets and pillowcases; written threats were made against competing white and colored stores, but the community stood firm. I passed the store last Saturday night. It was closed. What is clear here is the power which the Negro consumer, even with his small wage and unorganized condition, has in his hands today. That consuming power with the savings of Negro professional classes can without doubt command a considerable aggregate of capital.

If that capital is used for investment in white business or in competition with white capital and for the same ends of pure profit-making, it will not accomplish much; but if on the other hand, it can be used by people fully conscious and intelligent concerning the fundamental change in industrial organization which is coming in the United States and throughout the world, this capital can be used to further that revolution and to prove to the world that American Negroes can become worthy citizens of the new socialistic state. Negro efforts to this end have appeared in many parts of the world: in the cocoa-raising and co-operative selling on the West Coast of Africa; in co-operative agriculture and fruit raising in Jamaica; and in mutual insurance and neighborhood retail stores in the United States.

How far can a Negro economic structure be built in America behind the tariff of race prejudice; that is, behind the discrimination and difference which will not yield easily even to the incentive of profit and better wage? Instances of this may be seen in life insurance; amusements of various kinds; personal services, such as barber and beauty shops, boarding houses and hotels; and newspapers and magazines, catering to the Negro group. Within this partially closed circle business may develop and be protected because of lack of general competition. But this very opportunity may involve low wages, bad living conditions and exploitation of various sorts within the Negro group. If it does, how far is this problem of exploitation is similar to or identical with the general white labor problem in the country and how far can it be fought by the same weapons, as in the Amsterdam News strike? Here the result was apparently to socialize partially a Negro enterprise and not to kill it and that ~~will be~~ was a triumph. But suppose that Negro labor in an essentially Negro enterprise strikes and the result of the strike is simply to abolish the Negro job? This might be a labor victory, but a Negro defeat too costly to be borne.

The real answer is a racial solidarity which persists until race prejudice disappears and yet is so organized as not to be used as a tool for the exploitation of any laboring class. This the Negro race can accomplish by making within its own growth the interests of its laboring classes paramount and by putting into the hands of these people, through co-operative enterprise, the ownership and control of capital sufficient to finance Negro business. Eventually such a business structure can by growth and efficiency withstand competition beyond racial lines and become at least one of the paths of Peace to economic Revolution.

COLORED CAPITAL AND LABOR

The Amsterdam News ceased publication last month and went into the hands of a receiver. In itself this was a comparatively unimportant occurrence. This weekly newspaper published by colored people in New York City had a circulation of less than 50,000.

It was not ~~perhaps~~ the best nor most widely read of the Negro papers, but it was enterprising in its news gathering and it had a ~~rather~~ bright set of young writers who gave spice and interest to its columns, and it ~~distinguished itself among Negro newspapers~~ by being a member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations ~~and~~ carrying ~~a very considerable amount of local advertising~~.

It ceased publication because of a strike of its editorial writers. This strike aroused a good deal of interest, partly because it was one of the first ~~very~~ successful strikes of the new American Newspaper Writers' Guild, ~~a white-collar union~~, and ~~it~~ attracted the support of ~~perhaps~~ a million members of labor unions in New York City besides the efforts of the mayor and of the principle officials and citizens of Harlem. More than that, it posed a new and interesting problem of ~~the result and meaning of the development of a Negro bourgeoisie; that is, of~~ colored capitalists hiring colored laborers, and it was seized upon by radical thinkers, white and colored, as forecasting a division of labor and capital across the Color Line in such a way as to foretell a time when the Color Line would be more or less obliterated by class lines between laborers and capitalists. ~~On the other hand~~, there are those who fail to see this and who believe that the economic class division which many ~~seem to see~~ in this strike was an exaggerated effort to trace a pattern which either does not exist ~~as yet~~ or exists in such an embryonic state as not to be typical.

~~In any case~~, at any rate, the situation is worth review and study. ~~First to our facts.~~

There have been weekly colored papers in New York for more than a century and regularly during the last fifty years. For twenty-five years there have been two or three such papers, the oldest, the New York Age, which is over fifty years old, and another, the Amsterdam News, which is more than 25 years old. The News ~~It~~ began as the venture of a man with only fair education but considerable push who carried it on with some success for ten or fifteen years. Then it became the property of a corporation which ~~and secured a number of young, bright writers whose lively collection of news and interesting presentation of it~~ made the paper the most widely read colored journal in the Northeast ~~and gave it a considerable body of local advertising.~~ At one time, it was published three times a week and thought seriously of becoming a daily. Later, it confined itself to several editions of one weekly issue. In all these years, its publication took the form of an interesting adventure for more ~~rather~~ than of an attempt to make money ~~profit.~~ The Rank and File Wages were low, but after all, income ~~neither~~ as wages or ~~as~~ profits was not ~~were~~ the prime objects of this paper. The paper wanted to talk about Negroes and discuss their situation and "settle" the Negro problem and everybody enjoyed the game. There were differences and editorial changes from time to time, but still the paper went on and was ~~read~~ eagerly sought after by regularly by about 32,000 people each week until the depression settled on it.

The ~~owners~~ stock of the paper at this time was owned by ~~were~~ an elderly woman, her daughter and her second husband. They were not rich people, but thrifty, owning some real estate, and the daughter was ~~being~~ one of the first who ventured to establish a millinery shop in Harlem where she did most of her own work + made a tasteful display. It is possible that the paper was profitable in the boom years during and directly following the war, but there is no evidence that it was very profitable and probably most of the profits were reinvested ~~forced~~ in the attempt to expand the paper. Since 1930 or thereabouts, the Amsterdam News has been in debt and by the end of 1934, ~~some~~ heroic measures seemed to be necessary to stem the tide and increase the income.

~~In the meantime,~~ In July, 1934, the members of the editorial department formed themselves into a unit of the New York Newspaper Writers' Guild. This was a trade union which ~~had been formed.~~

To be sure several persons depended on the

had many liberals, like Heyward Broun, among its leaders. Contrary to the policy of most American trade unions, it welcomed Negro members, although there were only a few eligible in New York City.

It is not clear just why the editorial writers of the News formed the union at this time. Probably ~~there was some dissatisfaction with the ownership, but beyond this, undoubtedly,~~ there was a thought that after all, the Amsterdam News gained all of its significance from the work that these young writers and executives were doing and that they ought to have a ~~larger~~ voice in its policy ~~than they had been having.~~ Every member of the home office staff joined the union and while the owner took no action at the time, she confessed afterward that she was "somewhat apprehensive that the new unit might be the cause of future trouble."

The institution's real troubles were of course financial and she was casting about frantically for means to keep them her headed going northward uncontrollably headed

Experiments were made early in 1935 by adding new features and raising the price, but the deficit reached $800 a week and between May and October, the debt to the printer increased $8,000, while the circulation dropped from 32,000 to 18,000. The ~~owners~~ began to get ~~scared and the creditors~~ nervous. Various employees were dropped from the business department and the work of the printing department especially curtailed.

reasonable and the conditions of work not bad considering the general situation.

The salaries of the full-time workers were: editor, $45, assistant editor, $35, city editor, $32, reporter, $30, artist, $26, stenographers and secretaries, $15-$18.

The publisher admitted that "It was not true that the publisher had been indifferent to the welfare of her employees. Her lowest-paid reporter received $30 a week. The editor was paid $45. The salary of the sports and theatrical editor, a veteran employee, was $50. The society editor was paid $35 a week." These were 'depression' wages, much lower than those formerly paid, but still as good or better than those paid by any other Negro newspaper. The employees had the five-day week; in fact, they worked only four and one-half days. They had no fear of losing their jobs. Only one person had been discharged in the editorial department in 15 years."

When August 20 the union submitted a contract as a basis of negotiations, the owner practically refused to discuss the matter and following the advice of a reactionary lawyer, she soom euchred herself into the position of seeming to defend her own property on the theory that nobody had any business to interfere with it, not even those whose work was making the property valuable. Finally, October 7, 1935, the editorial staff was called in and eight dismissals announced. Six of the eight were Guild members. Of those discharged, seven had been there from 5-8 years and four from 3-5 years.

(~~Insert~~.)

Gradually the owner and her family became aware of a phase of modern economic development which they had not ~~recognized~~ realized. Like the capitalists of the nineteenth century, they regarded the Amsterdam News as their property. The money they had invested in it had been earned asdwages and not inherited. All of them gave a considerable amount of their time and labor to the business. Nevertheless, by December, 1934, the situation was so bad that the editorial writers were uneasy for their jobs and the owner less and less disposed to recognize that they had any vested interest in the paper because they were working for it. It was not, however, until August, that matters came to a head. The owner proposed to cancel the customary summer vacations with pay, while the Guild unit wanted a definite employment contract upon which future wages and conditions of work would be based. This the owner refused. She pointed out that the editors were receiving from $32-$45 a week, the reporters from $26-$30 and the stenographers $15-$18. She admitted that these were depression wages and lower than those formerly paid, but that they were still as good or better than those paid by other Negro newspapers, and that the employees worked only 4½ days a week and that only one person had been discharged from the editorial department in fifteen years. Negotiations went on until October when eight members of the editorial staff were dismissed, of whom six were members of the Guild. A strike or lock-out ensued which lasted for ~~seven~~ eleven weeks and employed the usual strike tactics of picketing and propaganda, a procedure usual in many labor communities, but almost unprecedented in a colored community and against colored capitalists. The owner replied vigorously, stressing the fact that a contract with the Guild meant a contract with an organization dominated by white people, and that this was a colored paper dealing with the problems of Negroes. There was cogency in this argument, because after all, the very existence of the Amsterdam News arose from the fact of color discrimination, especially in economic lines, and if the strike on the News failed, or led to the suspension of the paper, the colored unit could hardly expect employment on white papers. The Guild answered frankly, if not completely.

After some jockeying for position lines between the proprietor and her editorial workers were tautly drawn, and what the proprietor called a strike and the workers called a lock-out, ensued for eleven weeks. The usual strike tactics with picketing and some violence ensued, a procedure ~~of~~ usual in many labor communities, but almost unprecedented in a colored community and against colored capitalists.

The proprietors hit back vigorously. ~~The~~ declared that the "recognition of the Guild would give control of the personnel of her editorial office to the Guild, a primarily white organization. She had no prejudices against the white leaders as such, nor against whites. She had four white reporters on her pay roll. But she was fearful that whites would not be able to understand the special problems of a Negro business and would lack the sympathy and spirit of sacrifice necessary to maintain it."

There was cogency in this argument because after all the very existence of the Amsterdam News arose from the fact of color discrimination, not only in social lines, but particularly in economic lines in New York and all through the country. ~~The~~ moreover showed the strike in the News fact the colored unit need expect no employment on white ~~papers~~ papers in New York. ~~Not only did the New York Newspaper Guild make no movement toward such an innovation, but undoubtedly many members of the Guild, if not most of them, would resign rather than work beside a Negro reporter or editorial writer.~~ In other words, when the Amsterdam News failed, labor solidarity with white workers ~~did~~ would not provide the unsuccessful strikers with meat or drink.

The answer of the Guild was frank if not complete

(4) "The Guild does not attempt to dictate to any publisher whom he should hire. That is to say, the Newspaper Guild does not attempt to say to any publisher that he must hire Heywood Broun, John Doe or Henry Lee Moon. It proposes, rather, to offer to Broun, Doe and Moon its full protection on the job and to stand by them in case the publisher wishes to discharge them for Guild activity. The constitution of the Guild forbids any discrimination among its membership on account of race, color, sex, creed or political affiliation. At a general assembly meeting of the Newspaper Guild of New York in October, the organization unanimously went on record as opposing the discriminatory policies of metropolitan newspaper publishers in the employment of Negro newspaper people." In those instances in which Negroes are employed on the metropolitan press they are members of the Guild units on those papers. On the Daily News Edward Lewis, a photographer, is a member of the Guild. He first joined the Guild while working as a photographer on The Amsterdam News. In Philadelphia, Newark and Boston Negroes working on daily papers have been members of the Guild. In our instance, the members of our unit and the Newspaper Guild were more interested in regaining the jobs from which we had been locked out than being placed in new jobs."

The Guild, however, knew that even this negatively fair attitude was unusual among labor unions. When for instance a million union men demanded the reinstatement of the Guild unit and furnished funds and voluntary pickets, they represented laborers who in most cases had refused to admit Negro workers & then commenced to work beside them on the job. This was not true of all laborers, but certainly of a majority

Colored Labor Leaders called this accusation of Color discrimination merely an excuse for ~~exploitation~~; ~~by employers~~ a "Jim-Crow" argument, & a subterfuge for justifying low wages. For rebuttal

The proprietors did not deny that ~~the wages they paid were less than the wages of similar white workers.~~ admitted they did not pay union wages.

"The reason that Negro newspapers cannot pay union salaries throughout and exist is simple. Negro newspapers are shut off from the best local and national advertising accounts." ~~We believe that most persons, considering this question, think of Negro newspapers in comparison with white dailies. The Negro newspaper should be compared to weekly rural white publications of the second grade.~~"

"We believe that some Negro business men do make profits and pay low wages. We do not know whether these Negro businesses pay lower wages than white businesses of similar standing. ... It has been our impression that a trained Negro young man or young woman expects more for similar service than the white person gets in so-called white-collar jobs. It has not been true that the publisher of the Amsterdam News has made profits at the expense of low wages. She is an insolvent as her business, except for a few minor and unconvertible properties.

"Is a Negro weekly newspaper prosperous enough to pay current union wages to its employees? Most of them are not. We know of only one Negro publisher who has grown wealthy and has had part union help. ... ~~That publisher was~~ He was finally forced to rid himself of union help and although once wealthy, is reported to be in straightened circumstances today. The Amsterdam News has never been able to pay union wages. More than $30,000 of the $43,000 owed the Amsterdam News today is for union printers and engravers. These bills have been allowed to accumulate while she was trying to pay her employees in the business and editorial departments. Her employees in these latter departments were colored; in the other, white. She paid fair wages to her colored employees and forced the whites to wait. Most Negro businesses, harassed by union prices, try to solve the problem by paying low wages to the colored employees."

Despite such disturbing facts, the strikers determined to educate black Harlem and emphasize the thesis that whatever the conditions of work and wages were, the employee had a right to discuss them with the employer and to have voice in the final decision. They, therefore, hired headquarters and spread their propaganda by placards and by the publication of a small one-page paper called "The Reporter", which issued eleven weekly copies.

The owners, on the other hand, absolutely refused to discuss this vital point or make concessions. A colored citizens' committee advised them in September. The mayor of New York urged negotiations in October. An arbitrator whom he appointed held a series of conferences, but only one of the owners of the paper, representing a minority interest, was present. This arbitrator, head of the Federal Regional Labor Board, finally reported to the mayor October 17.

"It seems very clear to me that these workers were fired because of their organization activities and their membership in the Newspaper Guild. If the original discharges were motivated by economy, there is no reason why Mrs. Davis and Mrs. Morse should not have granted the Guild an opportunity to talk it over with them."

In November, the Minister's Union and other organizations urged conference, but the proprietors replied by having thirty-four of the pickets arrested. Meantime, the result of the strike began to be felt. After all, the proprietors were not rich people and had little influence and practically no credit. The paper was reduced from 28 to 16 pages. The wages of the workers who were retained and the strikebreakers were reduced 20% and were in arrears. Thirty-three and one-third percent and more of the advertising was lost. The pickets ~~were said to have walked six thousand miles and they~~ began to invade "Striver's Row" and other residential sections to intimidate certain persons who were aiding or sympathizing with the proprietors.

This was a new note.

It marked for the first time a definite attempt to split colored Harlem into rich and poor, employer and employee, bourgeois and proletariat. It did not go very far because most of the persons who might have been classed as bourgeois were distinctly on the side of the strikers. For the moral part this was not a matter of economic theory or class solidarity and on hardening; it was not movement against property and invested capital. It was simply judgment on a concrete case where they believed the strikers right & the owners wrong. In other cases, however, many persons were frightened at this new colored radicalism and openly took sides when they really believed that the proprietors were within their rights.

Nor is this singular at all. After all, the colored people in Harlem who own their homes, including those who bought before and during the war the beautiful residences erected by the "Yellow Dog Fund" of a great white insurance company, were people trained in the thrift, saving and investment creed of America. They believed that the greatest service that they could do to their race was to buy homes, save money and invest it, and especially so invest it as to increase the employment of colored people by colored people. This was a doctrine which for a generation had not been questioned. The opponents of Mr. Washington had not denied this main thesis, but merely insisted that it was more important to study and know situations and trends in the economic and social world than merely to save and invest. But they did not deny that saving and investment was a very important matter.

Now comes a generation of younger Negro leaders who have joined white labor leaders in the United States recently in emphasizing the fact that the race question in the United States hides and slurs over the class division into bourgeois and proletariat, capitalist-employer and employees depending upon wages; and the whites have particularly pointed out that in the Negro group there has arisen a black bourgeoisie exploiting black labor in the same way that whites exploit white labor, and that the only rational fight of the working man is for white and Negro labor to ignore the color line and fight capitalistic exploitation.

This logic faces a clear difficulty. Most Negroes are employed by white capitalists and Negro capital is often invested in white business. The main labor problem, therefore, is the relation of capital owned by white folk and the mass of white and colored laborers. For more than a century, the efforts of Negroes to organize with white labor for the rights and progress of both, have been frustrated by the attitude of white laborers. As late as 1925, Ira Reid estimates that 96% of the labor unions refuse in one way or another to admit colored members. If now white labor has a grievance against Negro labor because it scabs and underbids white labor, the fault is clearly the attitude of labor unions. Today this attitude is slowly changing. Unions like the Amalgamated Clothing Union and many of the new industrial unions are welcoming Negro workers. If now beyond this white labor blames Negro labor for encouraging and refusing to fight, exploiting organizations of Negro capital, how far is this charge justified by the facts?

Turning their attention from this basic and pressing problem and appearing partially to ignore it, white labor unions have pointed out with increasing insistance that race solidarity among American Negroes actually shelters and protects a growing blass of black exploiters and that the existence of this class and its influence makes the Negro masses more easily the tools of white capital. Negroes on the other hand insist that without this racial solidarity they could not in the past have fought as successfully for their rights as they did, and that the time is not yet come when they can afford by giving up their inner organization to leave themselves naked to their enemies. And they insist further that racial solidarity need not involve sympathy with exploitation on the part of either white or black investors.

This Amsterdam News strike, therefore, had two aspects: one, an attempt of white labor unions to break a racial solidarity among Negro ~~workers~~ which often sheltered and excused an exploiting bourgeoisie, and on the other hand, the attempt of Negroes as a race to compel white labor to join in a fight against the color line. Thus, then, the objectives here were not identical, but in many respects contradictory ~~objectives involved, and the future development of these two movements~~

The black propertyholders and small capitalists for the most part stood by the workers in this case and helped them win their fight. White labor stood by the black strikers, but only far enough to secure them in their present jobs and not to make their entrance into other jobs easier. Thus it clearly might be possible for labor solidarity across the color line to progress only far enough to disrupt Negro unity for self-defense against continuing race prejudice and still to hesitate against such a real union of labor against the color line as would undermine modern imperialism and the world domination of white investors of colored labor. 14 On the other hand, if the rift between colored capitalists who employ colored labor and their workers is still small, if Negro propertyholders are still so near the status of workers that they can sympathize with their condition demands, and if Negro workers can still hope in some degree to own property and control capital, then here is a group not antagonistic to the labor movement, but holding such possible stragetic position that they can help and forward a solution of both the labor and race problem.

The strike lasted for eleven weeks and then was triumphantly declared won. ~~but~~ The winning however involved the bankruptcy of the former employers, the passing of the Amsterdam News corporation into a receivership, and the eventual sale of the paper to a new corporation. In other words, the operation was successful and if the patient did not die, he at least remained dead several weeks. PP Negotiations for the sale of the paper went on between the Creditors and the proprietors of a colored paper in Baltimore and a group of colored professional + business men in New York. The principal creditor of the Amsterdam News, a white printer, who the News owes $21,000, refused the Baltimore offer because that would involve his losing the job of ~~the~~ printing ~~of~~ the paper (which would be handled by) in Baltimore and in a non-union shop. PP On the other hand, the group in New York who offered to purchase was in many respects ~~the same kind of~~ a similar to the one group that was relinquishing the paper. It ~~consisted of~~ was led by two physicians, one of whom was connected with a large Negro insurance society, ~~and some associated colored business men.~~ These men did not regard ~~They were not looking upon~~ the Amsterdam News primarily as a profit-making institution. It must, of course, pay expenses or they could not afford to take it over; but on the other hand, they were not proposing to live upon its profits and they were ~~proposing~~ planning to give largely of their own time and efforts to preserving what they called a "Negro" institution; that is, in order to have a paper in Harlem which would fight race prejudice and discrimination as exhibited by white capital and white labor, these men proposed to buy the Amsterdam News. PP They did, however, represent a distinct grouping of black capital + black labor they were not only willing to confer with their employees, but were in fact compelled to ~~negotiate~~ by the threat of the strike. They did not, however, retain all of the 15 or 16 strikers, but gave work to ten of them and dismissed the others and the strikebreakers. They raised the minimum ~~raise~~ wage of stenographers to $21 and reporters to $30, and gave the others an increase of 10% in salary. They assented to an adjustment committee, severance notice, and a union contract. They said:

> "We appreciate that the meeting of the Guild wages and conditions will cause some inconvenience. However, we believe that the need for the continued existence of The Amsterdam News is so great that no sacrifice should be spared in order to bring this to pass."

lasted for eleven weeks and then according to the triumphant statement of the New York Nation, the strike was won; the demands of the writers for a five-day, forty-hour week, two weeks' vacation with pay, dismissal notices and an adjustment committee, etc., were all granted. One detail, however, was not emphasized, and that was that the Amsterdam News cease publication. The operation was successful, but the patient died.

THE NEWSPAPER GUILD has won another strike. On Christmas Eve the lockout at the Amsterdam News, a Harlem newspaper, ended with the granting of the guild's demands after an eleven weeks' fight during which the newspaper was forced into a receivership largely as the result of the withdrawal of advertising and of reader support. The nine full-time workers among the fifteen locked out are guaranteed that there will be no discharges for at least three months; strike-breakers are to be immediately discharged; the settlement specifies a guild shop with a five-day, forty-hour week, time off for overtime, the establishment of minimum wages, and a 10 per cent increase for those reinstated. It also provides for an adjustment committee, severance notice, and a union contract with the prospective buyers of the News. The News fight, with victory, is a heartening event, though it was in no sense a major battle. The opponent of the guild in this case was armed with none of those economic weapons which are at the disposal of powerful newspapers. But it is such battles carried through to a successful conclusion which will make the guild an effective fighting organization. And there is no doubt that the big publishers find the guild's victories disconcerting. An item which appeared in the New York Times of December 22 suggests as much. This item reported with some detail that the Amsterdam News had gone into receivership, but the principal reason for this state of affairs, namely, the boycott of advertisers and readers which the guild had been able to make effective, was not mentioned. Nor was the connection between the receivership and the strike referred to in the Times account of the settlement. The Times can hardly plead lack of space for this omission; it would seem difficult to deny that when a union bites a newspaper that's news. Unfortunately it is for the Times and its contemporaries to decide which news is fit to print.

The strike lasted for eleven weeks and was won, but the winning involved the bankruptcy of the Amsterdam News corporation which passed into a receivership dominated by white creditors. In other words, the operation was successful and if the patient did not die, he at least remained dead several weeks and is not yet out of danger.

Negotiations for the sale of the paper went on between the creditors and the proprietor of a colored paper in Baltimore, on the one hand, and a group of colored professional and business men in New York. The principal creditor, a white printer, whose bill was $21,000, refused the Baltimore offer because it involved his losing a large printing job. The New York group was similar in many respects to the group which was relinquishing the paper. It consisted of two physicians; one, a large stockholder in a Negro insurance society. These men tried to save the Amsterdam News, not primarily as a profit-making institution, but as a Negro institution in order that Harlem might have a paper which would fight race prejudice and discrimination as exhibited by white capital and white labor.

But on the other hand, they did recognize as their predecessors had not, that the black labor which they employed had a right to a voice in the conduct of the business. They assented to an adjustment committee, severance notice and a union contract. They hired ten of the fifteen strikers and raised the wages of stenographers to $21 and reporters to $30. They gave the editors an increase of 10% in salary.

What light does this strike throw on capital and work among Negroes?

First of all, just how far have Negroes accumulated capital and developed what may be called a capitalist class? Perhaps one of the most recent and interesting answers to this query is the report on Negro retail business made by the United States census in 1932. There are in the United States

The Negro and Capital

S[illegible]. 25,701 stores operated by Negroes selling a little over one hundred million dollars worth of goods a year. They were chiefly grocery stores, filing stations, restaurants, cigar stores and drug stores, and their average sales per year were a little less than $4,000. Now it has been estimated that a store with $12,000 worth of annual sales ~~reports~~ earns only a margin of $1,750 for payroll and profit. This means that the 26,000 Negro stores average only $600 a year for payroll and profit and ~~most~~ the bulk of this is obviously payroll and not profit. Beside retail business, Negroes have invested in farms, newspapers, banking and insurance, barber shops and boarding houses; but in all these cases, ~~a~~ the group of capitalists as distinct from workers ~~which has arisen among American Negroes~~, is ~~still~~ small and unimportant. What the trend here is not Capitalists ~~[illegible]~~, but workers with capital and with a few exceptions this is a characteristic development of Negro business.

How will this tendency develop in the future?

There are two current theories: one is illustrated by the attitude of the strikers on the Amsterdam News. There must come in the ranks of American labor increasing solidarity and unity of action across and despite the color line. The outlook for favorable consummation of this program ~~is not~~ seems today ~~inspiring, although there are~~ some lines of hope. B.W. It still remains true that the ~~mass~~ of the white working population in the United States does not regard the Negro population as fellows. They do not want to live near them; they are not willing in many cases to have their children attend the same schools; they do not want to work at the same bench or in the same establishments, and they particularly object to having Negroes receive equal wages and thus achieve equal economic power. This racial antagonism is broken down in some respects, but the breaking is slow. The ~~the~~ chief difficulty in the spread ~~and power~~ of unionism throughout the South is racial antagonism, and unionism across the color line has only appeared in the case of a few ~~one~~ sharecroppers who were at the very bottom of the industrial heap. This means that the development of labor solidarity between whites and blacks in the United States is not a matter of years, but of decades, if not indeed of a century or more, and that while it is developing,

Singularly enough, we have not seen a single suggestion that the ideal ending of this strike would have been for the editorial writers and some of the other employees to have resussitated the Amsterdam News as a co-operative enterprise. They would have been protected from outside competition by the fact that they were running a colored newspaper for colored readers. They knew by experience the job of producing such a paper and there is no reason in the world why these workers should not from their sympathizers have secured enough credit and available capital to have started such a co-operative enterprise. The idea was not mentioned. It was not thought of. All turned unanimously again to capitalism.

This end of the strike was hailed as a victory and it was victory, but as the Nation said: "It was in no sense a major battle." In fact, so far as the labor movement is concerned, it was a very minor battle. The proprietors of the Amsterdam News did not represent entrenched capital. They were not exploiting labor in any real sense of the word, and with their very limited resources, their defeat did not call for all of the ammunition ~~and paraphernalia~~ heavy artillery that New York labor brought to bear. On the other hand, this is a battle which is big in its implications for the future, both to the Negro problem and to the labor movement.

This is illustrated by the congratulatory messages that came in on the winning of the fight. John L. Lewis, champion of industrial unionism, regarded the victory as a "triumph for organization," but William Green, head of the A. F. of L., said not a single word. The conservative Negro citizens, most of them small property holders and none of them manual laborers, were careful in their statements: The rector of St. Phillips sees in the strike a triumph for "fundamental human rights." A colored assemblyman is glad that "the publication will continue," and a Presbyterian preacher explains that the union "had no hostility to Negro business or any other business." On the other hand, the Negro radicals ~~strike with the North and~~ regard the strike as a triumph in recognizing the right to "collective bargaining," and the example of Negro and white laborers fighting together as an opportunity for developing broad, pro-labor sentiment." Finally, Norman Thomas sees in it a victory for the "solidarity of workers." Another senses the tragedy of the situation as the exploitation of race loyalty for private gain. Now all this reveals curiously different reasons for congratulation, and the implicit and real differences revealed ~~in the Negro group~~ must frankly be faced.

while still another discovers some educated Negroes who are not "boot lickers"

First of all how far is there a Negro capitalist class?

The Negro leaders of Reconstruction recognized that Negroes must have capital, but they tried for the most part to have this capital furnished by the state in the shape of land to be distributed among Negro farmers, with some additional capital in the shape of draught animals and tools. For the most part, this proposal failed. Then came the advice of Booker T. Washington, who said to Negroes: go to work, save, invest, ~~and~~ until some Negroes become small capitalists. A good deal was accomplished along this line. Atlanta University made a study of Negro business in 1896 and showed that the small savings of numbers of Negroes had been invested in business of various sorts and that they were to a considerable extent successful. Building on this ~~knowledge~~ report, Mr. Washington formed the Negro Business League and this organization encouraged the investment of Negro savings and the hiring of Negro workers.

But the whole movement had from the beginning a co-operative trend. It was only partially investment for profit; it was rather the use of group savings in order to give the group employment, and this aspect was especially advertised and emphasized. Out of this group economy, there arose naturally the more specific and traditional type of investment corporation. There were banks, factories, ~~manufacturies and~~ for cotton goods and hair preparations and especially insurance. In insurance, the peculiar character of this Negro business was ~~again~~ illustrated. Negroes were discriminated against in white insurance companies. No matter what their physical condition, they could not get insurance at current rates and sometimes not at all. This gave the Negro insurance company a certain marginal advantage and money was widely collected from workers and professional people to start the Standard Life, which was the first old line life insurance company. In all these enterprises, however, the differentiation between exploiter and exploited was ~~not~~ by no means clear. There was not here the set-up which Karl Marx had in mind when he described capitalist and proletarian and stated the logical dialectic through which he could inevitably predict the clash of the two groups and ultimate overthrow of the capitalist through revolution. In the case of business among American Negroes, there was ~~no such~~ especially clearly differentiated capitalist class. The capital was owned by the workers, laborers, porters, washerwomen and a few professional people, ~~invested~~ not only must the black worker live, but he must live and achieve in such a way that his value as an ally will be recognized by the white worker. It is not enough, therefore, that he show himself willing to strike and lose his own job. He must not only achieve union wages and modern conditions of work, but he must also achieve a job, and he does not have today the chance of throwing responsibility for furnishing a job on a militant and powerful bourgeoisie. Organized work, ~~therefore,~~ among colored people becomes a more singular and definite adventure than among whites, and this leads to the second consideration. Careless talk among white laborers and reformers leads people to regard capital as the enemy of labor, when always what the great economic leaders have tried to say was that the capitalist who controls capital was the enemy, and that capital itself was indispensable and the only method of carrying on modern industry. That makes the problem of capital among American Negroes a different one than among whites. The whites have the mass of accumulated capital with its control of machines and material. White labor can share in that ownership and control through political power and organization. Black labor can share only to the extent that Negroes are a part of the white labor movement. But, on the other hand, while they are becoming a part of the white labor movement and during the serious and critical years of hesitation and racial barriers, there is a chance for Negroes to accumulate and control capital in certain small ways. They are consumers, which means that they spend each year some two thousand million dollars for the purchase of goods. The direction of this power can become in their hands a method of saving and a weapon for enforcing employment at decent wages.

We have had a tense, silent battle to such ends in Atlanta. A large chain store in a Negro section employs white clerks. One of them assaulted a Negro customer. As a result, Negroes have withdrawn their patronage. I passed the store on a Saturday night a month ago. It was brilliantly lighted with a large stock of goods and a number of clerks and not a single customer that I could see, while surrounding stores were fairly well patronized. This boycott without advertisement or much agitation has been going on for two months. The Ku Klux Klan has marched by in sheets and pillow-cases, written threats have been made throughout the community, but the community stands firm. I passed the store last Saturday night, it was closed.

~~The Negro and Capital~~

~~firm. What they will gain in the end is not clear.~~ What is clear here is the power which the Negro consumer, even with his small wage and unorganized condition, has in his hands today. ~~Now~~ That consuming power with the ~~curtailed~~ small savings of Negro workers and the professional classes, can without doubt command a considerable aggregate ~~amount~~ of capital. If that capital is used for investment in competition with white capital and for the same ends of profit-making, it will not accomplish much; but if on the other hand, it can be used by people fully conscious and intelligent concerning the fundamental change in industrial organization which is coming in the United States and throughout the world, this capital can be used to further that great and benevolent revolution and to prove to the world that American Negroes can become worthy citizens of the new socialistic state. Negro efforts to this end have appeared in many parts of the world: In the cocoa-raising and co-operative selling on the West Coast of Africa; in co-operative agriculture and fruit raising in Jamaica; and in mutual insurance and neighborhood retail stores in the United States.

The thing which the white American worker is loathe to learn is that his path to comfort and prosperity in the future depends less and less on his ability to become a capitalist and investor and live on profits. It is only through increased ~~savings~~ wages and better conditions of living, that prosperity is coming to the mass of Americans. If this is true of white workers, it is all the more true of Negro workers, and must be recognized in their philosophy and action.

How far can a Negro economic structure be built in America behind the tariff of race prejudice; that is, behind the discrimination and differences which will not yield easily to the incentive of profit and better wage. Instances of this may be seen in life insurance; amusements of various kinds; personal services, such as barber and beauty shops, boarding houses and hotels; and newspapers and magazines, catering to the Negro group. Within this partially closed circle, business may develop and make profit because of lack of general competition. But this very opportunity may ~~lead to~~ involve low wages, bad living conditions and exploitation of various sorts within the Negro group. If it does, how far is this problem of exploitation similar to or identical with the general white labor problem in the country and how far can it be fought by the same weapons? Suppose that Negro labor in an essentially Negro enterprise strikes, and the result of the strike is simply to abolish the ~~whole~~ Negro job and make any future job of the same sort dependent upon re-establishment under the same general conditions?

The real answer is a racial solidarity which persists until race prejudice disappears & yet is so organized as not to be used as a tool for the exploitation of any laboring class. This the Negro race can accomplish by making within its own group the interests of its laboring classes paramount & by putting into the hands of these people, through ~~by~~ cooperative enterprise, the ownership & control of capital support & finance Negro business. Eventually such a business structure can by growth & attaining metropolitan competition go beyond racial lines and become ~~and become~~ at least one of the pillars of Peace & ~~[redacted]~~ Revolution.

Very often, the investors themselves worked in the business along side the other employees. Their point of view was the point of view of workers and it was this reason that for a long time I argued that there was no Negro bourgeosie. On the other hand, as Negro business grew, it became more true that a group of Negro capitalists were arising as such, although they were still so small in number and power that their influence was not great, and in no case comparable to the influence of teachers & preachers.

Especially young, educated Negroes, became thoroughly bourgeois in outlook; that is, they looked forward to a time when Negro business should grow to such importance and power that Negro capital would dominate the scene, make treaty and alliance with white capital, and support and rule Negro labor. This, of course, was dangerous but not fatal. All that was necessary was by education and propaganda to make the intelligentsia of the Negro race see that their future & the future of the world lay with laborers rather than capitalists.

Moreover race prejudice tended to force this truth home even more quickly than formal education. Race discrimination separated Negro & white capitalists so thoroughly that the black capitalist was continually forced to make common cause with black labor. It needed only an intelligentsia with courage & skill & vision & refusal to compromise to carry on the fight against realistic facts.

This can be eliminated by

It became a fact but slowly to a considerable extent in banking, insurance and manufacture, in the small retail business, where still had the worker investing his own wages and working with his fellow employees. This was shown to be the case in the report on Negro retail business made by Charles E. Hall on the basis of the Census of 1930. He showed that there were in the United

"The Amsterdam News did not come into the possession of the Powell-Savory Corporation until the Receiver's sale was effected on Friday morning, January 10th.

"Our attitude towards the striking employees is cordial as is evidenced by our retaining ten of them.

It is, ~~to be sure,~~ then a question as to just how the curious problem posed by the strike on the Amsterdam News is going to be solved, but certainly it is not at all a clear and simple thing which many well-meaning radicals celebrate. It does not mean that the solidarity of white and black labor has come. It does not mean that the ~~stopping of~~ strike at the Amsterdam News was, in fact, a good thing. It was a calamity and evidently the facts of the situation show clearly that the paper could not afford to meet the standards of wage and conditions of work which the white papers in New York City were able to. Moreover, these same white papers and the white labor upon the papers, are not going to operate black labor as jobs in return for those which have been lost. It becomes, therefore, the bounden duty of thinking black folk to work through the intricacies of this situation and ~~and~~ try and find a new path to economic freedom for black men.

It is a question to reveal to black folk
& have them keep their good name of loud advertising

The ideology of the Negro-American ~~must be~~ is set largely by the surrounding society. That means that the average Negro must believe in capital and investment and incomes depending upon the exploitation of labor. No matter if the average American Negro fails to accomplish this in his own economic life and depends primarily upon wages, nevertheless, so long as this is his outlook and ideal, just so long he will be kept from sympathy and union with the white laboring class and will be always ready under any circumstances to experiment with investment as a step toward wealth.

37-9-75

(Insert)

The anomaly of this situation is, that on neither side is there the kind of development that is theoretically required. There is no group of Negro capitalists bent on the continued exploitation of Negro workers with power and resources to make an income in this way.

On the other hand, the Negro bourgeoisie in this case was for the most part genuinely sympathetic with the demands of these editorial workers and wanted with them to work out and continue a project which was working for the welfare of both groups.

But the Negro workers, trained in the ideology of the labor group, sought to separate the working class from any taint of the bourgeoisie and fight a battle against them. They, therefore, emphasized the difference between the small propertyholder and the laborer, when in fact the laborer is largely the small propertyholder and the propertyholder largely works for a living.

The question comes then, is this separation for theoretical purposes really necessary? Instead of the Negro group developing as white groups have developed into two great opposing economic classes, can they not now in the midst of their development compose their interests and by economic co-operation develop into bourgeoisie and proletariat?

and concentration of wealth, a smaller and smaller proportion of American workers will get their income in that way. If their future prosperity depends upon wages, how is this kind of income to be raised to civilized standards? Manifestly through an intelligent labor movement using its political power and guided by proper knowledge of great economic ideals. If any considerable proportion of the laboring class has no such ideals and is willing to be made tools of by those to whose interest it is to keep down wages, then this class of men is a danger and it must, on the one hand, be organized for proper economic advance, and on the other hand, it must be taught.

Curiously enough in America there has been very little attempt on the part of the labor movement or the liberal and radical organizations to teach Negroes. It has been factiously assumed that Negroes naturally and by instinct know their real paths of advantage, that because they have suffered in social and economic discrimination, they should know the best way to escape it. While then money and effort has been expended to show Southern white mill workers what their economic program should be, and to teach the mass of American labor in the North how to use its political power, the Negro has been left to the guidance of religion, formal education and philanthropy. The results in many respects have been deplorable, but these results can not be corrected by abuse and recrimmination. I have repeatedly heard trade American offi cials address Negroes and blame them bitterly because they were so often strikebreakers. I have heard Socialists, Progressives and Communists berate black folk for not joining their movements(out of hand,)and yet I knew that nine-tenths of the listeners were hearing these doctrines of economic emancipation for the first time from these critics and then not from teachers who explained, but from men who assumed knowledge and criticized the people who did not follow it.

First and foremost, the job which has disappeared must be restored in some way or other so that these young writers can earn a living. The need for the service which the Amsterdam News gave is manifest. One hundred thousand Negroes in Harlem want to read news and discussion about themselves and their fellows. Merchants and others want to advertise their wares and services. I secured a temporary office last summer by advertising in the Amsterdam News. Hundreds of apartments and furnished rooms are rented in that way. Now if service to these ends is to be restored, how can it be done? The newspaper tells us that two professional men, one connected with a Negro insurance society, are going to buy the bankrupt paper and re-issue it. Will they live up to the bargain made by the Guild as to wages and hours, etc.? Can they do it even if they want to and keep the paper solvent? What would be the object of the re-born periodical? To make profits for its new owners or to do public service? If the first object be true, can that profit be made and the promised wages paid? If the second be true, who will have greater interest in its accomplishment, the new owners or the workers on the paper? And if the workers on the paper, why should they not own it? Why if the led by white labor, and they proposition for re-building in accordance with broader ideals. Why does the union movement simply endorse the matter and expect a new capitalistic organization to carry the whole thing on more successfully than it has been carried on? It is a curious dilemma.

It happens, however, that we are facing in the United States a situation when it is no longer probable that any considerable number of the workers of America are going to better their future condition through profits. The prosperity and comfort of most Americans in the future is going to depend upon wages. We can not all become capitalists and investors. In fact, with the growing monopoly and the action was taken by the Central Trades and Labor Council of the A.F. of L., combined with the International Labor Garment Workers' Union, the United Hebrew Trades, the American Federation of Musicians, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, etc. Most unions some of these have been fair to Negro labor, but according to Ira Reid's recent study, 90% of the unions represented by these million men refused to admit Negroes as fellow laborers, either by constitutional enactment or by repeated and invaluable action. There can be no doubt that a great many members of the American Newspapers' Writers Guild would dislike to work with a Negro writer or would absolutely refuse. Despite this, the editorial strikers had a right to say that they had received in this case more whole-hearted support than perhaps ever before. If for instance similar co-operation from railway unions had been given the Pullman Porters, their success would have been immediate and instead of their being refused on technicalities; a seat on the Executive Council of the A. F. of L., they would have had full recognition and by this time decent wages and conditions of work.

On the midst of these difficulties, the proprietress

In other words, she and her family suddenly and rather unexpectedly were brought face to face with a phase of modern economic development with which they were not in the slightest degree acquainted. Just as Like the early capitalists of the nineteenth century, they looked upon the Amsterdam News as their property. They had put their wages in it and they had worked upon it. They were in no sense merely investing capitalists nor was their capital something that had come to them by chance, inheritance or good luck. It was money they had worked for and saved, and the husband gave a good deal most of his time as business manager and the others, women gave time, and thought and sacrifice to the enterprise. By December, 1934, the financial situation was so bad that the editorial writers were so uneasy for their jobs, that the proprietor took a stand and threatened that unless the union was given up, she was going to discharge them. Nothing, however, was actually done on either side until the following August. Eight more months passed.

In August, 1935 this month, matters were brought to a head when the owner in renewed efforts to curtail expenses cancelled the customary summer vacations with pay. The Guild thought it time to take a stand. They did not protest at the salaries vacation cut or at the necessity of curtailing expenses, but they did want to talk with the proprietor and propose a definite contract as a basis of future negotiations. The wages paid at the time were not un-

This logic reached two difficulties: first of all, most Negroes are employed by white capitalists and very few by Negro capitalists; and secondly, Negro capital is invested often in white business, so that a considerable proportion of Negro capital employs white labor. The interests of white and Negro labor are largely identical but it is white labor that has hitherto refused to see this. A century's effort on the part of Negro workers to join the white labor movement has been singularly unsuccessful. Ira Reid, who has recently studied the situation, tells us that even today 96% of the trade unions exclude Negroes, eit

In September, 1935, a citizens' committee urged Mrs. Davis to negotiate with the employees. She refused. October, 1935, the mayor urged Mrs. Davis to negotiate. She refused and the Guild campaigned, reducing its circulation and advertising.

November, 1935, the Ministers' Union, Citizens' Committee, advertisers and others, urged Mrs. Davis to negotiate. She refused. Thirty-four pickets were arrested and freed.

December 28, 1934, Mrs. Davis and her lawyer called in the office force and said she would have no union on her paper and threatened their discharge.

In August, 1935, a notice was posted cancelling vacations with pay. Previously vacations had been given on the basis of one week with pay and one week without pay. Now the two weeks were to be given without pay. On account of this, the Guild August 12 decided to submit a contract as the basis of negotiations. The conference was held August 20, but was not successful.

In May, 1935, it was thought that perhaps the paper could be resuscitated by adding new features and raising the price to 10¢. The experiment was costly. The indebtedness to the printer increased $8,000 from May until October, while the circulation dropped from 32,000 to 18,000. By October, the deficit had reached $800 a week and the firm's reserves were exhausted and its credit curtailed. Something drastic had to be done. During the year, a dozen persons were dropped from the business department and in the printing department the number of editions, which originally were seven, was reduced to one, which saved about $200 a week. Then the owners decided to prune the editorial department.

The publisher claims that she first discharged three persons for purposes of economy and afterward five more because nothing was done to get the paper out. Thereupon a strike took place, Oct 9 — or a lock-out

"A vicious campaign has been waged against the paper. Aided and abetted by the Guild and other union organizations, eight members of the home office staff and all but two of the outside staff who were members of the Guild, took their case to the public and described the publisher as a malevolent persecutor of labor. The sympathy of many intelligent and influential citizens was won through this deceitful plea. These citizens never took the trouble to find out the publisher's side. A vigorous campaign was waged against circulation and advertising. The circulation was not injured, but valuable local advertising was forced out of the paper, not because the advertiser supported the strikers in principle, but because he did not want his establishment picketed."

By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

I used this title in 1915 and I use it again now as it is just as true. War must be feared today not on the great European front where the world is watching, but in out-of-the-way places where smooth propaganda minimizes and even disguises the reasons, and where valuable private profit may be reaped. There is oil along the eastern highlands of Africa and in Abyssinia, and there is none in Italy; there are valuable metals, including gold. Above all, here from the Blue Nile and the Atbara comes half the water supply of the Nile Valley, including the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan and Egypt itself.

The great ramparts of Abyssinia, soaring over seas of hills and mountains, form the greatest stronghold of all Africa, and the one part which has natural barriers for defense. It was a German who said that the power which held the Abyssinian highlands could dominate the imperialism of Europe in Africa.

Abyssinia is a pear-shaped mountain clump, cut into island-like sections which are separated by deep gorges and ravines. It is nearly as large as France and Spain combined, and looms high on the northwest toward the Valley of the Nile, on the southwest toward the Great Lakes, and on the east toward the sea. It rises in three great terraces: a plane of rocky strata; a plateau about eight thousand feet above the sea, and above this snow-capped mountains which sometimes rise nearly another eight thousand feet. "It looks," says the traveller, "like a storm-tossed sea, suddenly solidified."

The highest ramparts of this "citadel of Africa", lying as they do between the fever-infested South and the sun-baked Sudan, form a fortress which would be difficult even for a modern army to storm. It is to her mountains that Abyssinia owes the fact that her population is the only dark race in Africa not yet under European domination.

In these highlands, both the Blue Nile and the Atbara rise, and thus Abyssinia commands a full half of the waters of the Nile, and dominates the most direct route to the Nile Valley. Moreover, its natural seaboard commands the whole of one side of the Gulf of Aden, and the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. When the Suez Canal was opened these waters became the throat of the British Empire.

When the canal was opened in 1865, its significance for the British Empire was evident, and in 1876, the dual control of England and France in Egypt was arranged. Modern commercial imperialism began rapidly to assume its essential characteristics. Africa was discussed at the Congress of Berlin in 1878. France had begun her African empire in Algeria in 1830, and now both Bismark and Salisbury were willing for her to add Tunis, despite the fact that this site of ancient Carthage belonged logically to Italy.

The scramble for Africa began. In 1881, France seized Tunis, and in 1882 England seized Egypt, while England, France and Italy with one accord turned toward northeast Africa and the coasts of Abyssinia. The Italians on some shadowy claim took what is now Eritrea in 1882, but were blocked by both Great Britain and France from further extension South. Great Britain took British Somaliland in 1884; the French already had Obock and nearly came to blows with the British until a treaty was made in 1887.

Meantime, the situation of the British in Egypt had peculiar repercussions in Abyssinia. Egypt was groaning under the debt which had been deliberately encouraged by France and England. Her rulers, who had squandered the proceeds, sought to keep up the interest by ruinous and exhaustive taxation. Europe intervened to insure payment of interest on her debt. Crushed between Europe and Turkey, Egypt learned to Arabi Pasha, and cried "Egypt for the Egyptians," and rebelled. The English trained their guns upon Alexandria and defeated Arabi at Tel-el-Kebir. This left the former rulers in nominal control, while the English held the real power along the Lower Nile.

But above the First Cataract in ancient Ethiopia, misrule and extortion had long been worse than in Egypt. Before the Arabi rebellion in 1878, the mulatto Rabah had swept through the Bahr-El-Ghazel and the regions south of Lake Chad. Now there arose a greater leader and a vaster motif. Mohammed Ahmed, son of a priest in Dongola, had established headquarters 150 miles above Khartum. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, majestic black man, with great eyes. He had visions. Disciples gathered around him, and eventually he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammedan revelation.

The country went into the throes of a religious crusade against Egypt. A holy war was proclaimed, and a strong army organized. The Mahdi put down blasphemy, feasting, drinking, smoking and swearing. Thousands followed him. The Egyptians in 1883 sent an army of 10,000 under the Englishman, Hicks Pasha. They were annihiliated, with only 300 left alive. Kordofan, Dafur and the Bahr-El-Ghazel surrendered. Only a German, Emin Pasha, still upheld Egyptian power down in the Equatorial provinces next to Uganda. By the end of 1883, the Mahdi was master of a territory equal to Spain, France and Germany, and his army was closing in on Khartum, the capital of the Sudan.

England hesitated. Gladstone and the Little Englanders had driven Disraeli from power, and ruled from 1880-1885, or at least had as much power as any radical government could have in England so long as the Tory House of Lords held the veto. It was impossible for them to withdraw from Egypt and maintain English dividends, although they declared the English stay there but temporary; but Gladstone preemptorily refused to undertake the conquest of the Sudan.

But the Sudan was a choice morsel, not only for the heads of Egyptian slavery and misrule, but also for English commercial development in the Valley of the Nile and in East Africa. English imperialists were not without resouree, and they seized upon Chinese Gordon. This man was a religious fanatic, ill-balanced if not at times insane. He had fits of rage, courage and murder. He had fought in the Crimean War, and played a large role in the Chinese upheaval. He went on sprees with the Bible in one hand and a flask of brandy in the other; he lived among the London poor; and was about to go to the Belgian Congo when English commeree forced Gladstone to send him to the Sudan, ostensibly to "report" on the situation. Gordon reached Khartum in 1884, and was made Governor-General. He proceeded to recognize slavery even though the suppression of the slave trade was one of the ostensible excuses for English interference in the Sudan. The Mahdi swept between him and Cairo, and cut off his communications. England held indignation meetings and public prayers, but Gladstone was determined not to be entangled. Osman Digna, the Mahdi's general, marched to the borders of Abyssinia and drove back the English army. They retaliated in a successful attack, but Gladstone refused to let them follow it up. He compelled them to withdraw, and declared that the invasion of the Sudan would be a war of comquest against a people "rightly struggling to be free."

The Mahdi, with thirty thousand men, laid seige to Khartum. Gladstone was certain that Gordon could retreat from Khartum if he wished, and that his persistence in staying there was a "bluff" on the part of the Imperialists to force the hands of the Liberals. Hartington threatened to resign. Gladstone had to yield. An army of relief, with 10,000 troops, was slow in getting started, and too late to take advantage of the high waters of the Nile. Gordon's hair turned white. Hundreds died daily of hunger in Khartum. The dead lay unburied. The assault began. Gordon hesitating whether to fight or commit suicide, finally put on his uniform and rushed downstairs. He met four tall, grim, black men, and died.

In England, Gladstone was called a murderer and a traitor.

For thirteen years, the Mahdi and his successor, the Khalifa, ruled in the Sudan. Thus, the whole of the Sudan was lost to Egypt and England. The Egyptian garrisons on the northern border of Abyssinian were finally withdrawn in 1886, and Abyssinian French, British and Italian possessions on the coast were in danger of being overwhelmed by the Mahdi.

This looked like a rare opportunity for German imperialism. Between German East Africa and the Egyptian Sudan, lay the great territory of Uganda, where Catholics, Protestants and Mohammedans had been merrily cutting each others throats in their efforts to convert the heathen. The Germans pushed warily up into this country, while shut up in the Equatorial provinces of the Sudan was the German Emin Pasha. Germany determined to rescue him, while England spent $145,000 on the Stanley expedition. Both nations were seeking to fall heir to Egypt in Central Africa. England and Stanley arrived first, and found Emin unwilling to be "rescued." He wanted to hold these provinces and turn them over to Germany. The Khalifa, however, was pressing him hard, and when Stanley appeared in 1888, Emin reluctantly followed him, and they met Karl Peters and the German expedition which had been busily engaged in making treaties with the local chiefs for German expansion. Emin, with his black wife and mulatto daughter, finally arrived at Zanzibar, where he accepted the post under the German administration in East Africa.

Late in 1884, the scramble for Africa became bitter. England was encroaching upon the Portuguese colonies; Germany had appeared in the field; France was at work in North Africa. France, England and Italy had seized the coast of Abyssinia, and in the vast Valley of the Congo, comprising the whole center of Africa, little Belgium had proposed an international state. An European conference to settle the rules of the game for the further looting of Africa seemed necessary. It came together in Berlin in November, 1884, and lasted through February, 1885. The United States was represented. The Congo was recognized not as an international state but as the personal property of the King of Belgium. Certain rules of procedure for the further seizure of Africa were adopted, and before the conference was ended, the German Colonial Party forced Bismark's hand, seized Zanzibar and East Africa, and appeared as a full-fledged African colonial power.

There were several significant occurrences in 1885. The Mahdi died after the fall of Khartum and was succeeded by the Khalifa. England came to the verge of war with Russia over the approach to India. The Gladstone government fell in June, and the Tories under Salisbury, came into power. Salisbury, looking toward a beginning of re-assertion of power in Central Africa, and fearing that the Khalifa would drive Europe from the coast of Abyssinia, suggested that Italy seize the Port of Massowah, which the withdrawal of Egypt left unoccupied. This was disloyal to Abyssinia, since only the year before England had signed a treaty of alliance with Johannes IV. and with Johannes' help had held back the Mahdi. To hand over to the Italians, Massowah which belonged logically to the Abyssinians and to which Italy had no shadow of claim was an extraordinary breach of faith. Italy proceeded to take Massowah, as Giolitti says, as "a consolation prize," having been cheated out of Tunis, held back in Tripoli; out-manoeuvered both at the Congress of Berlin and the Berlin Conference; as well as losing her chance to participate in Egypt.

Once having placed her foot in Massowah, Italy proceeded to make alliance with Johannes' chief enemy, Menelik of Shoa, a pretender to the Abyssinian throne. Johannes found himself between two enemies, Italy and the Khalifa, and eventually was killed in battle by the latter in 1889. Immediately, Menelik proclaimed himself

King of Kings, and in May signed with the Italians the celebrated treaty of Uccialli.

To prove his gratitude to the Italians for their alliance and help with the armies, Menelik ceded Massowah to Italy ~~the territory which they had already seized~~. But the Italians, drunk with new ambition, swept on, calmly advanced into Abyssinia, and toward the end of 1889, seized Adowa, while Menelik was busily subduing his enemies. They even penetrated into the Harrar, the trading region inland from the British and French coast, thus coming into direct dispute, not only with Abyssinia, but with the claims of these other countries. ~~France and Great Britain~~. Thereupon, France and Great Britain made a secret treaty which allowed them to oppose Italy's advance if they pleased; a treaty which again put Great Britain in the unenviable position of "double-crossing" Italy, just as she had previously deceived Abyssinia.

In the very month, May, 1889, when Italy signed the treaty of Uccialli with Menelik, Crispi, assuming that Abyssinia had already become an Italian protectorate, determined to get the adjoining Somaliland coast. This last stretch of coast, called the Benadir Coast, belonged to Zanzibar, but the territories of the Sultan had been divided up between the British and the Germans, except Benadir. The Italians immediately got a concession of this territory for a down payment and promised annunity. The Italian government notified Lord Salisbury that a protectorate had been established over the Somali Coast, and six months later, this was extended as far as British East Africa.

In 1892, the coast became an Italian possession. The natives rebelled, but reinforcements were rushed in, and the land turned over to an Italian company for exploiting the mining rights. The native ownership of land was completely ignored.

The stage was now set for Italy's final coup. In the seventeenth clause of the Treaty of Uccialli, there arose a characteristic misunderstanding. The Abyssinian text, which was the only one actually signed, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, shall be at liberty to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments." The Italian translation, whichwas made in Italy, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, consents to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments."

The treaty was signed May 2, 1889. October 1, 1889, there was an additional treaty by which Menelik was to receive a loan of four million lire from an Italian bank under the guaranty of the Italian government, and on security of the Harrar Custom House. October 12, 1889, Crispi notified the powers by circular letter under the General Act of the Berlin Conference of 1884-1885, that Abyssinia was an Italian protectorate. On May 5, 1894, he signed agreements with England in which England recognized Abyssinia as an Italian protectorate. A map of Africa by treaty was published in 1894, with the sanction of the English Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which this rape of Abyssinia was recognized.

But both England and Italy had reckoned without their host. There is no doubt but that the Treaty of Uecialli was a clumsy forgery of the same sort that had previously transferred sovereignty of a larger part of Africa from black men to white. Menelik, however, did not choose to submit. He not only denounced the treaty but he took up arms. He declared by proclamation: "Ethiopia has need of no one. She stretches out her hands to none but God."

The French supplied Menelik willingly with arms and munitions. The forces of Italy and Ethiopia met at Adowa, and Italy's army of ~~forty thousand~~ 100,000 was annihilated March 1, 1896.

Suddenly, the headwaters of the Nile, and the Nile Valley, ~~and Egypt, the domination of the Red Sea,~~ and the path from the Cape-to-Cairo, ~~all these~~ were in the hands of black men,--the black dervishes of the Sudan, and Menelik II., King of the Kings of Ethiopia and Emperor of Abyssinia. An English officer wrote: "If I were the Mahdi, I would make Egypt pay for every quart of water that runs down the Nile."

With Abyssinia safe in Italian hands, Great Britain had the black dervishes of the Sudan bottled up. She could let them simmer in their own wrath until she leisurely extended her "influence" over them. She had (dominated Uganda indirectly since 1890, and) in 1894 annexed Uganda formally, thus definitely curbing German expansion in East Africa. In 1895, the Jameson raid had taken place in South Africa as the first step toward a war destined to crush the Dutch and make South Africa a British province. The Cape-to-Cairo idea, fostered by Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes, had seized the immagination of the empire. Agreement was made with Leopold of Belgium which secured a perpetual lease of a large bloc of territory at the headwaters of the Nile, and filled in the gap between the Great Lakes.

France was alarmed, Germany protested, and there was talk of war. But the British Empire yielded a little, and Lord Roseberry consented to withdraw the Congo agreement. The French, thereupon, took a forward step, and determined to push from French Africa eastward to the Nile. Menelik of Abyssinia gave aid and comfort, and in 1894, made a concession to the French to build a railway from Djibuti through the Harrar to Addis Abbaba and the White Nile. French officers trained the Abyssinian army. Great Britain warned France of her own and Egypt's claims in the Nile Valley and that she would consider any attempt to dispute these claims as an "unfriendly act." Paris declared that England accompanied a legally indefensible claim with a threat of war, and insisted that the control of the Sudan and the Nile Valley was an unsettled question.

But the Battle of Adowa changed the whole situation. Italy could no longer pull English chestnuts out of the fire, and French plans were manifest. Salisbury, again at the English helm, moved quickly. March 5, the news of Adowa reached England, and March 12, England suddenly learned that Chinese Gordon was a Christian martyr, who had been murdered by heathen. She ordered the conquest of the Sudan as the first step toward evacuating Egypt. Kitchener, with Maxim-Nordenfeldt guns, moved up the Nile to Dongola. He captured Khartum in September, and ordered the tomb of the dead Mahdi publicly desecrated. The Khalifa committed suicide in 1898. England was not a minute too soon. That very ~~month~~ September, Marchand, the Frenchman, was at Fashoda awaiting the French and Abyssinian expeditions from Abyssinia. Indeed, one Abyssinian expedition under a royal prince had already reached the river but had been decimated by fever. The other expedition under a French commander did not materialize. For a moment, the world stood still with world war in the air.

The French had dispatched Captain Marchand to the French Congo April 25, with instructions to march to the White Nile. They arranged an Abyssinian expedition to join him. The idea was that the two expeditions should meet on the Nile and establish a French claim to the Upper Valley of the Nile. When Kitchener arrived, he would find the French and Abyssinians stretched across the Cape-to-Cairo path. The Abyssinian expedition failed through the negligence of the French governor of Djibuti. When Marchand reached Fashoda in 1898, there was no fortress and no expedition of French and Abyssinians from the east to support him. Kitchener proceeded south to meet Marchand and a small body of Senegalese soldiers. The sympathies of the world were with Marchand. War was imminent. But the French fleet was not equal to the British and the French army at Fashoda was greatly inferior to the British army. March 21, 1899, an Anglo-French declaration was issued, which gave the Nile Valley to Great Britain. France was bitter but her conquest of Madagascar in 1896 was recognized.

Italy thus stood disillusioned over her Colonial dream with only the barren sands of Tripoli and two bits of Abyssinian coast. This irked her sorely, while it brought Abyssinia again to the notice of the world. Who are the Abyssinians and what is their government?

Haile Selassie II. is by tradition the 384th King to sit upon the throne; and leaving out mere tradition, we know of at least 200 Abyssinian kings in historic times. Abyssinia represents the fourth step inward of African culture since the prehistoric migration which spread the Negro race over the world. First came the Egyptian mulattoes on the Lower Nile, with boundaries which lay 500 miles south of the delta at the First Cataract. Then, comes ancient Ethiopia and modern Nubia, the land of black men, where Egyptian culture took refuge against the assaults of Asia. Here, at Napata, centered a civilization which ruled the world from 750 to 600 B.C. Asia, and the encroaching desert, drove the center of culture again south 500 miles further to Meroe; that shield-like island, formed by the waters of the Atbara and the Blue Nile. Here reigned the Candaces and here black culture flourished in trade and met Greek influence and Roman power.

New enemies appeared; not only a continually failing water-supply, but black hordes from the West and Southwest and new conquerors from the North. The power of Ethiopia declined in this strife, and for 600 years, Arabs and Nubians fought over its remains. Then came the black Fungs from the West. Arabs ruled in the North, and Fungs in the South,--a division which lasted down to the middle of the 19th Century. Finally, about 1840, Egypt conquered the Sudan, and for forty years reduced it to ruin and misery. It was against this rule that the Mahdi made the first successful revolt.

Meantime, however, "The Citadel" of the South, which was Abyssinia, and represented the fourth step down from Egypt, held its independence against Islam and heathendom. In these highlands bordering the Red Sea, Semitic settlers from Arabia had filtered in in a series of movements extending over a long period of time, and became gradually incorporated with the original black population. Among these immigrants were many Jews who took refuge here from the conquerors of Palestine. Thus, a race of Semitic mulattoes arose and established a kingdom which centered around Axum, a trading post established about the First Century, A.D.

This kingdom took its name, "Abyssinia", from a Semitic tribe, "Habesh"; but the people of Habesh were neither contented nor safe in being simply Abyssinian. Trade and defense forced them toward ancient Ethiopia, and they disputed with the Arabs and Nubians over the domination of the island of Meroe. Here they claimed sovereignty as early as 356 A.D., and actually destroyed its capital a century later. Greek and Roman influence filtered into Abyssinia from the East, and trade made Axum flourish. Myths of its obscure origin began to arise: the Jewish myth of descent of its royal house from Solomon; the Negro myth of its descent from Aethiopis, whose tomb was pointed out at Axum.

The new Christian religion came to Abyssinia in the Fourth Century after Christ, and thus a third great center of Christianity, in contrast to Rome and Constantinople, was established. Then came the red wave of conquest from the North, and the history of Abyssinia becomes dim and shadowy. As Gibbon has written, "Encompassed by her enemies, Ethiopia slept a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom she was forgotten."

We catch glimpses of Abyssinian history here and there, as when in 525, at the request of the Emperor Justinian, the Abyssinians in sixty ships landed in Arabia, and captured Yemen, which they held for seventy-five years. In the Tenth Century, a certain Judith or Esther usurped the throne and the Falashas or black Jews, together with the native Zagwes, ruled.

It was not until the 15th Century that the explorations of the Portuguese again brought Abyssinia to the attention of the world. The Portuguese appeared in Abyssinia in 1532 in time to aid them with 400 horsemen against the attacks of the Mohammedans, who had advanced as far south as Massowah. The Portuguese located in Abyssinia the source of the legend of Prester John, that ghostly Christian ruler, who during the Middle Ages was supposed to be reigning in Africa or India, and was the source of many legends.

Abyssinia from early times was divided into a number of great districts, each administered by an hereditary chief called a Ras. Over these chiefs ruled a Negus, called a "King of Kings". When this overlord was a strong man, he ruled a powerful country. When he was weak, there was anarchy and confusion.

Such a period of disintegration was in progress about the middle of the 19th Century under Johannes; but he was succeeded in 1855 by the Emperor Theodore, a gifted, ruthless man, who came to the throne at the time when European imperialism was being organized and stretching out inquiring hands toward Asia and Africa. Scientists, traders, missionaries and adventurers wandered into Abyssinia. Theodore was well-disposed toward Europeans, and curious about their countries, but inevitable misunderstanding occurred, both in matters of etiquette and religion. "I know the tactics of European governments," said the observing Theodore, "when they try to acquire an Eastern state. First, they send out missionaries; then consuls to support the missionaries; then battalions to support the consuls. I am not a Rajah of Hindustan to be made mock of in that way."

But Theodore needed alliance and friendship with Europe, if they came to him on honorable terms, to help organize his kingdom and beat back the threatened domination of Turks and Egyptians. He considered himself insulted, however, when the British and others after making fair promises, forgot all about him and ignored his overtures; in angry retaliation he seized and imprisoned the British minister and other Europeans.

Thereupon, in 1867, the British sent Napier with an army of 12,000 men to invade Abyssinia. The expedition found Theodore busy with a rebellion, and the invading army had the support of these rebels. Theodore was surrounded in his capital where the British troops with superior rifles killed two thousand Abyssinians, while losing only 20 whites. Theodore surrendered and released the prisoners, but Napier had promised the rebel chiefs to degrade and dethrone him. The English artillery opened fire on Magdala and Theodore shot himself dead. His body was allowed to be mutilated by a mob, while Napier received a peerage.

Anarchy ensued in Abyssinia between 1868 and 1872, with two rival claimants to the throne, Johannes of Tigre and Menelik of Shoa. In the midst of this dispute, the Egyptians pushed into Northern Abyssinia, seized some of the Border provinces, and dominated the trade to the coast. In 1876, however, they were nearly annihilated in Jura, although still in possession of Massowah on the coast, and the province of Harrar. Then came the Mahdi. We have seen how Italy aspired to dominate Abyssinia, but was frustrated by Menelik II., who became emperor in 1889, and ruled until 1913.

Let us turn now to Italy which thus came into contact with Abyssinia, and is pursuing the same object today. Chamberlain, father of the modern phase of English imperialism, once said frankly: "Empire is commerce." Despite effort to camouflage this as the "white man's burden," the essential truth remains.

Modern industrial imperialism is a method by which governments lay open areas of cheap labor and raw material for exploitation through private agencies. The cost of such exploitation would be much too great for private enterprise alone to bear profitably. But if it can be done by the public taxation which supports armies and navies, and gives them strength and blood of young men, then there is a chance for private enterprise to make large profits by small investment which secures raw material and cheap labor. Moreover, unless such raw material and cheap labor are thus made available to a country like Italy, rivals will seize them and make it impossible for the lagging country to amass wealth and capital and secure recognition among the Great Powers which today control industry and commerce.

The profits upon private enterprise invested in the cheap labor of brown and black men, and in the cheap but essential materials which they raise, have reached such heights which put unrivaled power in the hands of nations which own them. It was such considerations that made Germany rush suddenly into colonial enterprise after the Franco-Prussian War, and today pushes Italy toward Abyssinia.

The nationalization of Italy had finally been accomplished in 1870. But Italy was poor and undeveloped. Industries sprang up in the North, while agriculture dominated the South. But, if Italy was to become one of the Great Powers, she had to have modern industrial development, and that she conceived depended upon imperial expansion. Her treatment by France in the matter of Tunis and Tripoli, and by England, in the case of Abyssinia, threw her into the arms of Germany and Austria, and she became part of the Triple Alliance. By taking Tripoli from Turkey in 1911-

1912, Italy had helped precipitate there world-wide conflagration, and had gained for herself a strip of barren sand by "a perfect nightmare of horror...a veritable carnage." Nevertheless, on the eve of the World War, Prime Minister Salandra declared that Italy's policy would be dictated by "Sacred Egoism". Thus, in 1914, Italy, holding herself aloof, offered herself to the highest bidder.

It is said that at one time France dangled the Port of Djibuti with its Abyssinian railway terminal before Italy, and even the Colony of Tunis ~~in 1935~~. At any rate, in the secret treaty of London, it was expressly agreed by Great Britain, France, and Russia, not only that Italy was to receive large portions of Austrian territory, but that: (Article XIII. of the Treaty of London of April 26, 1915.)

"In the event of an extension of the French and British colonial possessions in Africa at the expense of Germany, France and Great Britain recognise to Italy in principle the right of demanding for herself certain compensations, in the form of an extnsion of her possessions in Eritrea, Somaliland, Libya, and the colonial districts bordering on French and British colonies."

Italy immediately entered the war on the side of the Allies, and there ensued lively discussion of future colonial development by imperial Italian bodies, like the Istituto Coloniale Italiano, the Societá Africana d'Italia, the Societá Italiana di Esploranioni, and the Istituto Orientale di Napoli, and by a number of publicists. For her entrance into the war, Italy paid a terrible toll. Six hundred thousand lay dead and a million were wounded. The country seethed with disillusion and discontent, and the Paris Conference, by ignoring the Treaty of London, gave Italy what she regarded as a "mutilated victory", despite the territory which she gained from Austria. As a result, the Socialists, who had opposed Italy's entrance in the war, captured the government in 1919, and the beginnings of proletarian revolution in the form of sydicalism appeared. ~~Factories were seized and labor reached for control.~~

Italy ~~must~~ had to choose and choose quickly between a redistribution of wealth and economic power dictated by the working classes, or a re-organization of industry in the interests of capital but so far restrained that the mass of workers could be kept at labor in peaceful subjection. The resultant Fascism, started by the march on Rome

In the second half of 1919, Italy passed through a severe financial crisis, and the lire fell to one-third of its value, while prices were eight times their height in 1913.

Five hundred thousand workmen seized factories in North Italy, and this was regarded as the beginning of revolution. But it was not, for Italy cannot exist without importing wheat, coal, iron, cotton, mineral oil and copper. And to pay for these, she must have foreign credits.

in 1922, and gradually developed, faced a tremendous task. It must keep peace, restore confidence, curb the power of capital, furnish more capital, and insure profits. These contradictory objects could be carried out only if the first could be continuously assured, and the last realized in fact. Confidence and faith in Italy, and peaceful submission to the burdens of war and oppression, were accomplished by a subtly conceived psychological onslaught, which revived in the minds of young Italy the glory of Rome and the expansion of colonial empire. For glory, it appealed to youth in its curiously illogical national hymn: "Youth, springtime of beauty. Facism is the safeguard of our liberty." What could thrill young Italy more than revenge for Adowa?

"I heard Mussolini say on one occasion, speaking from the balcony of the Chigi Palace on the Corso in Rome--this was before he moved over to the Palazzo Venezia--'Camice Nere [Blackshirts] when you look at the map, you see that the island of Sicily is the southernmost limit of our empire. But I swear to you that the day will come when the island of Sicily will be the geographical center of our empire!'"

The history of Rome was invoked, and Mussolini began sabre-rattling on a tremendous scale, and particularly emphasized the fact that Italy proposed to have colonies where she could settle her expanding population, and that also that population must expand. The millions of Italians who had immigrated to North and South America must in the future find homes under the Italian flag. Moreover, Mussolini said frankly that Tripoli and Eritrea were not enough. "These two colonies alone cannot solve our population problem, mark this well!" He emphasized the plight of the Italians in Tunis. There were ninety thousand of them compared with seventy-one thousand Frenchmen, and the French were threatening to turn Italian children into French citizens. Mussolini protested bitterly, and demanded a great navy to protect a future empire.

What all this means is made clearer by considering the present Colonial position of Italy. She has three African colonies: Lybia, which is the former Tripoli and Cyrenaica. Together, they have 687,914 inhabitants, and an area of about 900,000 square miles. On the coast bordering Abyssinia, are two other colonies: one, Eritrea, with 621,000 inhabitants, and the other, Somaliland, with 1,000,000. Most of these inhabitants in all three colonies are natives, there being in the total population of two and one-third million, less than 50,000 Italians.

The Fascist Party first represented young patriots, but soon they were given pecuniary support by landholders and industrialists, who hasten to join their ranks. And today, Italian Fascism is a social revolution guided by landed capitalism.

The colonies do not pay for themselves, and it costs Italy some $25,000,000 a year above their income to balance the budget. And of this, $25,000,000, $15,000,000 goes for a local army officered by Italians and manned mainly by natives.

In the meantime, Abyssinia was bestirring herself. Menelik, the great emperor, died the year before the World War. He was succeeded by a daughter, and then by a grandson, whose hatred of Europeans and fanatical attitude on religion made him no fit instrument for a diplomatic role. Finally, Ras Tafari, a leading prince, was nominated as successor; he was crowned King in 1928 and Emperor, November 2, 1930, amid the pomp of one of the oldest branches of the Christian Church. Significantly, he determined to call his country "Ethiopia, the land of the Burnt Faces," and not Abyssinia, from the Semitic tribe of Habesh. To the far-sighted, the coronation of Haile Selassie II., presented at once foreboding and encouraging omens. He represented the beginning of a new era. Forces were at work to end the whole system of European aggression upon colored countries. In the formation of the League of Nations was the idea of a world tribunal where the lesser nations could at least be heard. The idea of the mandates was to put certain colonies under the guarandianship of the League of Nations, and prevent at least the extremes of exploitation. In ~~Abyssinia~~ Ethiopia there seemed to lie the best chance for a new development. An unhampered tradition went back thousands of years that enabled these black men and brown to be proud of their color, their ancestry, their history. Surely, here was a chance to begin a new world.

For if ~~Abyssinia~~ Ethiopia thus represented a beginning of new things, it also represented a continuation of the old, and this fact, too, was clear at the coronation. Representatives of thirteen countries braved the difficulties of travel and were present at Addis Addaba. There was the Duke of Glouster, son of the King of England; there was the Duke of Udine, son of the King of Italy; there was ~~Marshal~~ Franchet d'Esperey, ~~representing~~ a marshal of France; and a royal prince of Japan. The British representative stood, always, at the emperor's right hand, and the Italian at his left. It looked almost like a foregathering of cormorants watching a feast, where each was seeing that one did not get all and each maneuvering for the largest possible share.

Castor of Von Mackensen and

a little brown man with curly hair, dignified and serious, educated in France, and eager for the advance of his country. As Prince, he had visited England, France and the continent, and wished to come to the United States, but the United States did not invite him. He began sending a few Abyssinians to be educated abroad; he began to reorganize the system of justice, and tried to re-build the state in many ways. There were difficulties. Some were internal; ~~Abyssinia is~~ Ethiopia is more than two thousand years old with an unbroken tradition, strong feudal princes, old families, and inbred customs opposed to change. The emperor had to attack evils like domestic slavery slowly and with care. Yet in this case, European philanthropy, with rapacious commercialism back of it, hammered at the reformer and forced him to set a pace which time may prove far too fast for his slow changing nation. It is quite possible that the new emperor, by his innovations and European policy, has strained dangerously the allegiance of some of his powerful followers, linked as they are to ancient allegiance and hoary customs.

~~The Emperor has persisted~~ Ethiopia, against the protest of England, and Italy, but with the backing of France, ~~his country~~ entered the League of Nations in 1923, and in 1928, Italy and Abyssinia signed a treaty of friendship and arbitration for all disputes to remain in force twenty years.

Nevertheless, the international relations of Ethiopia, coupled with old efforts at economic intervention, make the situation of the country difficult. In 1906, the agreement between Great Britain, France and Italy to respect and preserve the integrity of Abyssinia was really designed to prevent industrial concessions made to one from injuring the claims of any of the others. The notes between Great Britain and Italy in 1925 secretly divided Ethiopia into spheres of influence with Great Britain dominant in the regions of Lake Tsana and the headwaters of the Nile, and Italy along the borders of Eritrea and Somaliland. Ethiopia brought this treaty to the notices of the League of Nations. Mussolini explained, and MacDonald half apologized, and yet later when certain American engineers in 1927 signed a $20,000,000 contract to dam the waters of Lake Tsana, England insisted upon her prior rights, and by quiet diplomacy broke the contract.

So far, the Ethiopians have avoided the pitfalls which put Algeria, Tunis and Egypt into debt-servitude to the bankers of Europe. Ethiopia has at present no public debt, and the banking facilities of the country which were for a long time under the domination of Egypt, and thus indirectly of England, have recently been consolidated under the Bank of Ethiopia.

On the other hand, in the matter of communications, Ethiopia has become seriously entangled. Thehistory of this goes back to the concession which Menelik made in 1894 to a French company for a railroad from Djibuti through Harrar to Addis Abbeba and the White Nile. Construction was hurried directly after the Battle of Adowa, and English commerce was greatly aroused. When the French were unable to raise sufficient capital for the enterprise, they borrowed from English investors, and then tried to make the railroad a government enterprise. To this Menelik strongly objected. Thereupon, it was proposed that the railroad be internationalized and owned by several European governments, but Menelik would not consent to this. Finally, when the French company was bankrupt in 1907, a new private company was formed under an Ethiopian whose bonds were backed by the guaranty of the French government, but whose real owners were the French and English, with a few Ethiopians. Four hundred and eighty-six milesof this railroad have now been built.

In addition to this, the Italians own 1,225 miles of telegraph lines, while the Ethiopians themselves have five thousand miles of telephone. The resources of Ethiopia are almost entirely undeveloped. The population is probably about ten million. The annual value of its trade, imports and exports, is about $10,000,000, and there are undoubtedly large mineral resources in the mountains, not to mention the entirely undeveloped water power.

It is clear that the present clash between Italy and Abyssinia had its immediate use in two facts: the discovery of oil in a desert border region where Abyssinia has long had imperfect control, and where Italy, for commercial reasons, has been encroaching upon the ill-defined boundaries. Secondly, because the sudden re-adjustment of European alliances caused by the murder of Dolfus, has compelled Mussolini to justify his sabre-rattling to the youth of Italy in Ethiopia rather than in North Africa.

Mussolini used to wind up his most flamboyant speeches with a fiery exclamation: "E Tunisia?" To this word, pronounced in a questioning tone of voice, the massed blackshirts then replied with a thunderous shout: "A Noi!" which means: "To Us!"

The African Roots of War

The murder of the prime minister of Austria by the German Nazis halted an understanding between France and Italy which might have forced France and England to disgorge the German colonies in Africa and grant Italy's African demands in full. But Italy feared Pan-Germany more than France; France feared Hitler's militarism; and England feared German industrial competition.

Laval and Mussolini renewed the old efforts to come to an understanding. Exactly what their written understanding is has not been published, but it is pretty clear from subsequent events. Nothing was probably said about the navy. Italy has little money to build ships, even if she wants to. Some concessions were made as to Italians in Tunis, and some territorial concessions in the hinterland of Tripoli, probably not large in actual extent, but important in opening one of the main trade routes from Lake Chad to Tripoli, and involving some 50,000 square miles of territory.

The main concession undoubtedly was in Abyssinia, and that concession consisted, first, in promising to keep hands off if Mussolini should make war upon Abyssinia, and seize any part of her territory. Secondly, to grant Italian capital additional power in Abyssinia. It is rumored that three thousand shares of the Djibuti Railroad have been turned over to Italy, and that a rectification of frontier between Eritrea and French Somaliland has been so arranged as to give Italy direct access to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb.

All this means a tighter economic cordon around Ethiopia to make her access to foreign markets more difficult, and to keep out capital from countries other than Italy, Great Britain, and France. Behind this movement, and tending to strengthen the common interests of these imperial powers, are two menaces from Asia: one is the new independence of the kingdom of the Arabs opposite Abyssinia across the Red Sea. At best this is going to cut off Italian trade with Eritrea, and at worst, it is going to encourage every Arab in North Africa to remember the trail of blood through which Italy walked to secure the barren victory of Tripoli. Again, the recent appearance of Japan in Abyssinian industrial development, has alarmed the West. It is rumored that Japan has already captured one-third of the commerce of Abyssinia, and the French charge that the Japanese wish to equip Ethiopia industrially, and furnish technical help for her new machines. If in this way

Japan should obtain an economic foothold in Ethiopia, she might lay claim to share in one of the ports of the Red Sea through which Ethiopian commerce must pass. And as a French writer has said recently:

"On that day Japan will say: 'I want Djibuti. It belongs to me on account of my tremendous interests in Ethiopia.' And who knows whether or not we shall have to concede in order to save Indo-China from civil war or even from a war of aggression? Germany also sees things from this point of view and does not hide her satisfaction, as Heinrich Nebel's recent articles in the Frankfurter Zeitung indicate." (Living Age, pp. 404, 405, quoting Henry De Monfreid in the Nouvelles Littéraires.)

Italy then mobilizes against Ethiopia, in spite of the League of Nations; in spite of her treaty of arbitration; in spite of reported efforts at conciliation and adjustment, her troops are piling soldiers and equipment into Eritrea. She intends to seize Ethiopian territory on one pretext or another, to secure oil, and to draw a tighter broad or base of economic and military aggression about her. She will not attempt complete subjugation--the inner citadel is too strong, and the Ethiopians too fierce and unruly. But economic strangulation, continued aggression and European propaganda may accomplish what direct force cannot do immediately.

Here, then, is war again. That war which has never ceased since the World War, but now comes nearer the European circle where its sparks are increasingly dangerous. Moreover, let no one think that the demand of Italy in Africa is the end of demands. The reason that Germany refuses to make categorical answers to the handsome overtures of France and England concerning re-arming and debt, is because there is still one unmentioned subject, and that is, German colonies, and particularly German colonies in Africa, since the attitude and power of Japan makes colonial aggression in Asia unhealthful just now. Hitler recently in his Saar speech, intimated that the work of redeeming German colonies had not been finished, and he doubtless used the word "colony" advisedly. That Germany is going to demand the return of German Africa, before she consents to raise the war menace in Europe, is absolutely certain. The scramble, therefore, in Africa, for cheap labor and cheap war material is not ended. It helped start World War in 1914, and it may easily do it again in our day; and if this international jealousy does not start such a war, the war may be started by the Africans themselves, for after all, Africa is not held by Europeans. Africa today is held in subjection to Europe by black armies. Except in the Union of South Africa, nine-tenths of the European armies are composed of natives. Their allegiance has been bought by emphasizing tribal jealousies and encouraging envy, and doling out small amounts of power and prestige. But this is not enough. The unrest in black Africa is widespread. We are told that the killing of Italians by Abyssinian tribesmen quickly spread to every coast of the black continent. One of these days, the very troops by which Europe holds Africa, are going to cease to play the part so long assigned them. It only needs the guiding thought and the great leader. And with all that Europe can do in airplane, tank, and war guns, let the world remember that a group of determined black men, armed even partially with modern technique, could take their stand on the snow-swept heights of Ethiopia, within sight of the Equator, and in the midst of the black world, and shake the centers of European imperialism. The day that the League of Nations lets Italy strangle Ethiopia will begin the low roll of this tom-tom. It may not be heard today or for a hundred years, but the time will come. The attempt to throttle ~~Abyssinia~~ Ethiopia as a salve for keeping Italian workers from open revolt may easily be the real cause to set the world aflame.

ROME, Jan. 8.—An official communiqué issued tonight defined as follows France's cession to Italy of 44,500 square miles of territory in Africa: (2)

The frontiers of Libya [which belongs to Italy] are extended to a line which, leaving Tummo, reaches the western frontier of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan at the intersection of the 24th meridian east longitude with the 18th degree, 45 minutes, north latitude.

This line leaves Aozou and Guezenti in Italian territory and Bardai and Tecro in French territory. The area thus added to Libya is approximately 44,500 square miles.

The frontier between Eritrea [belonging to Italy] and French Somaliland is changed by a line drawn between Dereloua to Dadato on the Weima River. This change gives Italy a strip on the coast fronting on the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. Italy also gets the Island of Doumerrah. Frontier Commissions will work out the details of the new frontiers.

3. A series of agreements, three in number, affecting French and Italian colonial possesions in Africa. Under the first, France concedes Italy extensive, though not commercially important, territory in Tibesti in the southwest corner of Libya; under the second, she yields Italy territory in French Somaliland, running back from the coast, to be added to Italy's Eritrea, which will give the Rome government control of the Strait of Babelmandeb linking the Red sea and the Gulf of Aden, and cedes to Italy 3,000 shares of stock in the Djibuti-Addis Ababa raliroad; under the third, France agrees to extend for 10 years the citizenship and special privileges of Italian residents in Tunis, after which period they will be deprived of those special rights for 30 years. REICH ARMING IS REBUKED

Britain Will Now Promote an Accord to Germany Back Into Arms Conference.

ROME, Jan. 8.—An official communiqué issued this evening gives a complete outline of the Italo-French agreements signed yesterday.

The agreements conclude with a general declaration that all questions pending between Italy and France have been settled, that the two powers mean to collaborate in all fields, and that they will consult each other whenever circumstances render such a step advisable.

The colonial demands made by Italy have been partly accepted by France, which has ceded to Italy a tract of 44,500 square miles south of Italy's Libyan colony.

The frontier between Libya and the French colonial possessions to the south is exactly defined.

[The added territory conceded to Libya, while about as large as New York State, falls far short of what Italy desired. Her aim was to get a corridor to Central Africa, but she has accepted virtually a continuation southeastward of the line partially drawn in a former Franco-Italian settlement and acquires only a further area of desert land.]

At the same time France ceded to Italy a small strip along the coast south of the Italian colony of Eritrea facing the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. Italy and France will appoint commissions to delimit the new frontiers and settle all other questions arising in connection with the transfer.

Railway Concession.

Another agreement aimed to promote the trade of France and Italy with their colonial possessions. It included a provision that Italy should have a share in the ownership of the railway from Addis Ababa, the capital of Abyssinia, to Jibuti, French Somaliland.

[The French concessions to Italy in Somaliland and Abyssinia are most important. The territorial concession to Eritrea is small, but it gives Italy a shoreline on the Gulf of Aden. The share in the French railway to Addis Ababa, however, will greatly increase that country's influence at the Abyssinian capital and in trade, and will enable her to offer stronger competition to Japan, which has been pressing for political and commercial favor in Abyssinia.]

Concerning the status of Italian residents in Tunis, the agreement of 1896 is continued in substantially its present form until 1965. The new accord provides that all children of Italian parents born before that date are allowed to retain Italian nationality, though those born from 1945 onward will be permitted to choose either Italian or French nationality on reaching their majority.

The Italian schools in Tunis are to continue as at present until 1955, when they will become private Italian schools.

Other privileges enjoyed by Italians will continue until 1945, after which they will be progressively abolished.

In connection with the Austrian and Central European situation, Italy and France agreed to recommend that the powers concerned conclude among themselves a treaty of non-intervention in each others internal affairs, agreeing not to give any aid to movements directed at disturbing each others territorial integrity by violence. This pact, it was decided, should be signed initially by Italy, Germany, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and Austria and later should be extended also to France, Rumania and Poland.

Consultation Provided.

Meanwhile, however, France and Italy agreed to consult in the event that Austrian independence should be seriously threatened this consultation pact also may be extended eventually to include other powers.

An agreement on the subject of German rearmament said:

"In relation to the great powers' declaration of Dec. 11, 1932, on equality rights, France and Italy found themselves in agreement that no power may modify by unilateral act its obligations in the matter of armaments, and that if this eventuality should come to pass they will consult together."

NATIONS DECLARE AMITY

Franco-Vatican Concordat Is Reported in View as Foreign Minister Talks With Pope.

By ARNALDO CORTESI.
Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, Jan. 7.—Premier Benito Mussolini and French Foreign Minister Pierre Laval after a final conversation at the Palazzo Venezia this evening signed the Italo-French agreements that have been developed in the last two days.

The texts of the agreements were not made public. Immediately after the signing Signor Mussolini received the French press and M. Laval the Italian press, both declaring that a complete solution of all pending Italo-French questions and a harmonization of their viewpoints on all matters of a general nature had been achieved.

Communiqué Tells Results.

An official communiqué issued by both Italian and French sources defined the results of the conversations as follows:

The head of the Italian Government and the French Minister of Foreign Affairs concluded the Italo-French negotiations by signing some agreements relative to the interests of the two countries in Africa and some acts that register the community of views existing between their governments on questions of European order.

They have found that the two governments are in agreement on the necessity for a plurilateral understanding on the Central European question. They have agreed that the conception they have adopted shall be submitted as rapidly as possible to the examination of the countries interested. They have agreed, moreover, that while waiting for this understanding to be concluded they will examine together in the spirit of the understanding itself all measures that the situation may require.

In the absence of any positive official information it is necessary to fall back on the most reliable unofficial sources available. According to these sources the agreements included the following:

First, a solemn declaration of friendship and an official communiqué concerning the harmonization of the two governments' views on African questions and the principal problems of general policy.

Will Consult on Austria.

Secondly, a procès-verbal in which Italy and France undertake to consult in the event of a new threat against the independence of Austria and to urge the neighboring States and the successors of the Austro-Hungarian Empire to sign an agreement among themselves undertaking reciprocally to respect one another's frontiers and not to interfere reciprocally in one another's internal affairs.

Thirdly, three colonial conventions, one regarding the status of Italian residents in Tunis, whose present privileges will continue until 1965, and two others concerning territorial concessions to be made by France in Southern Lybia and Somaliland.

Fourthly, a protocol in which, in the light of the five-power declaration of December, 1932, the Italian and French Governments declare themselves in agreement to consider the rearming of Germany illegal so long as the Reich has not reached a special agreement on that subject with the five powers.

[The five-power declaration of December, 1932, which was intended to bring Germany back into the Disarmament Conference, defined one object of the conference as the achievement of equality within some system of security.]

The reason why these agreements were not made public is said to be that they must first be submitted—except, of course, those relating to purely Italo-French colonial questions—to the other interested powers. In the case of the agreement on German rearmament there is the added reason that this question will be further discussed during the stay of French Premier Pierre-Etienne Flandin and M. Laval in London, where a final decision will be reached.

Aim at No Nation, Says Laval.

Speaking to the Italian press M. Laval emphasized particularly that the decisions as to Italo-French colonial matters were eminently fair and should be well received. By removing misunderstandings between Italy and France they had enabled the two countries without any reservations and in an atmosphere of mutual comprehension examine all problems of a gen Fear New Move by Reich on Arms—Geneva Doubtful on Real Meaning of Pacts.

PARIS, Jan. 9.—Foreign Minister Pierre Laval returned from Rome today "fully satisfied," he declared.

"In sealing Franco-Italian friendship in a durable and solid manner, I think I have well served the interests of my country and of peace," he said.

In so far as the restoration of cordiality to Franco-Italian relations is concerned, his satisfaction is universally shared by his countrymen. But already the question is being raised: "What next?"

One of the first visitors to the Quai d'Orsay today after the Minister's return was Charge d'Affaires. Following the League of Nations Council meeting and the Saar plebiscite the coming week-end, all attention will be directed toward the proposed visit of Premier Pierre-Etienne Flandin and M. Laval to London, which has been set for the 20th. In anticipation of that visit much importance is being attached to the paragraph of the Rome communiqué regarding the declaration of equality right in armaments of December, 1931. In this the two governments declare that they have agreed that no country may modify, by unilateral act, its obligations in the matter of armaments, and that if such an event occurs, they will consult.

Interpretations Differ.

By some that declaration is welcomed as the accession of Italy to the ranks of those nations that will oppose legalization of Germany's rearmament. Others find the phrasing of the clause very strange and discover in it the seed of new negotiation that may, under the guise of establishing limitation and control of German armaments, legalize what has been done.

With that prospect in mind the Nationalist press has begun to expres qualms regarding the prospects for the visit to London. British press also comment on the visit also has seemed to French Nationalists to confirm that all that has been done and all that is being planned leads inevitably toward a new discussion of Germany's armament status, toward revision of treaty terms and eventually toward Germany's return to Geneva.

Even should the London visit tend this way, however, it is pointed out that it is Germany that must make the final decision as to whether it desires to return to the concert of nations or remain outside.

Among others, The Temps thinks the events of the past few days and the success of M. Laval where Chancellor Hitler failed, in his visit to Premier Mussolini, must impress Berlin with the necessity of abandoning a policy that is fast leading to economic and political isolation. The Temps, however, is not among those that see the road opening to a new armament settlement with Germany. It prefers to see in the Rome communiqué notification to Berlin that the ranks of the former allies are now closed against revision of the armament conditions and that the warning given in Rome will be confirmed in London.

Delay Mystifies British.

By CHARLES A. SELDEN.
Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Jan. 9.—The delay of the French and Italian Governments in providing the Foreign Offices of other countries with the full official texts of the agreements signed in Rome forty-eight hours ago is causing some surprise in London.

Although Sir John Simon, the Foreign Secretary, knew enough of the purport of the arrangement to express his personal satisfaction, this piecemeal information was not considered sufficiently precise to be used as a basis for definite study by the British Government. Therefore, when the Cabinet met today for the first time since the Christmas holidays the discussion of the new European situation was only casual.

The Ministers want to see the agreement in black and white and study all its implications before making a decision concerning the next British move. What is particularly desired is the exact wording of the Franco-Italian understanding that "no country may modify by unilateral act its obligations in the matter of armaments" and that if there is such modification the two signatories will consult.

It is reported unofficially that there is no specific mention of Germany in this disarmament clause and no intimation that any country has already taken unilateral action.

This point is relevant to the government's determination to make use of the Rome agreement as a new point of departure for reviving the disarmament negotiations. Preliminary talks on that subject will be undertaken at Geneva by Sir John and Anthony Eden, the Lord Privy Seal, who are leaving for Switzerland tomorrow.

Fear of Italy Ridiculed.

By The Associated Press.

LONDON, Jan. 9.—A British spokesman said today that he regarded as "wild" any idea that Italy, by acquiring new African territory from France, had also acquired a talking point in any future negotiations with Great Britain through the command of the southern approach to the Suez Canal from the Indian Ocean.

It was pointed out that Great Britain has the island of Perim, just off the land added to Eritrea and also holds British Somaliland in that vicinity.

"Italy already has Eritrea and Italian Somaliland," said the spokesman, "so that the new small addition does not bring additional problems. Because Italy already has territory there, she has every right to interest herself in that part of the world."

League Sentiments Mixed.

By CLARENCE K. STREIT.
Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, Jan. 9.—Under the official optimism usual on such occasions, the attitude of influential League of Nations quarters toward the Franco-Italian accords is much the same as it was toward the Franco-Italian bases of the naval agreement of 1931.

It was then mixed, with some persons hopeful, with many waiting to see in practice what spirit was really behind it and with a few observers who proved shrewd in expecting it to lead to some surprise counter-move from Germany.

It may be recalled that soon afterward the Austro-German customs union protocol was announced, starting a train of events of which the bases of the naval agreement were only the first victims.

After that experience some observers are wondering now what Germany is going to do, especially in the Austrian and armament fields, and what surprise she may spring, but nothing is expected before the Saar decision. Meanwhile, it is expected that hotel and corridor talk during the Council session that opens Friday with routine affairs will be devoted largely to insiders trying to follow up and outsiders trying to get light on what really happened at Rome.

European Pact Doubted.

The mixed sentiments are illustrated by the Journal des Nations, the Little Entente's Geneva organ. It concedes that the Rome meeting may prove the nark of a decisive change "for the better" in Italian policy, but it is dubious about the Central European non-interference pact. Though it would like to see Italy keep out of Austrian, Hungarian and, above all, Yugoslav affairs, it complains that the agreement would make it harder to intervene against Austrian restoration of the Hapsburgs or an Austro-German anschluss achieved by Nazi control of the Austrian Government.

Some French circles here are skeptical of the value of any accord between a democracy and a dictatorship. While most observers here welcome the French cession of 44,500 square miles in Africa to Italy to add to Eritrea and Libya, there remains a desire to see what its practical effect will be, particularly in Abyssinia. Apparently Abyssinia itself is still guessing, for she has made no further move here, and pending word that she at least intends to send some one to represent her at this Council session her appeal against Italy still remains off the agenda.

League circles are interested to learn from Italy that the Rome Government has withdrawn from public sale and official distribution copies of the Italian map recently exhibited in League lobbies that showed some of the disputed territory between Italy and Abyssinia as lying within the Abyssinian boundaries. A footnote made the reservation that the map was not "official." It is understood the map was withdrawn because "there was a necessity for certain changes."

ITALY ADDS TO HER AFRICAN EMPIRE.

The maps show the cessions made by France in the negotiations just concluded at Rome: (1) A block of land opposite the British island of Perim in the strategic Bab-el-Mandeb Strait, which is to be incorporated into Eritrea, and (2) a large strip to the south of Libya, which is to be annexed to that Italian colony.

HUNGARY OFFERS REPORT

It Is Reported to Admit Official Negligence in Connection With Marseilles Killings.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, Jan. 11.—The Abyssinian Minister to Paris, who arrived here yesterday to appear, if necessary, before the Council of the League of Nations, reserved the right to bring his appeal against Italian "aggression" before the Council at this session.

There is reason to believe he warned Secretary General Joseph Avenol that he would use this right if Abyssinia does not get satisfaction otherwise before the session is ended. This led to important conversations today among the British, French and Italians with a view to quieting Abyssinia.

Little Entente quarters interested in keeping well informed on a question so annoying to Italy explain that Abyssinia is in no hurry to start the League's wheels moving now because she anticipates "a worse attack in about a month," which might provide her with a better atmosphere in Geneva.

Hungary today handed Sir Anthony Eden of Great Britain, as reporter, a 200-page report of her investigation of any share her authorities may have had in the Marseilles assassination. The report is understood to find that a number of officials were guilty of negligence. Probably the Little Entente will seek to prevent Hungary from getting the affair ended thus, and will try to keep it on the agenda at least until the May session on the ground that the Marseilles trial has not yet been held.

The Council instructed the transit section, on the recommendation of Maxim Litvinoff of Russia, as reporter, to begin work toward a convention to prevent pollution of the sea by oil. A committee of experts says this pollution is seriously menacing bathing resorts, bird and sea life, particularly near the United States and England.

Tewfik Rushdi Aras, the Turkish Foreign Minister, presides at this session of the Council.

Emperor Writes to King.

By The Associated Press.

ROME, Jan. 11.—Emperor Haile Selassie of Abyssinia went over Benito Mussolini's head today to handle the Italo-Abyssinian dispute as one king to another.

Writing directly to King Victor Emmanuel, he outlined his government's viewpoint on the situation growing out of recent border clashes between Italian and Abyssinian forces. The Abyssinian Charge d'Affaires here, Negadras Yesus, presented the letter and received the Italian King's assurance that Italy wanted peace with her African neighbor.

Negadras yesterday conferred with Mussolini regarding the implications of the new Franco-Italian agreements concerning Africa and received Il Duce's promise that Italy intends no aggression.

THE WORLD'S WINDOW

By PIERRE VAN PAASSEN.

Mussolini In Tunis.

[redacted]

Sicily is the bridge to Africa. We must cross that bridge. On the other shore lies Tunis. To whom does Tunis belong?" And like a clap of thunder came the answereing cry: "A Noi! A Noi! Evivva il Duce! Evivva Mussolini!"

However, the tri-color of France still floats over the protectorate of Tunis. I don't know how many Arabs there are in Tunis, two million perhaps, but there are fully three hundred thousand Italians. Everything is Italian in the capital city and in the main cities inland. The banks are Italian. Half the shipping in the port is Italian. There are Italian inscriptions on the tombstones in the cemeteries and on the ex-votos in the churches. Except for the architectural style, which is Arabic, Tunis is an Italian city. There are Italian newspapers, Italian bookshops, the restaurants serve macaroni and spaghetti and the bambinos in the streets bear so striking a resemblance to those of Foggia and Naples that you imagine yourself somewhere in the Abruzzi or in Calabria.

The French In Tunis.

There are also some 35,000 Frenchmen in Tunis. The French run the administration, the courts, the customs service. They are the functionaries the postmen, the policemen, the soldiers, the tax collectors and the justices of the peace. The Italians do the work. They are the market-gardeners, the shop-keepers the wine-growers, the railway and road builders, in short they form the productive element. France has not the men to go out colonizing. In the first place, of course, Frenchmen do not emigrate. This is not because they love their country more than Germans or Irishmen. The French do not need to emigrate, for France is a land of plenty, an opulent country.

That universal crisis of which we hear so much has not begun to touch the land of France even now. France has the third largest colonial empire in the world, after Britain and Holland. But France has not the men to colonize that empire. The war destroyed 1,600,000 young Frenchmen. One million six hundred thousand makes an awful big hole in the population. So big a hole, in fact, that the numbers of recruits for the army this year is at its lowest ebb since the days of Napoleon. The men who would have been the fathers of 18-year-old boys, the recruiting age, lie buried in the 200-year-old cemeteries along the front. One million and a half potential fathers dead—their children unborn, that is the tragedy of France.

Italy Has The Men.

Italy has plenty of men. The Italian population is going up by leaps and bounds. Not as fast as Russia's, but quite fast just the same. Italy once had a preponderating influence in Tunis. That was when the country was still independent. Then a revodution broke out—some say the French engineered that revolution—be that as it may. France stepped in to restore order and stayed. France stole a march on Italy. But Italy didn't have Mussolini in 1881. Now their "Italianita"—of that fact, that they are Italians. They want something to say in the running of the country. And, best of all, they would like to see Tunis joined to their motherland, to Italy and not to France.

In his address to the French pre ized as concerned both problems in teresting only these two countries and problems of a general nature.

"The agreement means," he said,
"that a mutually satisfactory co

a general European nature we have set down a common Italo-French attitude in certain possible contingencies. This is very important.
I do not think any flights of rhetoexceptional significance of this agreement, which establishes a

Warns of Undue Optimism.

After having said, as M. Laval had, that the agreements were directed against no one, Signor Mus-

No. Friendships must constantly be cultivated to synchronize them

Special interest was also attributed here to the visit of M. Laval to the Pope this morning and to Car-of State, this evening. These were said to be not mere courtesy visits, as was shown by the fact that he quarters that a concordat between France and the Holy See is also being discussed.

THE AFRICAN ROOTS OF WAR

I used this title in 1915 and I use it again now as it is just as true. War begins not on the great European fronts where the world is watching, but in out-of-the-way places where ~~nobody cares~~, and ~~not~~ where valuable trade profit may be reaped. There is oil along the eastern highlands of Africa and in Abyssinia; there are valuable metals, including gold. Above all, here from the Blue Nile and the Atbara comes half the water supply of the Nile Valley, including the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan and Egypt itself.

The great ramparts of Abyssinia, soaring over seas of hills and mountains, form the greatest stronghold of all Africa, and the one part which has natural barriers for defense. It was a German who said that the power that held the Abyssinian highlands could dominate the imperialism of Europe in Africa.

Abyssinia ~~has been called~~ is a pear-shaped mountain clump, cut into island-like sections which are separated by deep gorges and ravines. It is nearly as large as France and Spain combined, and looms high on the northwest toward the Valley of the Nile, on the southwest, toward the Great Lakes, and on the east, toward the sea. It is ~~divided~~ rises in three great terraces: a plane one of rocky strata; a ~~second~~ plateau about eight thousand feet above the sea, and above this, snow-capped mountains which sometimes rises nearly another eight thousand feet. "It looks," says the traveller, "like a storm-tossed sea, suddenly solidified."

The highest ramparts of this "citadel of Africa", lying as they do between the fever-fested South and the sun-baked Sudan, form a fortress which would be difficult even for a modern army to storm. It is to her mountains that Abyssinia owes points the fact that her population is the only dark race in Africa not yet under European domination.

In these ~~islands~~ highlands, both the Blue Nile and the Atbara rise, and thus Abyssinia commands a full half of the waters of the Nile, and dominates the most direct route to the Nile Valley. Moreover, its natural seaboard, ~~which already has been seized by Europe~~, commands the whole of one side of the Gulf of Aden, and the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. When the Suez Canal was opened these waters became the ~~throne~~ throat of the British Empire.

The African Roots of War

English commerce long has had its eye on Abyssinia, and once in 1865 actually captured the capital of the country and war ensued. Emperor Theodore then committed suicide. But it was enabled to do this by the help of Abyssinia, who was in rebellion against Theodore, and the Suez Canal was at that time still a French project.

When the canal was opened in 1865, its significance for the British Empire was evident, and in 1876, the dual control of England and France in Egypt was arranged, and three years later, the Khedive Ismail was deposed.

Modern commercial imperialism began now rapidly to assume its essential characteristics. The partition of Africa was discussed considered at the Congress of Berlin in 1878. France had begun her African empire in Algeria in 1830, and now both Bismark and Salisbury were willing for her to aid Tunis, despite the fact that this site of ancient Carthage belonged logically to Italy. The scramble for Africa began. On the very eve of the Congress of Berlin, Germany rushed into East, West and Southwest Africa and presented the Congress with a fait accompli. In 1881, France seized Tunis, and England seized Egypt, while England, France and Italy with one accord turned toward northeast Africa and the coasts of Abbysinia. The Italians on some shadowy claim took what is now Eritrea in 1882, but were blocked by both Great Britain and France from further extension South. Great Britain took British Somaliland in 1884, and the French already had Obock and nearly came to blows with the British until a treaty was made in 1887.

Meantime, the situation of the British in Egypt had peculiar repercussions in Abyssinia. Egypt was groaning under despotism and debt which had been deliberately encouraged by France and England who had tempted the venal rulers into incurring an enormous unanimous indebtedness to Europe, and these rulers, in turn had sought to keep up the interest on this debt by ruinous and exhaustive taxation. Finally, in desperation, the natives rebelled. Ahmed Arabi, a mulatto colonel, led a successful revolt in Egypt, whereupon the English turned their guns upon Alexandria, defeated Araby, and took control of Egypt. This left the former rulers in nominal control of the whole of Egypt but of actual control of the Sudan, while the English held the real power along the Lower Nile. Here the injurious and over-taxation of the Egyptians con~~tinued, and the rebellion that had been started by Araby was checked only in Egypt, but continued in the Sudan. Indeed,~~ Before the Araby rebellion in 1878, the mulatto Rabah had swept through the Bahr-El-Ghazel and the regions south of Lake Chad, ~~but~~ Now there arose a greater leader and a vaster motif. Mohammed Ahmed, son of a priest in Dongola, had established headquarters 150 miles above Khartum. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, majestic black man, with great eyes. He had visions. Disciples gathered around him, and eventually he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammed an Revelation.

The country, ~~was~~ groaning under misrule, ~~and~~ went into the throes of a religious crusade against Egypt. ~~Powerful Emirs saw opportunity for revenge.~~ A holy war was proclaimed, and a strong army organized. The Mahdi put down blasphemy, feasting, drinking, smoking and swearing. Thousands followed him. ~~In 1882, he seized Kordofan.~~ The Egyptians in 1883 sent an army of 10,000 under the Englishman, Hicks Pasha. They were annihiliated, with only 300 left alive. ~~In 1883. The next year~~, Kordofan, Dafur and the Bahr-El-Ghazel surrendered. Only a German, Emin Pasha, still ~~held up the~~ upheld Egyptian power ~~fell~~ down in the Equatorial provinces next to Uganda. By the end of 1883, the Mahdi was master of a territory equal to Spain, France and Germany, and his army was closing in ~~about~~ on Khartum, the capital of the Sudan.

England hesitated. Gladstone and the Little Englanders had driven Disraeli from power, and ruled from 1880-1885, or at least had as much power as any radical government ~~can~~ could have in England so long as the Tory House of Lords ~~holds~~ held the veto. It ~~was~~ seemed impossible for them to withdraw from Egypt, although they declared the English stay there but temporary; ~~and~~ but Gladstone preemptorily refused to undertake the conquest of the Sudan. ~~He said, rightly, that these people were fighting for liberty in their own land.~~ But the Sudan was a choice morsel, not only for the heads of Egyptian slavery and misrule, but also for English commercial development ~~in the whole of~~ the valley of the Nile + in East Africa. ~~The~~ English imperialists were not without resources, and they seized upon Chinese Gordon. This man was a religious fanatic, ~~and~~ ill-balanced if not at times insane. He ~~was a Scotchman,~~ had fought in the Crimean War and played a large role in the Chinese upheaval, and had fits of rage, courage and murder. He read the Bible; went on sprees of drinking brandy; lived among the London poor, and was about to go to the Congo when English commerce forced Gladstone to send him to the Sudan, ostensibly to report on the situation. Baring, the English commissioner in Egypt, protested, and knew that Gordon would so involve England that they would have to send the army into the Sudan; but Queen Victoria and Lord Hartington prevailed, and Gordon reached Khartum in 1884, and was made Governor-General. He proceeded to recognize slavery even though the suppression of the slave trade was one of the ostensible excuses for English interference in the Sudan. The Mahdi swept between him and Cairo, and cut off his communications. England held indignation meetings and public prayers, but Gladstone was determined not to be entangled. Osman Digna, the Mahdi's general, marched to the borders of Abyssinia and drove back the English army. They retaliated in a successful attack, but Gladstone refused to let them follow it up. He compelled them to withdraw, and declared that the invasion of the Sudan would be a war of conquest against a people "rightly struggling to be free."

Gladstone was certain that Gordon could retreat from Khartum if he wished, and that his persistence in staying there was a bluff on the part of the Imperialists to force the hands of the Liberals.

The Mahdi, with thirty thousand men, laid seige to Khartum. Hartington threatened to resign. Gladstone had to yield. An army of relief, with 10,000 troops, was sent, but it was slow in getting started, and too late to take advantage of the high waters of the Nile. Gordon's hair turned white. Hundreds died daily of hunger in the besieged city. The dead lay unburied. The city was assaulted. Gordon hesitated whether to fight or commit suicide; finally then put on his uniform and rushed down the stairs. He met four tall black men, and was killed. In England, Gladstone was called a murderer and a traitor. The Queen was bitter with resentment, but European war was imminent, and Gladstone remained fervent. For thirteen years, the Mahdi and his successor, the Khalifa, ruled in the Sudan. Thus, the whole of the Sudan was lost to Egypt, and the Egyptian garrisons on the northern border of Abyssinia were finally withdrawn in 1886, and French, British and Italian possessions on the coast were in danger of being overwhelmed by the Mahdi.

This looked like a rare opportunity for German imperialism. Between German East Africa and the Egyptian Sudan, lay the great territory of Uganda, where Catholics, Protestants and Mohammedans had been merely cutting each others throats in their efforts to convert the heathen. The Germans pushed warily up into this country, ~~and~~ while shut up in the Equatorial provinces of the Sudan was the German Emin Pasha. ~~English and Americans heard about him and sent the Stanley expedition to a cost of $145,000 to rescue him. But Emin did not want to be rescued.~~ He wanted to hold these provinces, ~~either for himself or, more probably, to~~ and turn them over to Germany. The Khalifa, however, was pressing him hard, and when Stanley ~~finally~~ appeared ~~across Africa~~ in 1888, Emin reluctantly followed him and met Karl Peters and the German expedition which had been busily engaged in making treaties with the local chiefs in Uganda for German expansion. Emin, with his black wife and mulatto daughter, finally arrived at Zanzibar, where he accepted the post under the German administration in East Africa. ~~The English finally hoisted the Germans, and got Uganda in 1894.~~

Late in 1884, the scramble for Africa became bitter. England was encroaching upon the Portuguese colonies; Germany had appeared in the field; France was at work in North Africa. France, England and Italy had seized the coast of Abyssinia, and in the vast Valley of the Congo, comprising the whole center of Africa, Little Belgium had proposed an international state. A European conference ~~Congress~~ to settle the rules of the game for the further looting of Africa seemed necessary. It came together in Berlin, in November, 1884, and lasted through February, 1885. The United States was represented. The Congo was recognized not as an international state but as the personal property of the King of Belgium. Certain rules of procedure ~~domination~~ for the further seizure of Africa were adopted, and ~~no sooner had the Berlin act been passed than~~ before the Conference was ended the German Colonial Party forced Bismark's hand; seized Zanzibar and East Africa, and ~~finally~~ appeared as a full-fledged African colonial power.

There were several significant occurrences in 1885. The Mahdi died after the fall of Khartum and was succeeded by the Khalifa. England came to the verge of war with Russia over the approach to India. The Gladstone government fell in June, and the Tories under Salisbury, came into power. Salisbury, looking toward a beginning of re-assertion of power in Central Africa, and fearing that the Khalifa would drive Europe from the coast of Abyssinia, suggested that Italy seize the Port of Massowah. This was disloyal to Abyssinia, since only the year before England had signed a treaty with Johannes VI. ~~which they had been trying to get since 1869,~~ and with Johannes' help had held back the Mahdi. To hand over to the Italians Massowah which belonged to the Abyssinians and to which Italy had no shadow of claim was an extraordinary breach of faith. Italy proceeded to take Massowah, as Giolitti says, as a "consolation prize", having been cheated out of Tunis, held back in Tripoli, and out-manoeuvered both at the Congress of Berlin and the Berlin Conference, as well as losing her chance to participate in Egypt. Once having planted her foot in Massowah, Italy proceeded to make alliance with Johannes' chief enemy, Menelik of Shoa, a pretender to the Abyssinian throne. Johannes found himself between two enemies, Italy and the Khalifa, and eventually was killed in battle by the latter in 1889. Immediately Menelik proclaimed himself King of Kings, and in May signed with the Italians the celebrated treaty of Uccialli. To prove his gratitude to the Italians for their alliance and help with the armies, Menelik ceded to Italy the territory which they had already seized. But the Italians, drunk with new ambition, swept on, calmly crossed the into Abyssinia, and toward the end of 1889, seized Adua, while Menelik was busily subduing his enemies. They even penetrated into the Harrar, thus coming into direct dispute, not only with Abyssinia, but with the claims of France and Great Britain. Thereupon France and Great Britain made a secret treaty which allowed them to oppose Italy's advance if they pleased; A treaty which thus again put Great Britain in the unenviable position of double-crossing Italy. Just as they had previously deceived Abyssinia.

In the very month, May, 1889, when Italy signed the treaty of Uccialli with Menelik, Crispi, assuming that Abyssinia had already become an Italian protectorate, determined to get the adjoining Somaliland coast. ~~The Italian consul at Zanzibar reported that two Sultans running this coast wanted to hand it over to Italy.~~ The Italian government notified Lord Salisbury that a protectorate had been established over the Somali Coast, and six months later, this was extended as far as British East Africa. This last stretch of coast, called the Benadir Coast, belonged to Zanzibar, but the territories of the Sultan had been divided up between the British and the Germans, except Benadir. The Italians immediately got a concession of this territory for a down payment and promised annunity. But in 1892, the coast became an Italian possession. All native land rights ignored.

The natives rebelled, but reinforcements were rushed in, and the land turned over to an Italian company for exploiting the mining rights. The native ownership of land was completely ignored. The stage was now set for Italy's final coup.

In the seventeenth clause of the Treaty of Uccialli, there arose a characteristic misunderstanding. The Abyssinia text, which was the only one actually signed, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, shall be at liberty to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments." The Italian translation, which was made in Italy, said: "His Majesty, the King of Kings of Ethiopia, consents to avail himself of the Italian government for any negotiations which he may enter into with other powers or governments." On the basis of the Italian text which the French called "a clever forgery," Italy arranged for Menelik to annex Abyssinia.

The treaty was signed May 2, 1889. October 1, 1889, there was an additional treaty by which Menelik was to receive a loan of four million lire from an Italian bank under the guaranty of the Italian government, and on security of the Harrar Custom House. And if the loan was not paid regularly, Italy was to take over the administration of the Custom House. In other words, the stage was all set for the repitition of the Algiers, Tunis and Egyptian procedure. October 12, 1889, Crispi notified the powers by circular letter under the general act of the Berlin Conference of 1884-1885 that Abyssinia was an Italian protectorate. As soon as the Italian Green Book, with the Italian version of the treaty was published in 1890, the French brought the matter to Menelik's notice. He refused to recognize the treaty, and in 1893, denounced it, sending a letter to the great powers and informing them that he had never consented to territories becoming an Italian protectorate. Italy paid no attention, and on March 25 and April 15, 1891, and on May 5, 1894, signed agreements with England in which England recognized Abyssinia as an Italian protectorate, but with boundries so arranged that the Italians were shut off from the valley of the White Nile. A map of Africa by treaty was published in 1894, with the sanction of the English Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in which this rape of Abyssinia was recognized.

But both England and Italy had reckoned without their host. There is no doubt but that the Treaty of Uccialli was a clumsy forgery of the same sort that had previously transferred sovereignty of a larger part of Africa from black men to white. Menelik, however, did not choose to submit. He not only denounced the treaty but he took up arms. He declared by proclamation: "Ethiopia has need of no one. She stretches out her hands to none but God."

The French, ~~bitter at England's duplicity,~~ supplied Menelik willingly with arms and munitions. The forces of Italy and Ethiopia met at Adowa, and Italy's army of forty thousand was anniliated March 1, 1896. ~~The world paused.~~

Suddenly, the headwaters of the Nile, the Nile Valley, and Egypt, the domination of the Red Sea, the path from to the Cape ~~and~~ to Cairo ~~the Congo,~~ all these were in the hands of black men,--the black dervishes of the Sudan, and Menelik II., King of Kings of Ethiopia, and Emperor of Abyssinia. ~~Not only that, but he had a powerful ally.~~ An English officer ~~once~~ wrote: "If I were the Mahdi, I would make Egypt pay for every quart of water that runs down the Nile."

With Abyssinia safe in Italian hands, Great Britain had the black dervishes of the Sudan bottled up. She had in 1894 annexed Uganda, thus definitely curbing German expansion in East Africa. In 1895, the Jameson raid had taken place in South Africa as the first step toward the war ~~which was~~ destined to crush the Dutch and make South Africa a British province. The Cape-to-Cairo idea, fostered by Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes, had seized the immagination of the empire. Agreement was made with Leopold of Belgium which secured a perpetual lease of a large blee of territory at the headwaters of the Nile, and filled in the gap between the Great Lakes. France was alarmed, and there was talk of war. But the British Empire yielded a little, and Lord Roseberry signed a treaty withdrawing the Congo agreement. ~~The French, with their strong influence in Abyssinia, were~~ ~~disposed~~ forced to give up their claim to power in the Nile Valley.

The French refused to yield. Paris was indignant, and threatened war. The British government yielded a little, and Lord Rosebarry signed a treaty withdrawing the Congo agreement in June, 1894. The French, thereupon, took a forward step, and determined to push from French Africa eastward to the Nile and send a French expedition through Abyssinia westward to the Nile. Menelik gave aid and comfort to France, and in 1894, made a concession to the French to build a railway from Djibuti through the Harrar to Addis Abbaba and to the White Nile. French officers trained the Abyssinian army. Great Britain warned France that she claimed the whole of the Nile Valley and would consider any attempt to dispute this claim as an unfriendly act. Paris, hesitated, and the Abyssinian expedition was called off.

The Tories and the Liberals, fighting over Home Rule, with imperialism in the background, had alternated in power. But in 1896, Salisbury was again at the helm and the Jameson raid had taken place in South Africa, and Cecil Rhodes, with his dream of British domination from the Cape-to-Cairo, was at his zenith.

March 5, the news of Adowa reached England, and March 12, England suddenly learned that Chinese Gordon was a Christian martyr and had been murdered by heathens, who ordered the conquest of the Sudan. Kitchener, with Maxim-Nordenfeldt guns, moved up the Nile, starting the same month as the battle of Adowa. Kitchener He captured Khartoum in September and ordered the tomb of the dead Mahdi was publicly desecrated. England was not a minute too soon. That very month, Marchand, the Frenchman, was at Fashoda awaiting the French and Abyssinian expeditions from Abyssinia. Indeed, one Abyssinian expedition under a royal prince had already reached the river but had been decimated by fever. The other expedition under a French commander did not materialize. For a moment, the world stood still with world war in the air.

The French had dispatched Captain Marchand to the French Congo April 25, with instructions to march to the White Nile. They again arranged an Abyssinian expedition to join him. The idea was that the two expeditions should meet on the Nile and establish a French claim to the Upper Valley of the Nile. When Kitchener arrived, he would find the French and Abyssinians stretched across the Cape-to-Cairo path. The Abyssinian expedition failed through the negligence of the French governor of Djibuti. When Marchand reached Fashoda in 1898, there was no fortress and no expedition of French and Abyssinians from the East to support him. After Kitchener won the Battle of Omdurman

~~in September, 1898, he proceeded South to secure the whole of England of the whole valley of the Nile from Uganda to Foshada. He found~~ Marchand and a small body of Senegalese soldiers. The sympathies of the world were with Marchand. ~~France claimed the Valley of the Nile for France, and England for Great Britain.~~ War was imminent, But the French fleet was not equal to the British ~~fleet~~ and the French army at Fasheda was greatly inferior to the British army. March 21, 1899, an Anglo-French declaration was issued, which gave the Nile Valley to Great Britain.

Italy thus stood disillusioned over her Colonial dream with only the barren sands of Tripoli and ~~two~~ bits of Abyssinia coast. This irked her sorely, while it brought Abyssinia again to the notice of the world. Who are the Abyssinians and what is their government?

Haile Selassie II. is by tradition the 384 th King to sit upon the throne, and leaving out mere tradition, we know of at least 200 Abyssinian kings in historic times. Abyssinia represents the fourth step inward of African culture since the pre-historic migration which ~~spread~~ the Negro race over the world. First came the Egyptian mulattoes on the Lower Nile, ~~whose~~ with boundaries other lay 500 miles south of the ~~desert~~ delta at the First Cataract. Then, comes ancient Ethiopia and modern Nubia, the land of black men, where Egyptian culture took refuge against the assaults of Asia. Here, at Napata, centered a civilization which ruled the world from 750 to 600 B.C. Asia, and the encroaching desert, drove the center of culture again south 500 ~~more~~ further miles to Meroe, ~~them~~ at shield-like islands, formed by the waters of the Atbara and the Blue Nile. Here reigned the Candaces and ~~here~~ black culture dominated in trade at met ~~the~~ Greek influence and Roman power. New enemies appeared. Black hordes from the West and Southwest and new conquerors from the North. The power of Ethiopia declined ~~disappeared~~ in this ~~duel,~~ climate and for 600 years, Arabs ~~and fought~~ fought over its remains Nubians. Then came the black Fungs from the West, and ~~Ethiopia was divided between~~ Arabs ruled in the North, and Fungs in the South, a division which lasted down to the middle of the 19th Century. Finally, about 1840, ~~the Mamelukes united and~~ Egypt conquered the Sudan, and for forty years, ~~1840-1880,~~ was reduced it to ruin and misery. Against this rule, that the Mahdi ~~in 1881~~ made the first successful revolt. Meantime, however, "The Citadels" of the South," which was Abyssinia, and refused the fourth steps down from Egypt, held its highlands bordering the Red Sea, Semitic settlers from Arabia had filtered in in a series of movements extending over a long period of time, and became gradually incorporated with the originan black population. Among these immigrants were many Jews who took refuge here from the conquerers of Palestine. Thus, a race of Semitic mulattoes arose ~~here,~~ and established a kingdom which centered around Axum, a trading post established about the First Century, A.D. This kingdom, ~~which~~ took its name Abyssinia from a Semitic tribe, "Habesh"; ~~whence the name "Abyssinia" is derived.~~ But the people of Habash were ~~not~~ merchants contented ~~to be~~ not safe in simply Abyssinia. Traders defense forced ~~They longed to rule over~~ them toward ancient Ethiopia, and disputed with the Arabs and ~~the Black Barbarians,~~ Nubians the domination of the island of Meroe, ~~over which~~ Here they claimed sovereignty as early as 356 A.D., and actually destroyed its capital a century later. ~~Meantime,~~ Greek and Roman influence filtered into Abyssinia from the East, and trade made Axum flourish. Myths of its obscure origin began to arise. The Jewish myth of descent of its royal house from Solomon; the Negro myth of its descent from Aethiopis, ~~who was said to be buried~~ whose tomb was located at Axum. ~~At last came~~ came to Abyssinia the new Christian religion in the Fourth Century after Christ, and thus a third great center of Christianity, in contrast to Roman and Constantinople, was established ~~in Abyssinia.~~ Then came the red wave of conquest from the North, and the history of Abyssinia becomes dim and shadowdy. We catch glimpses of Abyssinian history here and there, as when in 525, at the request of the Emperor Justinian, the Abyssinians in sixty ships landed in Arabia, and captured Yemin, which they held for seventy-five years. In the Tenth Century, a certain ~~Queen~~ Judith, a Caliph usurped the throne, ~~introducing either paganism or Judism. Associating with her in this revolt were a native tribe called the Zagwe, who were Christians. This revolt, now Christian, now Jewish, lasted~~ for three hundred years until the old line of kings were restored in the middle of the 13th Century, ~~and Yequeno Anlak, a prince of Shoa, became King of a united and Christian land. Yet, as I have said, the history of all this period is dim,~~ and As Gibbon has written, "Encompassed by her enemies, Ethiopia slept a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom she was forgotten." It was not until the 15th Century that the explorations of the Portuguese again ~~came~~ brought Abyssinia to the attention of the world. ~~They reached the Cape-of-Good-Hope in 1488, and in 1532~~ Portuguese in 1532 appeared in Abyssinia in time to aid them with 400 horsemen against the attacks of the Mohammedans, ~~who would come~~ that advanced as far south as Massowah. ~~Immediately, they~~ The Portuguese in Abyssinia located ~~here~~ the ~~original~~ source of the legend of Prester John, that ghostly Christian ruler who during the middle ages was supposed to be reigning in Africa or India ~~for many years,~~ and was the source of many legends. Abyssinia ~~in the 15th Century and later,~~ from early times was divided into a number of great districts, each administered by an hereditary chief called a Ras. Over these chiefs ruled a Negus ~~an emperor~~ called a "King of Kings". When he was a strong man, he ruled this overlord ~~organized~~ a powerful country. When he was weak, there was anarchy and confusion ~~disillusion.~~

Such a period of disintegration was in progress about the middle of the 19th Century under Johannes; but he was succeeded in 1855 by ~~by a younger man,~~ the Emperor Theodore, ~~who conquered the whole of Abyssinia, and was crowned in 1855. He was~~ a gifted, ~~ambitious~~ ruthless man, ~~and~~ who came to the throne at the time when European imperialism was being organized and stretching out inquiring hands toward Asia and Africa. Scientists, traders, missionaries and adventurers wandered into Abyssinia. Theodore was ~~then~~ well-disposed toward Europeans, and curious about their countries, but inevitable misunderstanding occurred, both in matters of etiquette and religion. "I know the tactics of European governments," said the observing Theodore, "when they try to acquire an Eastern state. First, they send out missionaries; then consuls to support the missionaries; then battalions to support the consuls. I am not a Rajah of Hindustan to be made a mock of in that way." But Theodore ~~wanted~~ needed alliance and friendship with Europe, if they came to him on honorable terms, ~~and~~ helped him organize his kingdom & beat back the ~~rapacity and cruelty~~ threatened dominion of Turks and Egyptians. He considered himself insulted when the British, after making fair promises, ignored his overtures, ~~and~~ imprisoned the British minister and other Europeans.

Thereupon, in 1867, the British sent ~~Sir Herbert~~ Napier with an army of 12,000 men to invade Abyssinia. The expedition found Theodore busy with a rebellion ~~against him,~~ and the invading army had the support of the rebels. Theodore was surrounded ~~at Magdala in Northern Abyssinia opposite Djibuti. by a mob, while ~~they rewarded~~ Napier received with a peerage.

Anarchy ensued in Abyssinia between 1868 and 1872, with two rival claimants to the throne, Johannes of Tigre and Menelik of Shoa. In the midst of this dispute, the Egyptians pushed into Northern Abyssinia, and seized some of the Border provinces and dominated the trade to the coast. In 1876, however, they were nearly anniliated in Jura, although still in possession of Massowah, the coast, and the province of Harrar. Then came the Mahdi, and despite the partial help of the English, Egypt was driven out while Italy, Great Britain and France succeeded to a part of the territory which she held.

We have seen how in the ~~sudden turmoil~~, Italy aspired to dominate Abyssinia, but was ~~conquered~~ crushed by Menelik II., who became emperor in 1889, and ruled until 1913.

Let us turn now to ~~look at this~~ Italy which thus came into contact with Abyssinia, and is pursuing the same object today.

Chamberlain, father of the modern phrase of English imperialism once said frankly "Empire is Commerce". Disputa attempt Commonplace thus as the "White Man's Burden", the essential truth remains,

Modern industrial imperialism is a method by which governments lay open areas of cheap labor and raw material for exploitation through private agencies. The cost of such exploitation would be much too great for private enterprise alone to bear profitably But if it can be done by the public taxation which supports armies and navies, and gives them strength and blood of young men, then there is a chance for private enterprise to make large profits by small investment which secures raw material and cheap labor. Moreover, unless such raw material and cheap labor are thus made available to a country like Italy, ~~other countries~~ rivals will seize them and make it impossible for the lagging country to ~~get access to these advantages~~ amass wealth and capital and secure recognition among the great Powers which today control ~~these~~ industry & commerce

The profits upon private enterprise invested in the cheap labor of brown and black men, and in the cheap but essential materials which they raise, have reached such heights which put unrivaled power in the hands of nations which own them. It was such considerations that made Germany rush suddenly into colonial enterprise after the Franco-Prussian War, and today pushes Italy toward Abyssinia.

The same thing is happening in the international field that happened in the American labor field, when part of the labor force was reduced to slavery. The

~~It was in 1861 that an Italian statesman said: "We have made Italy, now we must make Italians."~~ The ~~unification~~ nationalization of ~~the country, beginning with the revolution of 1821 and 1848,~~ Italy had finally been accomplished in 1870. But Italy was poor and ~~poorly~~ undoubtedly was developed. Industries sprang up in the North, while agriculture dominated the South. But, if Italy was to become one of the great powers, she had to have modern industrial development, and that she conceived depended upon imperial expansion. Her treatment by France in the matter of Tunis and Tripoli, and by England, in the case of Abyssinia, threw her into the arms of Germany and Austria, and she became part of the Triple Alliance. Nevertheless, on the eve of the World War, Prime Minister Salavdra declared that Italy's policy would be dictated by "Sacred Egoism." By taking Tripoli from Turkey in 1911-1912, Italy had helped precipitate there world-wide conflagration, and had gained for herself a strip of barren sand, by "a perfect nightmare of horror...a veritable carnage ~~of carnage~~." Thus, in 1914, Italy, holding herself aloof, offered herself to the highest bidder. ~~Offers came fast.~~

It was said that at one time France dangled the Port of Djibuti with its Abyssinian railway terminal, and the Colony of Tunis, ~~to Italy~~ before Italy in 1915. At any rate, in the secret treaty of London, ~~signed April 26, 1915,~~ it was expressly agreed by Great Britain, France and Russia, not only that Italy was to receive large portions of Austrian territory, but that: (Article XIII of the Treaty of London of April 26, 1915.)

"In the event of an extension of the French and British colonial possessions in Africa at the expense of Germany, France and Great Britain recognize to Italy in principle the right of demanding for herself certain compensations, in the form of an extension of her possessions in Eritrea, Somaliland, Libya, and the colonial districts bordering on French and British colonies."

Italy immediately entered the war on the side of the Allies, and there ~~was~~ ensued lively ~~much~~ discussion of future Colonial development by imperial Italian bodies, like the Istituto Coloniale Italiano, the Società Africana d'Italia, the Società Italiana di Esplorazioni, and the Istituto Orientale di Napoli, and by a number of publicists.

For her entrance into the war, Italy paid a terrible toll. Six Hundred Thousand lay dead and a million were wounded. The country seethed with disillusion and discontent, and the Paris Conference, by ignoring the Treaty of London, gave Italy what she regarded as a "mutilated victory", despite the territory which she gained from Austria. As a result, the Socialists, who had opposed Italy's entrance in the war, captured the government in 1919. and the beginnings of proletarian revolution in the form of Syndicalism appeared. Factories were seized and labor seized for control.

Italy must choose and choose quickly between a redistribution of wealth and economic power dictated by the working classes, or a re-organization of industry in the interests of capital but as for restrained ~~far enough as~~ that the mass of workers could be kept as labor in peaceful subjection. The resultant Fascism, started by the march on Rome in 1922, and gradually developed, faced a tremendous task. It must keep peace, restore confidence, curb the power of capital, furnish more capital, and insure profits. These contradictory objects could be carried out only if the first could be continuously assured, and the last realized, in fact Confidence and faith in Italy, and peaceful submission to the burdens of war and oppression, were accomplished by a subtly conceived psychological onslaught, which revived in the minds of young Italy the glory of Rome and the expansion of colonial empire.

For glory, it appealed to youth in its curiously ~~[illegible]~~ eloquent national hymn: "Youth, springtime of beauty. Fascism is the safeguard of our liberty." What compels Mussolini to say Italy must have revenge for Adowa? 16

"I heard Mussolini say on one occasion, speaking from the balcony of the Chigi Palace on the Corso in Rome—this was before he moved over to the Palazzo Venezia—to the Camice Nere (Blackshirts) when you look at the map, you see that the island of Sicily is the southernmost limit of our empire. But I swear to you that the day will come when the island of Sicily will be the geographical center of our empire."

The history of Rome was invoked, and Mussolini began sabre-rattling on a tremendous scale, and particularly emphasized the fact that Italy proposed to have colonies where she could settle her expanding population, and that also that population must expand. The millions of Italians who had immigrated to North and South America must in the future find homes under the Italian flag. Moreover, Mussolini said frankly that Tripoli and Eritrea were not enough. "These two colonies alone cannot solve our population problem, mark this well." He emphasized the plight of the Italians in Tunis. There were ninety thousand of them against seventy-one thousand Frenchmen, and the French were threatening to turn Italian children into French citizens. Mussolini protested bitterly and demanded a great navy to direct a future empire.

What all this means is made clearer by considering the present Colonial position of Italy. She has three African colonies: Lybia, which is the former Tripoli and Cyrenaica, and the coast bordering Abyssinia, Eritrea, with 621,000 inhabitants, and the other, Somaliland, with 1,000,000. Most of these inhabitants in all three colonies are natives, there being in the total population of two and one-third million, less than 50,000 Italians.

The colonies do not pay for themselves, and it costs Italy some $25,000,000 a year above their income to balance the budget. And of this, $25,000,000, $15,000,000 goes for a colonial army officered by Italians and manned by natives.

In the meantime, Abyssinia was bestirring herself. Menelik, the great emperor, died the year before the World War. He was succeeded by a daughter, and then by a grandson, whose hatred of Europeans and fanatical attitude on religion made him no fit instrument for a diplomatic role. Finally, ~~there came to the throne Ras Tafari.~~ Ras Tafari, a leading prince, was nominated as successor; he was crowned King in 1928, and Emperor November 2, 1930, amid the pomp of one of the oldest branches of the Christian Church. Significantly, he determined to call his country "Ethiopia, the land of the Burnt Faces," and not Abyssinia, from the Semitic tribe of Habesh. ~~To the far-sighted, the Coronation of Haile Selassie II~~

To the far-sighted, the coronation of the Emperor Haile Selassie II., presented at once foreboding and encouraging omens. He represented the beginning of a new era. Forces were at work to end the whole system of European aggression upon colored countries. In the formation of the League of Nations was the idea of a world tribunal where the lesser nations could at least be heard. The idea of the mandates was to put certain colonies under the guardianship of the League of Nations, and prevent at least the extremes of exploitation. In Abyssinia there seemed to lie the best chance for a new development. An unhampered tradition went back thousands of years that enabled these black men and brown to be proud of their color, their ancestry, their history. Surely, here was a chance to begin a new world. But if Abyssinia thus represented a beginning of new things, it also represented a continuation of the old, and this fact, too, was clear at the coronation. Representatives of thirteen countries braved the difficulties of travel and were present at Addis Abbaba. There was the Duke of Glouster, son of the King of England; there was the Duke of Udine, son of the King of Italy; there was Marshal Franchet d'Esperey, representing France; and a royal prince of Japan. The British representative stood, ~~of course~~ always, at the emperor's right hand, and the Italian at his left. It looked almost like a foregathering of ~~conquerors~~, watching a feast, where each one was seeing that ~~least should get~~ the largest possible share.

Meantime, the new Emperor ~~Haile Selassie II.~~, born in 1891, and much travelled in Europe, was evidently an enlightened man who proposed to make Abyssinia a modern country. He is a little brown man with curly hair, dignified and serious, educated in France, and eager for the advance of his country. As Prince, he had visited England, France and the continent, and wished to come to the United States, but the United States did not invite him. He began sending a few Abyssinians to be educated abroad; he began to reorganise justice, and tried to re-build the state in many ways. There were difficulties. Some were internal. Abyssinia is nearly two thousand years old with an unbroken tradition, strong feudal princes, strong old families, strong and linked customs, opposed to change, and the emperor had to attack evils like domestic slavery slowly and with care. Yet in this case European philanthropy with rapacious commercialism fixed upon it, hammered at the reformer & forced him & Abyssinia to fight for his slow changing nation.

~~(Insert.)~~ ~~THE AFRICAN ROOTS OF WAR~~

Nevertheless, the international relations of ~~Abyssinia~~ Ethiopia, coupled with old efforts at economic intervention, make the situation of the country difficult. In 1906, the agreement between Great Britain, France and Italy to respect and preserve the integrity of Abyssinia was really designed to prevent industrial concessions made to one from injuring the claims of any of the others. The notes between Great Britain and Italy in 1925 secretly divided Ethiopia into spheres of influence with Great Britain dominant in the regions of Lake Tsana and the headwaters of the Nile, and Italy along its borders in Eritrea and Somaliland. Ethiopia brought this ~~contract~~ treaty to the League of Nations. Mussolini explained, and Mac Donald half apologized, and later, when certain American engineers in 1927 signed a $20,000,000 contract to dam the waters of Lake Tsana, England insisted upon her prior rights, and by quiet ~~and secret~~ diplomacy ~~apparently~~ broke the contract. So far, the ~~Abyssinians~~ Ethiopians have avoided the pitfalls which put Algeria, Tunis and Egypt into debt-servitude to the bankers of Europe. ~~Abyssinia~~ Ethiopia has at present no public debt, and the banking facilities of the country which were for a long time under the domination of Egypt, and thus indirectly of England, have recently been consolidated under the Bank of Ethiopia.

On the other hand, in the matter of communications, Ethiopia has become seriously entangled. The history of this goes back to the concessions which Menelik made in 1894 to a French company for a railroad from Djibuti through Harrar to Addis Abbeba and the White Nile. Construction was hurried directly after the Battle of Adowa, and English commerce was greatly aroused. When the French were unable to raise sufficient capital for the enterprise, they borrowed from ~~the~~ English investors, and then tried to make the railroad a government enterprise. To this Menelik strongly objected. Thereupon, it was proposed that the railroad be internationalized and owned by several European governments, but Menelik would not consent to this. Finally, when the French company was bankrupt in 1907, a new private company was formed under an Ethiopian, whose bonds were backed by the guaranty of the French government, but whose real owners were the French and English, with a few ~~Abyssinians~~ Ethiopians.

Four hundred and eighty-six miles of this railroad have now been built. In addition to this, the Italians own 1,225 miles of telegraph lines, while the Ethiopians themselves have five thousand miles of telephone. The resources of Abyssinia are almost entirely undeveloped. The population is probably about ten million. The annual value of its trade, imports and exports, is about $10,000,000, and there are undoubtedly large mineral resources in the mountains, not to mention the entire undeveloped water power.

It is clear that the present crisis between Italy & Abyssinia had its immediate cause in two facts: (21)

~~It seems probable that the present crisis has been precipitated by two facts:~~ the discovery of oil in a desert border region where Abyssinia has long had imperfect control, and where Italy, for commercial reasons, has been encroaching upon the ill-defined boundaries. Secondly, ~~that Mussolini has been compelled to do something to make good his saber-rattling before the eyes of the youth of Italy.~~

Mussolini used to wind up his most flamboyant speeches with a fiery exclamation: "E Tunisia?" To this word, pronounced in a questioning tone of voice, the massed blackshirts then replied with a thunderous shout: "A Noi!" which means: "To Us!"

Because the sudden re-alignment of European alliances caused by the murder of Dolfuss, has compelled Mussolini to justify his saber-rattling & the youth of Italy in Ethiopia rather than in Tunis or Africa

The murder of the prime minister of Austria by the German Nazis killed an understanding between France & Italy which might have forced France & England to disgorge the German colonies in Africa and grant Italian African demands in full. But Italy feared Pan Germany more than France, & France feared Hitlerism more than Italianism, and England feared German industrial competition

Laval & Mussolini renewed ~~the~~ ~~pact~~ ~~the Locarno~~ the old alliance & came to understanding

., Exactly what their written understanding was has not bee published, but it is pretty clear from subsequent events; Nothing probably was said about the navy. Italy has little money to build ships, even if she wants to. Some concessions were made as to Italians in Tunis, and some territorial concessions in the hinterland of Tripoli, probably not large in actual extent, but important in opening one of the main trade routes from Lake Chad to Tripoli, and involving some 50,000 square miles of territory. ~~But~~ The main concession undoubtedly was in Abyssinia, and that concession consisted, first, in promising to keep hands off if Mussolini should make war upon Abyssinia, and seize any part of her territory. Secondly, to grant Italian capital additional power in Abyssinia. It is rumored Hitler recently in his Saar speech, intimated that the work of ~~leading~~ redeeming German colonies had not been finished, and he doubtless used the word "colony" advisedly. ~~But~~ The Germany is going to demand the return of ~~Colonial~~ German Africa, ~~be-~~ before she consents to raise the war menace in Europe, is absolutely certain.)

that three thousand shares of the Djibuti Railroad has been turned over to Italy and that a rectification of frontier between Eritrea and French Somaliland has been so arranged as to give Italy direct access to the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb.

All this means a tighter economic cordon around Ethiopia to make her access to foreign markets more difficult, and to keep out capital from countries other than Italy, Great Britain, and France. Behind this movement, and tending to strengthen the common interests of these imperial powers, are two menaces from Asia: the recent appearance of Japan in Abyssinian industrial development, has alarmed the West. It is rumored that Japan has already captured one-third of the commerce of Abyssinia, and the French charge that the Japanese wish to equip Ethiopia industrially, and furnish technical help for her new machines. If in this way Japan should obtain an economic foothold in Ethiopia, she might lay claim to share in one of the ports of the Red Sea through which Ethiopian commerce must pass. And as a French writer has said recently:

"...on that day Japan will say: 'I want Djibuti. It belongs to me on account of my tremendous interests in Ethiopia.' And who knows whether or not we shall have to concede in order to save Indo-China from civil war or even from a war of aggression? Germany also sees things from this point of view and does not hide her satisfaction, as Heinrich Nebel's recent articles in the Frankfurter Zeitung indicate." (pp. 404, 405, Living Age, Henry De Monfreid in the Nouvelles Littéraires.)

Italy then mobilizes against Ethiopia; no shot of the League of Nations; no shirk of the treaty of arbitration; no shirk of repeated efforts at conciliation or adjustment, her troops are piling soldiers & equipment into Eritrea. She intends to seize Ethiopia covering on one pretext or another, to secure oil and to draw a tighter broad base of economic & military aggression about her. Ethiopia will not attempt complete conquest — the inner citadel is too

~~Moreover, Italy sees another threat to her economic and her African development, small but growing, and that is~~ the new independence of the kingdom of the Arabs opposite Abyssinia across the Red Sea, ~~At best, this new kingdom~~ at best, is going to cut off Italian trade with Eritrea, and at worst, it is going to encourage every Arab in North Africa to remember the trail of blood through which Italy walked to secure the barren victory of Tripoli. Again

Here, then, is war again. That war which has never ceased since the World War, but comes now nearer the European circle where its sparks are increasingly dangerous. Moreover, let no one think that the demand of Italy in Africa is the end of demands. The reason that Germany refuses to make categorical answers to the handsome overtures of France and England concerning re-arming and debt is because there is still one unmentioned subject, and that is, German colonies, and particularly German colonies in Africa, since the attitude and power of Japan makes colonial aggression in Asia unhealthful just now. The scramble, therefore, in Africa, for cheap labor and cheap war material is not ended. It helped start World War in 1914, and it may easily do it again in our day, and if this international jealousy does not start such a war, the war may be started by the African themselves, for after all, Africa is not held by Europeans. ~~Nine out of ten of the troops, even ninety-nine out of every hundred, who hold Africa for England, France, Belgium and Italy, are black men, and they are black men who are beginning to think. One of these days they are going to take Africa, either of their own volition, or with the help of the wide dominion of sons of Africa the world over.~~ The attempt to throttle Abyssinia as a salve for keeping Italian workers from open revolt may easily be the real cause to set the world aflame.

~~To all this, must be added only one more thing:~~ Africa today is held in subjection to Europe by black armies. Except in the Union of South Africa, nine-tenths of the European armies are composed of natives. Their allegiance has been bought by emphasizing tribal jealousies and encouraging envy, and doling out small amounts of power and prestige. But this is not enough. The unrest in black Africa is widespread. We are told that ~~when~~ the killing of Italians by Abyssinian tribesmen ~~was heard, it~~ quickly spread to every coast of the black continent. One of these days, the very troops by which Europe holds Africa, are going to cease to play the part so long assigned them. It only needs the guiding thought and the great leader. And with all that Europe can do in airplane, tank and war guns, let the world remember that a group of determined black men, armed even partially with modern tehcnique, could take their stand on the snow-swept heights of Ethiopia, within sight of the Equator, and in the midst of the black world, and shake the very centers of European imperialism. The day that the League of Nations lets Italy strangle Ethiopia will begin the low roll of this tom-tom. It may not be today or in one hundred years, but it will come.

(Insert.) THE AFRICAN ROOTS OF WAR

After the Armistice, the French are said to have approached Colonel House with a proposal to scrap all the secret treaties, including the Treaty of London, in order to curb Italy.

There are 71,000 Frenchmen in Tunis and 90,000 Italians. In 1921, Italian subjects born in Tunis, either of whose parents were born in Tunis, were declared to be French citizens.

Tripolitania and Cyrenaica are together called Lybia, and are worthless desert unless the hinterland can be pushed down to the (mouth) of Lake Chad.

There are 41,000,000 Italians on a peninsula smaller than the state of New Mexico. Millions of Italians have emigrated up to North and South America.

There is no information about the history of Abyssinia from the beginning of the 9th Century B.C. to the end of the 1st Century. Egyptians say nothing about it, although they may have traded with Abyssinians. The Ptolemies sought to develop trade and opened up the Caravan Road to the Red Sea, whence he sent expeditions southward to the country of the blacks. Thus, the Ptolemies undoubtedly came in contact with the Abyssinians. Axum especially profited by the new trade and became a halting place for caravans. It probably was not founded until the beginning of the 1st Century and reached the zenith of its power in the 4th Century. Little is known of the history of Axum in the 2nd or 3rd Centuries. The greatest king of the time was Ezana. It was he who proclaimed Christianity.

Greek culture entered Ethiopia fairly early, and later, Roman influence was felt. Meroe was destroyed, however, before the introduction of Christianity.

Ethiopia was destroyed by a king of Axum in Abyssinia in the 5th Century, A.D. The kings of Axum claimed suzerainty of Ethiopia as early as 356 A.D., but did not destroy its capital until a century later.

In the Seventh Century, A.D., the domination of Europe over Northern Africa stopped, and the Arabs of Asia succeeded them.

In 640 A.D., an Arab army conquered Northern Egypt, and took it from the Byzantine governors. This army then entered North Africa.

Five kings reigned between 360 and 480, but of these little is known. In 525, the Abyssinians in sixty ships sent by the Emperor Justinian, landed in Arabia and captured Yemen. Finally, Yemen was recaptured by the Persians about 598.

In the second half of the Fifth and Sixth century, a large number of monks came to Abyssinia and founded monasteries. The conquest of the Arabs, however, gave new life to the Pagans before Christian religion declined. But in the first half of the 10th Century, Judith or Esther, seized the kingdom, massacred the Royal princess and made herself Queen of Abyssinia. She reigned forty years and destroyed Axum and Christianity. Her successors from Lasta were Christians but a different sect from the Axumite Christians. The old line of kings was not restored until 1270.

The line of kings descended from the Queen of Sheba and Solomon was broken off by 950, and for about 300 years the throne was occupied by the Zagwe, who reigned from 950 to 1260. About the middle of the 10th Century, a religious revolution broke out in Abyssinia. The authors were the Falashas, who were of Jewish origin and practiced Judism, and the Zagwe, a native tribe, who were Christians. The leader of the revolution was Judah, or Esther, meaning fire. She put her son on the throne and murdered 400 of the royal princes. One of them, however, was taken to Shoa. Judah reigned forty years and destroyed Christianity and the city of Axum. On her death, the family of Lasta succeeded. There were 11 kings, 5 Jewish, and 6 Christian. The whole period of the Zagwe is involved in darkness.

It seems probable from more careful criticism that Esther was not a Jewish but a Pagan, and belonged to the Zagwe tribe of Agaw.

The last of the Zagwe kings, under the influence of a monk, resigned in favor of Yekueno Amlak, a prince of Shoa, of the Solomon line. Thus, the old line was restored to the throne and a large part of the land of the kingdom given to the Church.

In the second half of the 13th Century, Coptic Monks came from Egypt to Abyssinia and restored the Abyssinian Church. They translated the new Testiment. Meantime, the Mohammendans invaded Abyssinia and destroyed the Church and books, but the Abyssinians called in the Portuguese troops unassisted, and then, in 1546, a Jesuit mission arrived. The Jesuits tried to take the Abyssinian Church into the Catholic Church but were driven out with great cruelty. The head of the Abyssinian Church is the Aboon, who is ordained by the patriarch in Cairo.

Until the close of the 15th Century, Europe knew nothing of the exact history of Ethiopia. It was believed to be ruled over by a Christian Potentate called Prester John. He was identified with the John, Patriarch of the Indians, who visited Rome in the 12th Century. By the middle of the 14th Century, Prester John's kingdom was swept to the Ethiopians. Probably the Abyssinian legend of Prester John went back to the 4th Century and antedated John of India.

Between the thirteenth and sixteenth centuries, the Egyptians through Sudan became a center of a large number of Mohammed captains, with Arabs, mulattoes and Negro slave captains. The Portuguese entered Abyssinia from the South, and played a considerable part. Then came the Mohammedans, but they were kept back from Abyssinia by the Sudanese chiefs captains.

Anarchy ensued in Abyssinia after the death of Theodore, and the regional chiefs became independent, while the Egyptians steadily encroached from the North. The anarchy continued, from 1868-1872, but in 1872, Johannes of Tigre proclaimed himself emperor, in spite of the rivalry of Menelik of Shoa, who still maintained his independence. By 1872, the Egyptians had occupied Keren in Northern Abyssinia, and in 1875, seized the whole district of Harar, a border province near the eastern center of Abyssinia, and dominating thetrade to the coast. They also attempted to invade Abyssinia from Zeila, and Johannes was killed in the attempt to oppose them. The Egyptian forces were led by various European officers well-armed. Eventually, however, in 1876, the Egyptians were nearly anniliated at Jura, although they were still in possession of Kassala, Keran, Massowah, the coast, and the province of Harar.

the country in the face of the Rebel chiefs, and England sawmno necessity, then, of seeking to hold it. Practically, however, the British left Abyssinia weakened, and open to the aggressions of the Turks and the Egyptians, who had seized the coast of what is now Italian Eritrea.

The history of Ethiopia in the 19th Century is a part of the history of European imperialism. In 1850, the Emperor John was ruling there. After the rebellion, he was succeeded by an extraordinary man, Theodore, in 1855. European visitors; German, French and English, began to invade Abyssinia, and this rather sudden contact of Africa and Europia led to disputes and misunderstandings. Theodore arrested the British Minister, and as a result, in 1867, the English, under Napier, invaded and defeated Theodore. Theodore surrendered, but this did not satisfy the English. They perpectuated his capture, and Theodore committed suicide, after which his body was shamefully desecrated by the conquerors. Napier was made a Lord, but the English withdrew, leaving anarchy in Abyssinia.

John, VI., succeeded in 1872, and had to beat back the Egyptians. In the meantime, English, French and Italians began to seize the coast of Abyssinia with the idea of claiming the hinterland. By various shadowdy titles, the Italians got Assab, the French Obock, and the English Zeila. But the plans of the English were interfered with by the rebellion under the Mahdi, 1881-1885. This drove the English out of the Sudan, although they established themselves in Egypt in 1882. Finding themselves unable to press upon Abyssinia, they invited the Italians to seize Massowah, a strategic marketplace for Abyssinian trade. The Italians, thus encouraged, began their intrigue. They made alliance with Menelik, one of the subordinate princes, who was rebelling against John. A treaty was signed at Uecilalli in 1889 between Menelik and the Italians, and that year Menelik became emperor of Abyssinia. Immediately, Italy announced that through the treaty they were ministers of Abyssinia, and in England maps were published showing Abyssinia as Italian.

In the Fifteenth Century, the Portuguese began their explorations in Africa. 47-10-216
They reached the Cape of Good Hope in 1488, went up the Coast of East Africa in the early Sixteenth Century, and about 1532 appeared in Abyssinia where they sent 400 horsemen with artillery to help the king repel the attacks of the Mohammedans, who had come South as far as Massowah. Portuguese and Catholic missionaries established themselves in Abyssinia.

In East Africa, Semites from Arabia entered Abyssinia and mixed with the Negro and Negroid populations.

The religion in which Axum was situated was called Habesh, from which the name Abyssinia is derived. The people of Axum preferred to call their country Ethiopia and not Habesh, for to them Ethiopia was Kush and the Kushites had become masters of Northeast Africa. The name Habesh is derived from a Semetic tribe called Habashat. Members of this tribe had crossed the Red Sea from South Arabia and settled in Africa, coming probably from Yemen. The natives did not think much of them.

Axum is one of the oldest towns in Abyssinia.

It was for years a refuge for the Jews driven out of Palestine by the Asyrians. It stood in the midst of the great path of Egypt down to Punt and sent them either by the Red Sea or the Great Lakes.

After the political ~~troops~~ changes in Palestine followed the conquest of Alexander the Great, Jews in small groups migrated to Abyssinia and North Africa.

In Abyssinia, 200 or 300 years before Christ, they settled and formed a tribe called the Falashas. These were much mixed with Negro blood.

Axum, still the ~~secret~~ sacred city of the Abyssinians, flourished from the 1st to the 7th Century, A.D., and was converted to Christianity about 450 A.D. The Amhara Province in the Northern part of Abyssinia, near Lake Tsana, has as its capital, Gondar. This province obtained a sort of predominance, and the emperor had his capital there. Later, Menelik, the II., placed the capital further South at Addis-Abeba. The Amharic language succeeded the ancient Ethiopic language, and is not Semetic.

According to a few ancient ~~descendants~~ documents in Abyssinia, the Abyssinians were descendants from Ham, and the sons of Ham were fathers of the people of Nubia, Egypt, Libra and Phoenicia; that is, Kush, Misraim, Put and Canaan. According to one ~~descendant~~ document, Menelik, the 1st, was the son of Solomon; and the Queen of Sheba made Axum the center of the worship of Israel. Another legend says that Aethiopis, after whom the country was called, was buried at Axum, and that his descendants founded the city.

flourished until after the time of Christ, and gradually changed because of the failure of the Nile (waters) than for any other reason. Finally, Meroe was overthrown by the pressure of the Mohammendans, and culture took one further step back into the African continent. On the highlands of Abyssinia, Semitics from pre-historic times had mingled with the indigenous blacks.

In the meantime, on the highlands bordering the Red Sea, the people of Semetic blood, began to penetrate Abyssinia and amalgamate with the Negroes, so that there arose in Abyssinia, as this part of Ethiopia came to be called, a race of Negroes and Semetic mulattoes, which established a kingdom. This kingdom in the fourth century became Christian, and in the sixth century, it was trading with India and Byzantium, and at the request of the Emperor Justinean, conquered Yemen in 525 and held it fifty years. The Abyssinians were to spread in from Arabia and shut-in from Egypt on the north, so that, as Gibbon says: "Encompassed by the enemies of their religion, the Ethiopians slept for nearly a thousand years, forgetful of the world by whom they were forgotten." Yet throughout this period, the legend of a Christian kingdom hidden away in Africa persisted, and search for Prester John became one of the world quests.

The Semetic mulattoes formed a kingdom centering around Axum, which became a trading post in the time of the Ptolemis. This kingdom took its name from a Semetic tribe, but afterward, when it had for a time conquered Meroe, it began to claim suzerainty and kinship with ancient Ethiopia, and the Dynasty came to be more and more of distinctly Ethiopian blood. Three hundred years after Christ, the nation was converted to Christianity, and then when the flood of Islam rolled up the Nile, and the Negro tribes impelled perhaps by the drying up of the Sahara, precipitated themselves afterward into the Nile Valley; the Abyssinians retreated to their island fastness, and as Gibbon says: "Encompassed by its enemies, Ethiopia slept one thousand years forgetful of the world by which it was forgotten."

Rumors and legends of the beleagered kingdom reached the world during the Middle Ages in the shape of stories of Prester John, the Christian Presbyter, who ruled in central Africa. He was discovered by the Portuguese in the 15th Century coming up from the Cape-of-Good Hope, and thus Abyssinia was opened to the European world.

Who are the Abyssinians and what is their government? (Halle Salassie) the Second, is by tradition the 316th King to sit upon the throne, and certainly we know of at least 200 kings of Abyssinia in historic times. Abyssinia lies South of Ethiopia. If one starts with Alexandria and goes south 500 miles to the First Cataract, at Assouan, one comes to the confines of ancient Ethiopia, the Southern boundary of old Egypt. There can be no doubt of the mulatto character of the Egyptians, and that the Egyptians themselves were Negroes. Only that refinement of definition is denied the name Negro to most of the black people of the world who deny it to the Ethiopians. Nearly 500 miles south of Assouan is Meroe, and in this stretch of country centering at Napota, grew up a civilization which eventually conquered Egypt and held back Asia, and was for a century and a half, after 750 B.C., the greatest nation in the world. Then the Asyrian flood pushed the Ethiopians back to Meroe, a shield-like island formed by the waters of the Attbara and the Blue Nile. Here, again, civilization

Egypt, between the Mediterranean and the First Cataract of the Nile, and Aswan, had become a country of mulattoes with predominant Semetic blood, seven thousand years ago. Between the First and 2nd Cataracts, the Nile Valley was inhabited by mulattoes who were predominantly Negroes and brown or black, and below these were the Nubian or Ethiopian Negroes.

Egyptian rule ended at Wadi Halfa, south of the Second Cataract, where it reached its climax 3,200 years ago. At this point, Negro-land began. Between Wadi Halfa and the White and Blue Niles, the peoples were predominantly Negro with some ancient and modern mixture of blood.

The Negro races dwelling on the Nile beyond the First and Second Cataract were known as Wa Wa by the dynastic Egyptians.

The Hamites, between Egypt, the Red Sea and Abyssinia, were they are more Negroid than the dynastic Egyptians, are illustrated by Kipling's character, "Fuzzy-Wuzzy" from their bushy, kinky, hair and dark color. They were also known as the "Beja". Hence come the Hykos

After the Hyksos had been repulsed, the Egyptians tried to open up communication with Punt, the land of their ancestors, "where the incense trees grew." Punt was perhaps in Somaliland and perhaps in the region of the Great Lakes. The description of the people given by the Egyptians, 1470 B.C., indicates inhabitants of Uganda, and the Great Lakes Region.

Abyssinia was colonized by settlers from Yemen, probably in a series of movements extending over a considerable time. These immigrants became incorporated into the original black population.

47-10-213 Abyssinians claim that they are descendants of Ham, the son of Noah, and that Ham begot Kush and Kush begot Ethiopies, after whom their country is named. Probably the whole northeast quarter of Africa was originally peopled with Negroes, with a few Semites. The Kushite-Negroids drove back the primitive Negroes and occupied Ethiopian Abyssinia. Many centuries before Christ, Semites and Yemen and South Arabia crossed over into Africa. Among them was the tribe called Habashat, from which is derived the name Abyssinia. Other tribes also migrated. They mixed with the natives, and are today Semetic mulattoes, with a preponderance of Negro blood.

The territory south of Egypt was called by the Egyptians "Cush" and beyond the territories of "Cush" lay "Punt", which the Egyptians regarded as the cradle of their race. The word "Ethiopia" means "The land of the black face," and in ancient Mediterranean literature it was a legend of gods and fairies. Zeus and Poseidon feasted this year among the blameless Ethiopians, and black Memnon, King of Ethiopia, was one of the Homric heroes. Diodorus Siculus says that the Ethiopians conceive themselves to be of greater antiquity than any other nation, and that the Egyptians were one of their colonies. The Egyptians themselves often affirm that their civilization came from the South. As Egypt developed, a separate and independent Ethiopian culture began to arise which centered at Nepata, and Meroe. There was widespread trade in gold, ivory, skins and handicrafts. Later, when outer aggression appeared, Ethiopia became the physical and cultural refuge for conquered Egypt. In the new empire, Egypt began to incorporate Ethiopia, and later, the Ethiopian capital, gathering strength, expanded northward, and about 750 B.C. ruled over Egypt for a century, under Negroid and Negro Kings. Egypt was conquered, first, by the Assyrians and then by the Persians. But the Ethiopian kingdoms kept their independence and were ruled by full-blooded Negroes from 630 down to 500 B.C. From the fifth to the second century, B.D., white tribes from the Sudan began pressing in from the West, while Greek culture was penetrating from the East. The seat of empire began to change from Nepata to Meroe, and ~~at~~ Meroe, the ~~German~~ queen, called Candace reigned ad warred against Rome, at the time of Augustus. The prestige of Ethiopia at this time was considerable throughout the world, and the Romans inorder to check the Ethiopians called in the Nubians, who settled in Northern Ethiopia, which came to be known as Nubia. AP

Meroe is the greatest and fairest island which the Nile makes, and was compared by Herodotus to the shape of a shield. This island is inhabited by Mohammedans, who are in alliance with the Moors against the King of Abyssinia. (Pory)

The mission sent by Nero to discover the sources of the Nile reported that Meroe was 360 Roman miles from Napata. At this time, the town was said to have fallen into decay but once it had supported 200,000 soldiers and 4,000 artisans. It was ruled according to Pliny by a Queen named Candacy, who had 44 predecessors on the throne.

Under the Emperor Clauduis, 41-45 A.D., the Romans tried to develop the trade of Egypt, and Nego, A.D. 54-68, invaded lower Ethiopia; that is, the country beyond Nubia. For the last 200 years, A.D. 60-260, the Romans allowed the Nubians to do about as they pleased. In the reign of Diocletian, 284-305 A.D., the Romans, being attacked by desert tribes from the East, placed the Roman interests in Northern Nubia in the hands of Negroes from the Western desert. They were given lands and a yearly tribute. Thus, by paying off selfish tribes against each other, Diocletian secured peace for Egypt. There was further trouble in the reign of Theodosius, the 2nd, A.D. 408-450; and toward the close of the reign of Justinian, A.D. 527-565, there was further trouble. In 641, the Moslems made Nubia a province of the Mohammedan empire, and sent an army of 20,000 men a gainst them. In return, the Nubians invaded Upper Egypt and were again crushed. The Nubians embraced Christianity under Sileo about 450 A.D., and made Dongola their capital.

Then, for a period of about 600 years, the Nubians paid tribute to the Arabs. In 722, they marched against Egypt with an army of 100,000 men, and again in 1833, they were at war with the Mohammendans, and in 1854, continual war, revolt and conquest between the Arabs and the Nubians took place up until 1174, when Saladin's troops again crushed the Nubians, and in 1275, the Arabs annexed it. Still revolts followed. In 1287, Al-Mensur raided the country, but the Nubians expelled him. He went a second time. Fighting continued between Nubians and Arabs from 1311 to 1412, until the Arabs were compelled to give up, and did not finally conquer Nubia until they united with the Negro tribe of Fungs, whose capital was Sennaar. When Selim conquered Egypt in 1517, the Fungs had control of Nubia, and the Arabs took the rule of Northern Nubia, and the Fungs of Southern Nubia. Here, the Fungs ruled, from 1534 to 1829. In 1820, Muhanmed Ali sent an army of Turks and Arabs to conquer Nubia. He was killed.

and his father massacred Nubians with terrible atrosities. About 1840, Ahmed Pasha united the country, and Mohmed Ali's Sudan thus included all the territories of the ancient kingdom of Napota and Meroe. During the next 40 years, 1840-1880, these province were reduced to a state of ruin and absolute misery by the misrule and oppression of the Egyptians. Mohanmed Amad, known as the Madhi, led a rebellion. He was born in 1843, and declared himself the Messiah in 1881. The Mohammedans, expecting the Messiah to appear in 1882. He defeated the government troops, the Egyptian army, and in January, 1885, captured Khartum and murdered Gordon. The Madhi died June 22, 1885, and the Khalifa began to carry out his plans for the conquest of Egypt. It was not until 1896, after the battle of Adowa, that Kitchener started to recover Khartum. In the battle of Omdurman, Kitchner killed 10,800 and wounded 16,000, while his army lost 48 killed and 382 wounded. It was machine guns against shotguns.

Germany appeared on the scene with consul and showed that she was ready to take a hand in the Abyssinian game. The struggle for Morroco took place March, 1905, and January, 1906, in the conference at Algeciras and Germany. Three months after this conference, France, Great Britain and Italy signed a ggreement of 1906. "They were to respect the integrity of Abyssinia. The headwaters of the Nile were not to be interfered with while Italy was given the right to extend a railway and telegraph system from her colony of Eritrea. France was confirmed in her right to construct the railway from Djibuti, but the Board of Administration was to include an Abyssinian, an Englishman and an Italian. Abyssinia agreed to this December 13, 1906, but in 1907, the French Company went into bankruptcy, and at the request of the French minister, Menelik granted the railway concessions of Abyssinia to Dr. Vitalien, physician to the court. The new company was to pay the bankrupt company an annuity of 600 ,000 francs a year for ninety-nine years, and this sum was guaranteed by France."

Here, then, is the situation. Practically, Italy has received a part, if not all, of the hinterland of Triopli toward Lake Chad. She has received a larger share of the Abyssinian trade by being made a co-partner in the French railroad, and by her virtual monopoly of telegraph lines. She maintains on the borders of Abyssinia, a military force, including airplanes; and recent clashes on the undefined southeastern border, has led recently to open clashes between Italian and Abyssinian troops, arising, it is rumored, from the Italian discovery of oil.

Meantime, the French had built a railroad from their narrow coast possessions and the harbor of Djibuti, to Addis Ababba, a length of 486 miles, which is the main line for direct trade between Abyssinia and the outer world. Over this railroad and by caravan to the Sudan, go about $6,000,000,000 worth of exports and imports each year, chiefly hides and skins, coffee, wax, ivory, civet, and butter. There are twelve hundred miles of Italian-owned telegraph lines, and five thousand miles of telephone lines controlled apparently by the Abyssinians themselves. In one respect, however, Abyssinia has refused to go the way of Algeria, Tunis and Egypt. She has contracted from foreign debt, and she has recently bought out the Bank of Abyssinia owned by Egyptians, and re-placed it by the Bank of Ethiopia. It would look from this as though Abyssinia was going to have a chance for development, but difficulties have long loomed, and now come to head.

The description of Ethiopa given by Homer, Herodotus, Diodorum, Strabo, and Pliny, show that they meant vast tracts of country in Asia and Africa inhabited by dark-skinned and black-faced people. They divided them into Eastern Ethiopia and Western Ethiopia. The former marched in Arabia, Seria, Mesopotamia and India, and the latter, in the regions West of the Red Sea, Egypt and the Sudan. The translaters of the Bible identified Kush with Ethiopia but knew nothing of Abyssinia. The name Ethiopia was given to Abyssinia by those who translated the Bible from Greek into Ethiopic. To this day, the Abyssinians call their country Ethiopia.

it should be bemembered, of course, that these are non-official views. Some of the claims are undoubtedly exaggerated, and have been criticized by Italians themselves, but there is substantial unanimity on the main points." (pp. 391, 392, 393, African Questions at the Parish Peace Conference. G. L. Beer.)

47-10-206

The Paris Peace Conference gave Italy "a mutilated victory." The country was at the time seethed with disillusion and discontent. The result was that Socialists who had opposed Italy's entrance in the war captured the government in 1919, but strikes and disorders ensued. Workers seized factories in Northern Italy, but could not operate them for lack of technical experts and capital. This weakened the Socialist Party.

The Fascist marched on Rome October 27, 1922, and Mussulini became Premier October 30.

But

Menelik protested. He said that he had never signed any treaty of that sort; that what the treaty said was that Abyssinia might avail themselves of the good offices of Italy and foreign relations. On the other hand, the Italians claimed that Menelik had admitted that he must be represented by Italy in foreign affairs. Italy tried to enforce her interpretation by arms, but was decisively defeated in the battle of Adowa in 1890. This threw imperial plans of Italy, France and England into confusion. The Italians had to give up their idea of aggression in Abyssinia for forty years. The English saw the headquarters of the Nile threatened unless they re-captured the Sudan. Only a few months after the battle of Adowa, they started back to the Sudan, after having been out of it ten years, and in 1898, recaptured Chartoun.

Meantime, the French proposed to anticipate the English, and in conjunction with an Abyssinian army, to occupy a strategic post at Fashoda. The French arrived there in time. The Abyssinians did not, and when the English army came, they found the French flag flying. European war over the Sudan and Abyssinia was immiment, but in 1899, the French and the English made treaty by which the Nile Valley was surrendered to the English, while the Hinterland of Triopli was surrendered to the French. Italy was disinherited.

Impériale des Chemins de Fer Ethiopiens. The capital was supplied by a group of French financial houses and the French Colonial Office worked closely with them. Construction was begun in 1897. This aroused alarm in London but the English went at the matter methodically. They formed one or two investment associations with noblemen and army officers on the Board of Directors. It was tentatively in 1898 that these companies might participate in the Abyssinian railroad. The statement became more explicit in 1900 and 1901. Gradually, British interests put money into the French enterprise in return for shares. This was allowed by the French on condition that they be allowed to break the agreement at any time on forfeiture of 625 thousand francs. By 1901, the British had almost a controlling interest in the French company, and two directors on the board, and they had, also, a monopoly for building further railway extensions in Abyssinia. This aroused French Colonial circles, and the British quietly threatened that unless they were allowed a part they would build a branch of the railroad to the British Port of Zeilah. French Colonial circles were somewhat aroused and the French government offered the company an annual subvention of 500,000 francs for fifty years, which would allow them to terminate their agreement with the British capitalists. In return, the company had to remain a French company and all the members of the Board were to be French, and the government had powers to fix rents and oversea general management. This brought a protest from Menelik since he had not been consulted, and he declared that he had granted the concession to a private company which had now become the government of France. Sir Johnson Harrington, the British representative, emphasized this aspect. French influence in Abyssinia began to fall and Menelik, by refusing to co-operate, made the French proposal impossible, nor could the private company raise further capital. The English, however, proposed a compromise, and that was that the railway be internationalized over its entire length, and Djibuti made a free port. Otherwise, they demanded an English terminus for the railroad. In 1905, Menelik summoned the French, British, Italian and Russian ministers to an audience, and asked for some sort of decision. Both the British and the Italians asked for nationalization. The French representative awaited news from France before he spoke. Meantime, the Entente Cordiale, both French and English, had begun and found solution most from them. The British wanted to furnish funds for the extension of the railroad if the French would agree to the nationalization. Finally, however, the agreement of July 6, 1906, was made before in 1904.

Italy's grievances were increased, when at the end of the war in the Treaty of Versailles, in spite of the fact that the German colonies were divided between England, France, and Belgium, and Italy, got practically nothing. Her estrangement from France, therefore, continued, and Mussulini insisted upon concessions in Africa. Recently, a treaty has been signed made necessary by the developments of Austria and Germany. France, because of her fear of the re-arming of Germany, had to make concessions to Italy. Exactly what these concessions were in Africa is not yet known, and yet their general outline seems clear. One dispatch defines them as follows:

Until 1885 Italy's footing in the Red Sea hardly extended beyond Assab; but in that year, taking advantage of Egypt's difficulties with the Mahdists, she took possession of Beilul and of the important port of Massawa, the Egyptian garrison of the latter being compelled to quit. These steps were taken with the connivance if not the approval of England. Had Italy not taken and held Massawa, it might have fallen into the hands of the Mahdists. Italian domination rapidly extended all along the coast, so that by 1888 it reached from Cape Kasar, south of Suakim, on the north, to the French colony of Obock in the south, some 650 miles." (pp. 391, 392, The Partition of Africa, F. S. Keltie.)

"The events which took us to the Red Sea are known. On the eve of the Congress of Berlin, England had asked us to come to an agreement with her, offering us Tunis. The refusal of Cairoli, in pursuance of the so-called 'clean hands' policy, led England to come to an agreement with France over Tunis, with the consequence that at the Congress we found ourselves isolated and received no advantages. A second occasion presented itself to us to enter upon colonial expansion, when England, in 1882, preparing to occupy Egypt, asked us to participate in the enterprise. We refused again, Magliani insisting on this refusal from the fear that by accepting the invitation we should irritate France, while he deluded himself that he would be able to win France's financial good-will.

So we ended by going to Massaua, as a consolation prize, in agreement with the other powers, none of whom protested, except indeed Turkey who made a merely formal protest. Mancini, then at the Foreign Office, magnified the affair, pronouncing the famous phrase that the keys of the Mediterranean were in the Red Sea; but we have never found them there." (pp. 119, 120, Memoirs of My Life. Giovanni Giolitti.)

They had been cheated out of Tunis, as they regarded it. They were proposing to seize Triopli and thus get the hinterland back to Lake Chad. But as the Mahdi spread disaster to European imperialism in the Sudan, England politely told Italy to take her chestnuts out of the fire. Italy was ~~was~~ eager for the frontier. She helped Menelik and when he rose to be King of Kings of Ethiopia, after the death of Johannes, she immediately notified the world that Abyssinia was Italian territory and England seconded her notification with carefully engraved maps.

After Johannes had repulsed the Italians, Menelik, in 1887, occupied the Harar. In 1888, the Italians and Menelik concluded a treaty which recognized Menelik as King of Abyssinia on condition that he would join it against Johannes. Menelik received money and arms from the Italians. In 1889, Johannes determined upon a decisive campaign against the Madhi. In May, 1889, the Italians signed with Menelik the treaty of Uccialli. The Madhi ~~claimed~~ killed Johannes and Menelik became Emperor of Abyssinia. In return for this, Menelik yielded to the ~~Abyssinians~~ Italians certain territory in the North of Abyssinia bounded by three designated rivers. The Italians occupied this country, and immediately, toward the end of 1889, advanced across the borders and took Adowa, thus violating their treaty, but Menelik was busy subduing rebels and remained friendly with the Italians, who still supplied him with arms. The Italians proceeded to penetrate to Harrar, and France being alarmed, tried to come to understanding with Great Britain. Lord Salisbury was in a difficult place but agreed to a secret clause in the treaty of February, 1888, by which both Great Britain and France promised each other not to occupy the Harrar, and also the two governments would not promise to "renounce the right of receiving attempts on the part of any other power" to acquire the Harrar. This agreement was kept secret until 1894, but it led to trouble between France and England.

In May, 1889, when Italy signed the treaty with Menelik, the Italian Consul at Zanzibar, took over the Somali Coast from two ruling Sultans. They met rebellion along the natives but by hurrying reinforcements from Massowah, they suddeeded in getting possession of the land and handed it over to an Italian company for exploitation, especially giving them all mining rights and sovereign rights over the soil. No provision was made for rights of ownership on the part of native inhabitants.

In 1894, Menelik placed himself at the head of his armies, declared by proclamation: "Ethiopia has need of no one; she stretches out her hand to ~~no one~~ none but God." The French supplied ~~Menelik~~ him with arms and munitions from Djibuti. The result was that March 1, 1896, Italy suffered a crushing defeat at Adowa. She had to recognize the revocation of the Treaty of Uccialli, and the independence of Abyssinia. Her possessions were restricted to the colony of Eritria and the Somali Coast ~~which she had acquired between 1883-1892.~~

But both ~~imperial powers had~~ England + Italy had reckoned without their host. ~~There is no doubt but what the treaty of Uccialli was made after the fashion of Christian and European treaties with Asiatic and African potentates. It was understood that she was thinking in Africa, and without thinking in Italy,~~ Menelik denounced it. He not only denounced it but he took up arms. He declared Ethiopia had need of no men. "She stretches out her hand to no one but God." Her outstretched hands found willing and modern guns and supplies from France, and at the battle of Adowa, Italy's army of 40,000 was annihiliated.

But the British fleet was too powerful, the British army at Khartum ten times the size of Marchand's handful. So peace was made, and understanding. The hinterland of Triopli was given to France, the Nile Valley was given to England, and Italy had nothing left but defeat and frustration.

Great Britain tried to make a treaty with Abyssinia but only succeeded in rectifying the Eastern boundary between Abyssinia and British Somaliland. France was more successful, and undoubtedly the Abyssinia-French treaty of March 20, 1897, was not simply a treaty of come early and delimitation, although its exact terms were never published. Probably it sought to settle the matter of the Nile Valley by placing Ethiopia on the right side of the Nile and France on the West. At any rate, the railroad from Djibuti to the white Nile, after being untouched from 1894-1896, suddenly, in November, 1896, was begun by a French company; the Imperial Company of the Ethiopia Railroads. In addition to this, certain Russians appeared, and a Russian count was at the head of a heavily armed force known as the French-Russian Mission. This Count Leontief was made Governor-General of the Equatorial Provinces of Ethiopia, which, presumably, must lie in the Nile Valley toward the South and West, and at that time Uganda was still in dispute. If, in 1897, this expedition had been successful, Abyssinia and France would have been established in the rear of Fashoda. In 1897, A French explorer with fifteen thousand men marched southwest to Lake Rudolph. All these schemes were subsidiary to the expedition of Marchand. The second expedition was successful and Abyssinian territory now touched Lake Rudolph. A cousin of the emperor, in 1898, actually reached the white Nile with a force, but was overcome by fever and had to retreat before Marchand arrived.

ITALY

The unification of Italy began with the revolutions of 1821 and 1848. An Italian statesman said in 1861: "We have made Italy. Now, we must make Italians."

In 1912, the number of Italian voters was increased from about 3,000,000 to about 8,500,000.

The Nationalist Party formed in 1910 advocated expansion and imperialism. This resulted in the war between Turkey and Italy, 1911-1912, through which Italy obtained Triopli and Cyrenaica.

Premier Salendra declared that Italy's policy in the World War would be indicated by "sacred egoism."

Italy could only console herself by claiming Triopli, but Triopli was not itself of very little value, but chiefly desert, and supported only by one inhabitant to a square miles. Its value lay almost exclusively in the claim which its possession would give to the hinterland, reaching back to Lake Chad. After long intrigue, and finally war with Turkey in 1912, Italy seized Triopli, only to find that in the meantime, between 1890 and 1895, the whole of the hinterland had been seized by France, and that this had been a consolation prize granted her by Great Britain for withdrawal from Fashoda.

Meantime, ~~alle~~ this imperialistic intrigue curiously affected the situation in Europe. France and Italy are blood cousins, branches of the Latin race. But the indignation of Italy at having been ~~depriv~~ of spoils in Africa threw her into the triple alliance with Germany and Austria, Austria particularly being the natural enemy of Italy because of her domination over so much Italian territory in Europe.

Notwithstanding this alliance, when world war was threatened, Italy refused to stand by the triple alliance, and ~~gave her~~ sought a chance to get concessions from England and France. These were immediately offered.

They began new intrigue. With the approval of Great Britain, and perhaps at her suggestion, Italy in 1885, seized the Port of Massowah, which the Egyptians had given up. France charges that this was because the British were willing that Italy should recoup herself in Abyssinia from her losses to France in Tunis. Thus, the British, whose hands were tied, would receive Italy as an ally against the Madhi. Italy, then, began to develop her new coast colony of Eritrea and to send scientific and commercial expeditions into the Harar, and she was perhaps secretly encouraged by Britain to seek a new Italian empire in Abyssinia. This would not only hold back the Madhi, but also checkmate France. Whatever happened, the Italians would form a convenient, even if temporary protection, against the Madhi, and if they did not conquer the Abyssinians, Britain would be ready to step in to Abyssinia over the corpse of the Madhi slain by the Italians, and the corpse of the Italians, slain by the Abyssinians, and the corpse of the Abyssinians slain by the Madhi and Italians. All of this foresight may not have been true, but the it certainly fits into the picture.

The Italians have no shadow of claim to Massowah and could not have seized it without the acquiescence of Great Britain, and they were probably invited to seize it. In the Anglo-Italian treaty of 1894, it was agreed that Italy would be allowed temporarily to occupy Kassalla. In 1886, the Colonial circles of Italy began to agitate for the capture of the trade of Harar. A Society for the Commercial Exploration of Africa was formed in Italy, and started an armed commercial expedition, but were killed.

Meantime, the Englishhadtried to make alliance with the Abyssinians under Johannes, the VI., in 1880, and signed a treaty in 1884 which Johannes kept, and saved in this way five Sudanese stations from the Madhi. Thus, Great Britain's act in allowing the Italians to occupy Massowah, was really a breach of faith on the part of Great Britain against whichhit protested. Meantime, Italy began to expand. In 1886, she occupied several places on the coast, and as she advanced into the interior, Johannes succeeded in shaking her decisively, but he was threatened by the Madhi and by Menelik of Shoa. Menelik was in alliance with the Italians and was receiving arms from Massowah. At the same time, the Eastern Abyssinian tribes were being stirred up to rebellion by the Italians. As an Englishman said, the British behavior to King Johannes from any point of view, "did not show one ray of honesty." The British began propaganda against the King because he would not allow smoking and the taking of snuff. And back of this, went on the part of Britain, "one of the violent bits of treachery that has been perpetuated in Africa." (Woolf, p. 165.)

"A seriesof agreements, three in number, affecting French and Italian colonial possessions in Africa. Under the first, France concedes Italy extensive, though not commercially important territory in Tibesti in the southwest corner of Libva; under the second, she yields Italy territory in French Somaliland, running back from the coast, to be added to Italy's Eritrea, which will give the Rome government control of the Strait of Babelmandeb linking the Red Sea and the Gulf of Aden, and cedes to Italy 3,000 shares of stock in the Djibuti-Addis Ababa railroad; under the third, France agrees to extend for 10 years the citizenship and special privileges of Italian residents in Tunis, after which period they will be deprived of those special rights for 30 years."

A more detailed dispatch in the NEW YORK TIMES is as follows:

"ROME, Jan. 8.--An official communiqué issued tonight defined as follows France's cession to Italy of 44,500 square miles of territory in Africa:

"The frontiers of Libya (which belongs to Italy) are extended to a line which, leaving Tummo, reaches the western frontier of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan at the intersection of the 24th meridian east longitude with the 18th degree, 45 minutes, north latitude.

"This line leaves Aozou and Guezenti in Italian territory and Bardai and Tecro in French territory. The area thus added to Libya is approximately 44,500 square miles.

"The frontier between Eritrea (belonging to Italy) and French Somaliland is changed by a line drawn between Dereloua to Dadato on the Weima River. This change gives Italy a strip on the coast fronting on the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. Italy also gets the Island of Doumerrah. Frontier Commissions will work out the details of the new frontiers."

Abyssinia has never had a census. Some writers estimate the population at 2½ millions, and others at 3,000,000. De Castro says that there is 8 millions, while Morie says that there is 10 millions. Budge thinks that the population is under 4 million.

The total annual value of trade, imports and exports in Abyssinia is $10,000,000. The exports and imports by way of Djibuti railroad amounts to about half this. An export duty of 10%, ad valorem, is collected on goods from Abyssinia.

"At the outbreak of the Great War in August, 1914, Italy had remained neutral, announcing that, since Germany and Austria-Hungary were engaged in an offensive war, the casus foederis did not exist. At the same time the foreign minister, the Germanophile Marquis San Giuliano, had construed Italian neutrality as benevolent toward Germany. As the war progressed, however, and especially after the death of San Giuliano in December, 1914, and the accession to the foreign office of Baron Sidney Sonnino, in whose ancestry were both Jewish and British elements, the spirit of Italy's neutrality became less and less 'benevolent,'..."(p. 90, A Brief History of the Great War. Hayes.)

Abyssinia had always claimed that her dominions extended to the banks of the white Nile and for this reason Menelik had co-operated with France, and in the expedition from Ethiopia, a fort was to be put on the right bank of the Nile and a French fort on the left bank.

Access to this plateau is very difficult. There are some peaks estimated to be nearly 17,000 feet high. In ancient days this rocky plateau was practically inaccessable. The whole of Abyssinia was a huge rock fortress from which the natives could pore down on the coastlines by the thousands and then return to their heights. Ancient writers did not know anything about the Abyssinians. The Ethiopians which they described were not the dwellers on the plateau but the people who live on the flat coast and on the Red Sea, and the deserts to the West of the Nile and the lands to the south. The Abyssinians boast that they are an unconquered people and the British could never have taken Magela if they had not been helped by the Abyssinians themselves. The advantage of the plateau to the Abyssinians is that it gives them immunity from invasion. Its disadvantage is, that it cuts them off from the rest of the world.

The great rivers of Abyssinia flow from the east in the westerly or north westerly direction, and enter the Valley of the Nile. They carry down rich fertilizing mud into Egypt.

established conditions, and in 1902, a treaty was signed which definitely ended the struggle for the Nile Valley which was now recognized by Italy in 1894, France in 1899, and Menelik in 1902. Menelik was bound, himself, not to construct any works on the blue Nile, Lake Tsana, or the river Sobat, which would interfere with the flow of the Nile, unless he received the consent of the British government. Also, since the British could not build the Cape-to-Cairo railway in the Nile Valley, they obtained the right to construct it on the high grounds within the dominions of Menelik. Also, in southwest Abyssinia, a piece of territory at Itang, on the river Bara, was leased to Great Britain as a commercial station.

When the Mahdi rebelled in 1881, the Central African colonies of Egypt were threatened, under the rule of Emin Pasha, a German physician. He was ~~threatened~~ not only by the Madhi, but by the chiefs of Uganda. Emin, by harrassing and threatening before the enemy, managed to stave off defeat. By 1886, he had still maintained himself but was threatened by mutiny among his troops. The death of Gordon in 1885 closed the Nile and isolated the equatorial province. Dr. Junker had joined Emin in 1884, and managed to arrive in Egypt in 1887. Emin made earnest appeals to Europe for assistance, but apparently did not want to leave the country. Beside Junker, the German, Casati, an Italian, in the employment of the Egyptians, resided with Emin for some years. ~~Junker~~ Junker brought word of Emin's heroism and self-denial and in the eyes of ~~Europe~~, he became a hero and martyr, a sort of successor of Gordon.

Although Emin was not employed by the British government, no planter felt responsible for him. A committee to rescue him was organized, and Stanley, just back from six years in the Congo state, urged him to take command. The expedition cost about $145,000. At first, the expedition was to enter from the East Coast, but the opposition of the Germans, and the fear of the French for their missionaries in Uganda, led it to enter from the Valley of the Congo on the West Coast, according to the first plan of Stanley. Tippoo Tib, the Arab slavetrader, was part of the expedition. The expedition left Zanzibar February 25, 1887, with 800 individuals, of which 11 were English officers, and 97 Arabs under Tippoo Tib. By June, 1887, the expedition had finished the trip up the Congo and started the overland journey to the Lakes. Three Hundred and Eighty men took part in this overland journey for five and one-half months, frequently being attacked by savages. The rumor spread in Uganda and even to Egypt that these whites were devastating Central Africa, and the Khalifa dispatched troops to destroy them. The expedition went through the country of the pigmies. They reached the Albert Nyanza December 13, where they had found Emin. April 28, 1888, they met him and Cassati and a number of Egyptian officers. Emin was unwilling to return with Stanley. Many of his officers had Negro wives and children. What he and Cassati wanted was means of defense. They had collected enough ivory to pay their expenses. They argued for three weeks. Stanley's camp on the Congo was distroyed and half of its defenders dead. Stanley went to the camp and returned to the Lake, but there was a mutiny among Emin's troops, and he and Cassati and one of Stanley's officers were held prisoners, while the Derbishes were approaching nearer. The Madhi demanded Emin's surrender, and promised him high rank. Fainlly, Emin left, either by his own free will, or forced by Stanley. They arrived at the South end of Victoria Nyanza August 28. There, they fell in with Dr. Carl Peters of Germany, who was at the head of a German expedition to rescue Emin, and onhis way had been making treaties with the chiefs for German expansion.

Emin Pasha's mulatto daughter was among those rescued, and there were many native women and children belonging to the officers. They finally arrived in Zanzibar. The cost of the expedition in dead and wounded was tremendous. It passed over 1,200 miles and made many geographical discoveries. More than half the Egyptian troops were abandoned in the Interior, and some of them afterward joined Lugard to help subdue Uganda. Emin, after being severely injured by an accident, accepted a post under the German administration in German East Africa.

. The elevated country of Abyssinia, which occupies the highlands of North-east Africa, has an area of 350,000 square miles, and is one of the three independent native territories on the continent. It is divided into several provinces, which were formerly kingdoms more or less dependent upon the central government of Shoa, such as Harar, Tigre, and Gondar (Amhara), and the native population is estimated at over eight millions.

"Between 1881 and 1885 there was rising to power in the Sudan, just west of Ethiopian Africa, the terrible Mahdi. By 1883 the Mahdi and his Dervishes were masters of Kordofan and Darfur, and towards the end of that year the Anglo-Egyptian Army under Hicks was defeated and annihilated. Next year the Mahdi occupied the Bahr-el-Ghazal, and then, moving eastward, took Tokar and Suakim on the Red Sea, just north of Ethiopian Africa. In 1885, the year of the fall of Khartum and the death of Gordon, Kassala, on the borders of Abyssinia, fell to Osman-Digna, the Mahdi's general. These events had in four years profoundly changed the situation in Ethiopian Africa for the three rival European Powers, and particularly for Britain. With the fall of Khartum the whole of the Sudan was lost to Egypt, and the policy of, at least temporarily, acquiescing in that loss was adopted by the British Government. But the withdrawal of the Egyptian garrisons in Harrar was decided upon in 1885 and carried out in 1886. When, therefore, France and Britain settled their quarrel over Dongarita, not only Abyssinia and Harrar, but Dongarita itself and the French, British, and Italian possessions on the coast seemed to be in imminent danger of being overwhelmed by the Mahdi and his Dervishes." (pp. 158, 159. Empire and Commerce in Africa. By Leonard Woolf.)

The Germans hastened up by way of Uganda to retrieve the spoils of the conflict and seize the Equatorial Provinces, which a German was ruling under Egypt. Stanley tried to rescue the German but even Emin did not want to be rescued.

tried to restore defeat the Mahdi and sent an army of ten thousand men under Hicks, an Englishman. The English government refused to take part officially, but Hicks went to Khartum, and there started for El Obeid. His army was set upon by 40,000 of the Mahdists and annihilated. Only 300 wounded were left alive. This was November 5, 1883. The result of this battle made the Mahdi practically master of the Sudan. He captured the tropical regions, pushed Emin Pasha down toward the Great Lakes. On the East, his General Osman Digna, pushed almost to the Red Sea. Meantime, Osman

Digna had captured a port on the Red Sea, and defeated the English leader of the Egyptian forces. War feeling arose in England. The English attacked the Mahdi and the Red Sea port, and were successful, but eventually withdrew. Immediately the English were aroused but they were busy bombarding Alexandria and occupying Egypt, although declaring repeatedly that their occupation of Egypt was temporary. They were, however, scared concerning the headwaters of the Nile. One British officer declared: "If I were the Mahdi, I would make Egypt pay for every quart of water that runs down the Nile." This reminded the British that a Northern power which should seize Abyssinia and the Great Lake region would dominate Egypt. But, unfortunately, the hands of the British were tied by the successful rebellion of the Mahdi. It became, therefore, a matter of British policy to safeguard the Nile.

when Gladstone and the Little Englanders came into power, they refused to be tempted into the Sudan, even though the black Mahdi swept across it. It eventually held it in its hands from 1881 to 1896. Big Business, back of Chinese

Charles George Gordon was an extraordinary man; a religious fanatic, and evidently not well-balanced, if not actually at times insane. He was born in 1833 of Scotch descent and trained for the army. He early experienced religion, and all his life reflected upon his sins and hopes for salvation, etc. At the same time, he was wont now and then to shut himself up for a spree with a flask of brandy and a bible. He took part in the Cremean War, and then went to China, where his real career began. He became leader of the European armies, and a general by the time he was thirty. He killed his enemies and disciplined men, and alternated be-the tribes put Gordon up in Khartum, and Baring told England that the problem now was to get Gordon out. Gordon himself began to doubt. "I believe ambition put me here in this ruin." Queen Victoria appealed to Lord Hartington, who represented the highest English aristocracy in the Cabinet. In April, communication between Cairo and Khartum was cut off. In May, all England was alarmed, and began to hold indignation meetings. Special funds for public prayer was suggested. But Gladstone was adament. He made the English withdraw after their victories at Suakim on the Red Sea, and he recognized that the Imperialists were entangling him. He declared that the invasion of the Sudan would be a war of conquest against a people struggling to be free, "and they are rightly struggling to be free." He declared that he believed Gordon could escape from Khartum, and that an army was wanted not to rescue him but to subdue the Sudan. Gordon was thus directed to force the hand of the English government. Gordon threatened that if he was not given aid it would be an indelible disgrace. Gladstone thought he was bluffing, and refused to do anything. Baring was in a very difficult position, and thought of resigning. He had been receiving twenty and thirty telegrams a day from Khartum. He suggested an expedition to rescue Gordon, and at the same time, as quickly as possible, left for England, so that from April to September, he was in London. Meantime, the Mahdi was conquering the whole Sudan, and with an army of 30,000 men, laid seige to Khartum. Meantime, Lord Hartington's conscience was aroused and he demanded that Gordon be relieved, or he would resign. Gladstone had to yield to this. Parliament voted 300,000 pounds sterling to enable England to undertake obligations for the relief of Gordon, if it became necessary. Gladstone still believed that Gordon was bluffing and could get away. Meantime, Gordon tried to send his Chief of Staff, papers, and refugees to Cairo by boat. The expedition was unsuccessful, and the members captured and murdered. The capture of the papers showed the Mahdi the condition of Gordon. Gordon kept a diary and wrote of religion and rescue. The expedition was delayed. Lord Woosley, who had it in charge, made elaborate preparations with a picketed army of 10,000 troops, but the Nile was so low that the boats could not go up the river. It was not until December 30 that 1,000

...mediately,

47-15-172

British troops began to move across the desert. Finally, the relief expedition arrived January 28, and two days after Khartum had fallen and Gordon had been killed. Gordon's hair had turned white under the strain. Omdurman, the village opposite Khartum, fell January 10. Hundreds died daily of hunger in Khartum, and the dead could not be buried. There were continual rumors that the English were coming. The Mahdi, hearing that the English were approaching, determined to capture Khartum by assault. His army swarmed into the city. Gordon was undecided whether to fight or commit suicide. He met four tall, black dervishes on the staircase, and was hacked to death. Some say that he died fighting, and was only killed after his pistol was exhausted. When the catastrophe reached England, the Queen was beside herself, and the country aroused. Gordon was proclaimed as a national martyr. Services were held in his honor at Westminister and St. Pauls's. Twenty thousand pounds sterling was voted to his family. Gladstone was called a murderer and traitor. It was said that immediately the Mahdi should be punished, and the Sudan conquered, but Gladstone was firm. There was a crisis with Russia on the Afghanstan frontier. European war was imminent. For thirteen years the Mahdi remained chief ruler of the Sudan, and was only conquered after Memelik had repulsed the Italians, and Kitchner came with Maxim-Nordenfeldt guns. Twenty thousand Arabs were killed, and the bones of the Mahdi were disinterred and desecrated, and Baring became a peer.

At the same time, Italy, defeated in Tunis, turned its attention toward Ethiopia. In 1880, there began a sudden scramble for the Abyssinia coast. France claimed to have pushed Obock twenty years before, although she had never occupied it. She occupied it in 1881, and France immediately seized through pretended treaties the whole coast of the Bay of Tajoura, including later in 1888, the Port of Djibouti. The Italians also remembered that they had purchased the Bay of Assab north of Tajoura. In 1869, in behalf of the same railway company who had been bested by the English in Tunis, the purchase was forgotten by ten years, but in 1881, the Italians, with two warships, seized it.

So long ago as 1875 Italian vessels were hovering around Sokotra, and compelled England to step in and place her Imperial stamp upon the island. Tripoli was for a time a sore temptation also to the young kingdom on the other side of the Mediterranean, but fear of complications with France and Turkey induced her to keep her hands off. We have seen that, although in 1870 a spot in Assab Bay, just inside the Red Sea, was purchased as a coaling station, it was not till 1880 that the Italian Government even nominally took it over. From this as a starting-point the Italian possessions in the Red Sea spread northwards. Southwards they could go no farther than Raheita, as the French station of Obock barred the way. It was not until July, 1882 that the Italian Government took actual possession of the territory and bay of Assab. Italian explorers and Italian missionaries had been active in this part of Africa for years.

Although Gladstone did not want to extend British imperial responsibilities in 1884, Great Britain seized British Somaliland , stretching from Zeila along the Gulf of Aden. The French and British nearly came to blows, but in 1887, they made a treaty which defined British Somaliland.

At the same time, revolt under Arabi took place in Egypt against the Turks. Ahmed Arabi was a colonel and mulatto. The revolt was about to be successful when the English interfered and defeated Arabi.

In 1881, Arabi mutinied. In 1882, the British bombarded Alexandria and led an army in Egypt, thus British control of Egypt began.

It had beaten Negus Theodore in battle in 1865, and insulted him so that he committed suicide; but England had only done this with the co-operation of the insurgent tribes. It had not conquered Abyssinia, and it did not try.

The Suez Canal was opened November 17, 1869. In 1875, Disraeli bought the Khedive's share of the Canal for Great Britain and paid four million pounds. In 1876, the dual control of France and England in Egypt was instituted. In 1877, Major Baring, afterward Lord Cromer, went out to Egypt his British ~~Commoner~~ Commissioner of the Public Debt. In 1879, England, Germany and France deposed the Khedive Ismail.

France had seized Algeria as early as 1830. After a time, as European imperialism in Africa increased, she turned her attention toward Tunis. Now Tunis is the seat of ancient Carthage, and is the part of Africa which historically and geographically, should belong to Italy, if to any European power. A struggle between France, Great Britain and Italy began for the possession of Tunis, but France, having been conquered in the Franco-Prussian War in 1871, had to be conciliated ; and Germany and Bismark, and the Congress of Berlin probably offered her free-hand in Tunis. On the other hand, England, having been given full charge of Egypt in 1882 by the withdrawal of France, was perfectly willing that France should have Tunis. Despite that, considerable Italian investments in Tunis, France took possession of the country in 1881, to the great disappointment of Italian imperialists.

By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

I used this title in 1915 and I use it again now as it is just as true. War must be feared today not on the great European front where the world is watching, but in out-of-the-way places where smooth propaganda minimizes and even disguises the reasons, and where valuable private profit may be reaped. There is oil along the eastern highlands of Africa and in Abyssinia, and there is none in Italy; there are valuable metals, including gold. Above all, here from the Blue Nile and the Atbara comes half the water supply of the Nile Valley, including the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan and Egypt itself.

The great ramparts of Abyssinia, soaring over seas of hills and mountains, form the greatest stronghold of all Africa, and the one part which has natural barriers for defense. It was a German who said that the power which held the Abyssinian highlands could dominate the imperialism of Europe in Africa.

Abyssinia is a pear-shaped mountain clump, cut into island-like sections which are separated by deep gorges and ravines. It is nearly as large as France and Spain combined, and looms high on the northwest toward the Valley of the Nile, on the southwest toward the Great Lakes, and on the east toward the sea. It rises in three great terraces; a plane of rocky strata; a plateau about eight thousand feet above the sea, and above this snow-capped mountains which sometimes rise nearly another eight thousand feet. "It looks," says the traveller, "like a storm-tossed sea, suddenly solidified."

The highest ramparts of this "citadel of Africa", lying as they do between the fever-infested South and the sun-baked Sudan, form a fortress which would be difficult even for a modern army to storm. It is to her mountains that Abyssinia owes the fact that her population is the only dark race in Africa not yet under European domination.

In these highlands, both the Blue Nile and the Atbara rise, and thus Abyssinia commands a full half of the waters of the Nile, and dominates the most direct route to the Nile Valley. Moreover, its natural seaboard commands the whole of one side of the Gulf of Aden, and the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. When the Suez Canal was opened these waters became the throat of the British Empire.

When the canal was opened in 1865, its significance for the British Empire was evident, and in 1876, the dual control of England and France in Egypt was arranged. Modern commercial imperialism began rapidly to assume its essential characteristics. Africa was discussed at the Congress of Berlin in 1878. France had begun her African empire in Algeria in 1830, and now both Bismark and Salisbury were willing for her to aid Tunis, despite the fact that this site of ancient Carthage belonged logically to Italy.

The scramble for Africa began. In 1881, France seized Tunis, and England seized Egypt, while England, France and Italy with one accord turned toward northeast Africa and the coasts of Abyssinia. The Italians on some shadowy claim took what is now Eritrea in 1882, but were blocked by both Great Britain and France from further extension South. Great Britain took British Somaliland in 1884; the French already had Obock and nearly came to blows with the British until a treaty was made in 1887.

Meantime, the situation of the British in Egypt had peculiar repercussions in Abyssinia. Egypt was groaning under the debt which had been deliberately encouraged by France and England. Her rulers, who had squandered the proceeds, sought to keep up the interest by ruinous and exhaustive taxation. Europe intervened to insure payment of interest on her debt. Crushed between Europe and Turkey, Egypt turned to Arabi Pasha, and cried "Egypt for the Egyptians," and rebelled. The English turned their guns upon Alexandria and defeated Arabi at Tel-el-Kebir. This left the former rulers in nominal control, while the English held the real power along the Lower Nile.

But above the First Cataract in ancient Ethiopia, misrule and extortion had long been worse than in Egypt. Before the Arabi rebellion in 1878, the mulatto Rabah had swept through the Bahr-El-Ghazel and the regions south of Lake Chad. Now there arose a greater leader and a vaster motif. Mohammed Ahmed, son of a priest in Dongola, had established headquarters 150 miles above Khartum. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, majestic black man, with great eyes. He had visions. Disciples gathered around him, and eventually he proclaimed himself the Mahdi, the Messiah of the Mohammedan revelation.

The African Roots of War

The country went into the throes of a religious crusade against Egypt. A holy war was proclaimed, and a strong army organized. The Mahdi put down blasphemy, feasting, drinking, smoking and swearing. Thousands followed him. The Egyptians in 1883 sent an army of 10,000 under the Englishman, Hicks Pasha. They were annihiliated, with only 300 left alive. Kordofan, Dafur and the Bahr-El-Ghazel surrendered. Only a German, Emin Pasha, still upheld Egyptian power down in the Equatorial provinces next to Uganda. By the end of 1883, the Mahdi was master of a territory equal to Spain, France and Germany, and his army was closing in on Khartum, the capital of the Sudan.

England hesitated. Gladstone and the Little Englanders had driven Disraeli from power, and ruled from 1880-1885, or at least had as much power as any radical government could have in England so long as the Tory House of Lords held the veto. It was impossible for them to withdraw from Egypt and maintain English dividends, although they declared the English stay there but temporary; but Gladstone preemptorily refused to undertake the conquest of the Sudan.

But the Sudan was a choice morsel, not only for the heads of Egyptian slavery and misrule, but also for English commercial development in the Valley of the Nile and in East Africa. English imperialists were not without resource, and they seized upon Chinese Gordon. This man was a religious fanatic, ill-balanced if not at times insane. He had fits of rage, courage and murder. He had fought in the Crimean War, and played a large role in the Chinese upheaval. He went on sprees with the Bible in one hand and a flask of brandy in the other; he lived among the London poor; and was about to go to the Belgian Congo when English commerce forced Gladstone to send him to the Sudan, ostensibly to "report" on the situation. Gordon reached Khartum in 1884, and was made Governor-General. He proceeded to recognize slavery even though the suppression of the slave trade was one of the ostensible excuses for English interference in the Sudan. The Mahdi swept between him and Cairo, and cut off his communications. England held indignation meetings and public prayers, but Gladstone was determined not to be entangled. Osman Digna, the Mahdi's general, marched to the borders of Abyssinia

France was alarmed, Germany protested, and there was talk of war. But the British Empire yielded a little, and Lord Roseberry consented to withdraw the Congo agreement. The French, thereupon, took a forward step, and determined to push from French Africa eastward to the Nile. Menelik of Abyssinia gave aid and comfort, and in 1894, made a concession to the French to build a railway from Djibuti through the Harrar to Addis Abbaba and the White Nile. French officers trained the Abyssinian army. Great Britain warned France of her own and Egypt's claims in the Nile Valley and would consider any attempt to dispute these claims as an "unfriendly act." Paris declared that England accompanied a legally indefensible claim with a threat of war, and insisted that the control of the Sudan in the Nile Valley was an unsettled question.

But the Battle of Adowa changed the whole situation. Italy could no longer pull English chestnuts out of the fire, and French plans were manifest. Salisbury, again at the English helm, moved quickly. March 5, the news of Adowa reached England, and March 12, England suddenly learned that Chinese Gordon was a Christian martyr, who had been murdered by heathen. She ordered the conquest of the Sudan as the first step toward evacuating Egypt. Kitchener, with Maxim-Nordenfeldt guns, moved up the Nile to Dougola. He captured Khartum in September, and ordered the tomb of the dead Mahdi publicly desecrated. The Khalifa committed suicide in 1898. England was not a minute too soon. That very month, Marchand, the Frenchman, was at Fashoda awaiting the French and Abyssinian expeditions from Abyssinia. Indeed, one Abyssinian expedition under a royal prince had already reached the river but had been decimated by fever. The other expedition under a French commander did not materialize. For a moment, the world stood still with world war in the air.

The French had dispatched Captain Marchand to the French Congo April 25, with instructions to march to the White Nile. They arranged an Abyssinian expedition to join him. The idea was that the two expeditions should meet on the Nile and establish a French claim to the Upper Valley of the Nile. When Kitchener arrived, he would find the French and Abyssinians stretched across the Cape-to-Cairo path. The Abyssinian expedition failed through the negligence of the French governor of Djibuti. When Marchand reached Fashoda in 1898, there was no fortress and no expedition of French and Abyssinians from the east to support him. Kitchener proceeded south

About 20 kings have reigned over Ethiopia from 1787 to 1916.

Modern Abyssinians prefer to regard themselves as descendants of Shem and not of Ham.

No native king before Yekuno Amalik was able to call himself King of Kings of Ethiopia truthfully. Before that date, the Abyssinia kings were of Asiatic origin.

47-10-142 "The Arabs and Berber historians of North Africa even state that it was the Jews who, in their trading enterprise, first occupied or re-occupied important oases in the Northern Sahara such as Twat. They may possibly have found still living at Twat a Negro or a Negroid race, and unquestionably they were not the first inhabitants of any Sahara oases. But they seem in many directions to have preceded the Berbers in their south-west migrations. Some of these Jews are thought even to have crossed the Sahara, carrying with them a garbled blending of the Jewish and Christian faiths, and to have reached the country of Borgu to the south of the Central Niger, establishing there a form of religious faith which has only recently given way to Islam. Jews, however, early in the Christian era (according to traditions gathered up by Arab historians) made their appearance in the Mandingo kingdoms of Ghanata and Melle and at the capitals of the Songhai empire which followed. On the eastern side of Africa, Jews or Idumoeans had evidently settled in Abyssinia several centuries before the Christian era, and many of the Jews of Arabia migrated to Abyssinia after the establishment of Islam." (p. 398, A Survey of the Ethnography of Africa: And the Former Racial and Tribal Migrations in That Continent". Sir H. H. Johnstom.)

"Toward the end of the eighteenth century the Catholic Church organized an order for the redemption of captives for the purpose of comforting the suffering Christians under the Moslem oppression. Catholic priests had for centuries ventured into the unknown regions of Africa, even to the Christian country of Abyssinia, for Abyssinia was one of the world's first Christian nations. Judaism had also been established here since Solomon's day. It was in Abyssinia that the prophet Mohamet sought refuge among the children of Ethiopia in his first years of preaching.

"This mountainous country of proud black inhabitants holds the source of the Nile River, whose verdant and overflowing banks made civilized history man's greatest asset. Abyssinia lies south of Nubia. The latter was once the colony of Egypt, called Ethippia. The Egyptian city of Thebes is recorded with the world's oldest civilization. These Thebans were Ethiopians (black faced) as termed by the Greeks, who identified them as people with sable skin and kinky hair. The Hebrews knew them as Kous. These black people are credited to be the first to introduce science, art, philosophy and astronomy into the primeval world. Their conception of the constellations as related to god-like mythical chronologies has been accepted down through the ages by all nations." (pp. 2, 3, The Ethiopian, Clarence L. Blakely.)

The Arab geographers usually divided Africa into three regions, Guinea, Karkar, and Abyssinia. Others, divided it into Guinea, Nubia, Abyssinia and Zinj.

"Commencing with Herodotus, whose statements are the more weighty, as they are the result of personal observation, we find that historian asserting the Egyptian origin of the people of Colchis, and supporting his assertion by the argument that they were "black in complexion and woolly-haired." Copying the Halicarnassians in his fourth Pythian ode, Pindar also described the Colchians as being black. And Herodotus in another passage, when relating the fable of the Dodonian Oracle, again alludes to the swarthy colour of the Egyptians, "as if it were exceedingly dark, and even black." Further, in his supplices, Æschylus, mentioning the crew of an Egyptian bark that was seen from the shore, alludes to the person who espied it as having arrived at the conclusion that its members were Egyptians, on account of their black complexion.

"The sailors too I marked Conspicuous, in white robes, their sable limbs."

47-10-145

East of the Nile, where it approaches nearest the Red Sea, there is the Arabian desert, very mountaineous. Here, Semites dwelt eight or nine thousand years ago. The Hyksos and Arabs reinforced these and at one time they conquered the Delta.

47-10-146

"In the case of Italy, which had the audacity to demand the cession, at the expense of Serbia, not only of all the territory pledged her by the secret treaties but the Adriatic port of Fiume also, President Wilson stood his ground better, but the Italian delegates actually withdrew temporarily from the Conference and subsequently secured a compromise." (p. 371, A Brief History of the Great War. Hayes.)

47-10-147 "At first, the Great Powers maintained a 'Supreme Council,' consisting of the two ranking delegates from the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan, to which was subordinated all the machinery of the Conference and before which all conflicting claims were presented. But the Supreme Council of Ten proved too unwieldy, and it gradually gave way to an informal Council of Five, including Japan; then Japan was dropped from the inner circle, and Premiers Clemenceau, Lloyd George, Orlando, and President Wilson, known as the Council of Four, carried on the discussions on the most important issues among themselves; finally, when on the eve of the conclusion of the treaty with the Germans Italy became temporarily alienated by the proposed settlement of Adriatic claims, and Orlando withdrew, the chief responsibility for the Conference devolved upon the 'Big Three'--Wilson, Clemenceau, and Lloyd George." (p. 370, A Brief History of the Great War. Hayes.)

47-10-148 Outside of political boundaries, economic domination of Abyssinia has been progressing. It has not, however, had as easy a path as is usual in the case. First of all, the Abyssinians have stubbornly refused to incur a public debt. Secondly, the banking facilities of the country which were for a long time under the domination of Egypt, and thus indirectly of England, have been consolidated, recently, under a national Abyssinian bank. In the matter of communications, however, Abyssinia has not been so successful ~~in the matter~~. In 1894, Menelik made a concession to a French company for a railroad from Djibuti through Harrar to Addis Abbeba and the Nile. In 1896, the French government tried to hurry up the construction of this railroad for political purposes.

Construction was begun in 1897, and English commerce was aroused. They found their chance when the French were unable to raise enough capital. The French government wished to take over the railroad, but Menelik strongly refused. He had granted the charter to a private company, and not to a government. It was then proposed that the railroad be internationalized and owned by several European governments, but to this Menelik would not consent. Finally, it was agreed that a Board of Administration, including an Abyssinian, an Englishman, and an Italian, as well as the French, should proceed with building the railroad. When in 1907 this company went into bankruptcy, the railroad concession was granted to a colored man, Dr. Vitalien, physician to Menelik. The new company was backed by a government guaranteed by France. Beside this, there are about twelve hundred miles of telegraph lines Abyssinia's internal affairs, but they guaranteed each other equal treatment in trade and transit. Later, in 1925, Italy and Great Britain exchanged notes, according to which Great Britain was to have the exclusive right to deal with the waters of Lake Tsana, the headwaters of the blue Nile, while there was to be no opposition to Italian developments of railroads leading from her coast possessions into Abyssinia.

The Emperor of Abyssinia has a hard task. His country of some 350,000 square miles has never had a census, and estimates of its population vary from $4,000,000 to $14,000,000. The annual value of its trade, imports and exports, is about $10,000,000. The independence of the country was formally recognized by Great Britain, France and Italy in 1906. But this agreement illustrates the difficulties and dangers. These countries agreed to respect and "endeavor to preserve" the integrity of Abyssinia, and particularly to act so that industrial concessions granted to one might not injure the others. They agreed to abstain from intervention in tions between the mother country and India and Australia. Japan cannot think of taking any point along the Red Sea coast without arousing the indignation of the Powers already installed. England took Perim, France Obok and Jibuti at a time when Japan was still in the Madame Chrysanthème and samurai stage of development. And what better pretext could Japan have to get nearer her goal than to carry the good word of progress to the young Ethiopians, who are anxious to learn. When Ethiopia has become an affiliate of Japan, when one or two million Japanese will have become essential to keep the machines going, without which the country will be unable to live out they had no definite plans for re-building the country. Strikes took place in all industrial centers, and in certain cases, workers actually seized the factories and tried to operate them but failed for lack of technical experts and capital. On this defeat and unrest, rose Mussulini, starting with his march on Rome, October 27, 1922. The Fascist state took charge of government and industry, but by giving the capitalists and employers the chief word, organized the state primarily for their benefit. For instance, 71,459 employers in the confederation of Italian industry, have the same representation as 1,300,000 employees.

has declared frankly that these colonies alone "cannot solve our population problem, mark this well." Nevertheless, after the World War, certain forces were working for the betterment of the Colonial system. The idea of the League of Nations was to form a world tribunal where the lesser nations could at least be heard. The idea of the mandates was to put some of the colonies under the guardianship of the League of Nations, and prevent at least the extremes of exploitation. Into the League of Nations came both Liberia and Abyssinia; the latter against the protest of Italy, and by the help of France. But such depended upon how far the League of Nations became an assembly dominated by international commerce, or the ideals of peace. It has swayed both ways, but commerce is gaining daily ground.

earlier theory of international trade was a trade between independent countries, but through what was called European enterprise, land after land fell into the hands of people who were powerful inthe use of the newer technique, and was reduced to such a position that they were no longer independent, but became part of imperial systems. If a single nation could not remain with its labor force half-slave and half-free, neither can the world have part of its working area reduced to colonial dependence and the rest left independent. The world had to be pareeled out and annexed. For this purpose, Germany seized German East Africa and Southwest Africa and Togoland, and made desperate efforts to get Uganda and the Equatorial Provinces of the Rhine Valley. France got North and Western Africa, and England got the rest of the world. Italy got practically nothing, except the deserts of Triopli.

~~France was smarting under her con-~~ quest by ~~Germany and jealous of English imperialism.~~ Already, she had Algiers and parts of West Africa. Her scouting scientists were exploring the region of Lake Chad. Under the doctrine of the hinterland, enunciated at the Berlin Conference, if France swept swiftly across Africa to the headwaters of the Nile, she would dominate the Nile Valley. All the more so, if Abyssinia simultaneously moved westward to make good her age-old claims to the right bank of the White Nile as her western boundary.

~~Furthermore,~~ France and Great Britain were face to face with the question of the ~~ownership~~ of the Valley of the Nile ~~at stake~~. By 1896, Great Britain was firmly established in Egypt, but the Mahdi held the Nile Valley. Chamberlain and Cecil Rhodes had conceived the "Cape-to-Cairo ~~railroad~~" idea, opposed the evacuation of Egypt under Gladstone; seized South~~ern~~ and ~~Central Africa,~~ and proposed to have a solid bloc of ~~British~~ empire running from Egypt to the Cape. The French, on the other hand, ~~tried to include a solid~~ bloc ~~of empire~~ running across from North Africa, from West to East, and cutting the line of the Cape Cairo railroad, between the Sudan and Tanganyika. ~~In 1894, therefore, the crucial spot in Africa was the Nile Valley, Abyssinia, Uganda, and the gap between Lakes Albert, Edward, and Tanganyika.~~ In 1894, Italy and Great Britain tried to divide up the Nile Valley and Abyssinia. Great Britain also sought agreement with the Belgian Congo, involving a perpetual lease of a large bloc of territory at the headwaters of the Nile and in the gap between the Lakes. The same year, the British government proclaimed a protectorate over Uganda.

The bad faith of England and France threw Italy into the hands of triple alliance, but only until she could make a better bargain. That chance to make a better bargain came in 1914. She found abundant excuse for not going into the World War on the side of either allies. She practically put the world on notice that she was for sale to the highest bidder. There was brisk bidding, but in London, in 1915, France and England became explicit and promised Italy a fair share of Africa, particularly if Germany was disspoiled of her colonies. Forthwith, Italy went into the war, but at the Treaty of Versailles, she emerged with nothing in Africa, and was deeply dissatisfied, despite her gains at the expense of Austria. She emerged from the war a poor and harassed country, with a laboring force, poverty-strickened, and at the edge of revolt. She turned to Fascism as a way out, and Mussulini became dictator of Italy. It was his job to revive the flagging spirits of the Italians, to make them believe in themselves despite their poverty, to make them give up, at least in part, proposals to redistribute wealth so as to give a greater share to the worker. He substituted, therefore, for attacks upon capitalism and the rich, military parade and the vision of a restored Roman Empire. There was only one thing that could fire the enthusiasm of Italy and that was revenge for Adowa and a colonial empire where private enterprise could make large profits, and afford higher wages to Italian workers. Italy had already invested a good deal in her armies. She had large investments in Tunis, larger than those in France, and a larger Italian population than a French population. She did what she could to exploit the sands of Uriopli. She had seized right after the Congress of Berlin, as part of her design to annex Abyssinia, Somaliland and Eritrea. Either of them valuable, except to choke off Abyssinia from the coast, and to stand as a basis for future aggression. Both France and England intercepted her by seizing small bits of the same coast, and today, not an ounce of merchandise, to or from Abyssinia, can escape the control of Great Britainm France or Italy.

"On May 4, 1915, Italy denounced her treaty of alliance with Austria-Hungary. Already, on April 26, Italy had signed a secret agreement at London with representatives of Great Britain, France, and Russia, whereby she was to receive Trentino, all southern Tyrol to the Brenner Pass, Trieste, Gorizia, and Gradisca, the provinces of Istria and Dalmatia, and all the Austrian islands in the Adriatic. Italy, moreover, was to annex Avlona and its neighborhood although she was not to object if it were later decided to apportion parts of Albania to Montenegro, Serbia, and Greece. Besides, Italy was to strengthen her hold on Libya, and, in the event of an increase of French and British dominion in Africa at the expense of Germany, she was to have the right of enlarging hers." means that the cordon around Abyssinia is being pulled tight so that not a bit of her exports can reach the outer world without the consent of Europe, and while in the past competition has been kept ~~deliberately~~ taxed down to 10%, understanding between France, Great Britain and Italy may shut out the rest of the world from participating in this raw material. Europe is disposed not to worry concerning this war. After all, there will be one less self-governing colored country in the world. Perhaps, after all, it is as the fire-eaters of Kenya once said: "Africa will become the White Thermophylae to fight off Asia from Europe." But the situation neither is as simple nor as ~~fanatic~~ clear as this. First of all, Asia does come in. It is said that Japan has already captured one-third of the commerce of Abyssinia, and there were rumors last year of some marital alliance between princely houses of the two countries which Italy is said to have objected to. At any rate, a recent French article says:

"Today the Japanese bring money and flattery, for the Abyssinians are more susceptible to the charm of sweet words than any other people. The Japanese have vast plans to make Ethiopia the most modern of nations, and they promise to perform this miracle within a few years, for are they not themselves living examples of a similar wonder?

"The Japanese say that they are equipping Ethiopia industrially in order to make the country independent of Europe. But they do not mention that the industrial organization they plan will change the country's ways of living and will become essential for its existence. But why should Japan want to seize this last free country and colonize a part of the world so remote from Asia? This is the sensitive point, the deeply buried seed that must grow in the shadow, take root, and gather strength to burst forth all at once into irresistible triumph.

"Japan is the England of the Pacific. She must therefore have power over the seas--that is, over the straits. The Red Sea is the bottle-neck of England's vast colonial empire. Free passage through it is essential to maintain connec-

"Gallaland is a southern extension of the Abyssinian plateau, and resembles it in general relief and altitude, but is less rugged. It also has precipitous escarpments on its east side and gentle slopes towards the Nile Valley. Many of the isolated peaks are separated by crevasses or canyons, like those of Colorado or Mexico, sometimes 5,000 feet deep and scarcely 700 feet wide.

"Somaliland, the triangular projection of the continent, or 'Eastern Horn' of Africa, is still less elevated, and takes the character of a plain, varying in its northern section from 4,000 to 5,000 feet, in its southern section from 2,000 to 3,000 feet, and falling below the altitude of 500 feet near the coast.

"Masaliland is a still more southern continuation of the Abyssinian plateau, but much narrowed and much less rugged in general aspect. The altitude in the northern division is from 5,000 to 9,000 feet. Through the line of highest elevation runs a trough which encloses a chain of lakes." (p. 38. The Negro Races, Volume II. Dowd.)

THE TALMADGE-COCKING AFFAIR

In spite of the many straightforward and interesting statements made by various persons concerning the recent dismissal of the Dean of the University of Georgia, I still feel that the logical and basic facts have not yet been sufficiently emphasized.

The Dean of the ~~state~~ University of Georgia apparently stated sometime last year that he would like to see a training school near the University attended by black and white children and taught by black and white professors. If this is what Dean Cocking thought and said, it was in accordance with the best and wisest thought of the nation and of intelligent persons both North and South. Everybody knows that the present separation of children in school by race cannot continue forever; that gradually and in accordance with the development of public opinion the unbearable cost of a double system of schools with all the waste of duplication and with all the danger of separate class training must cease.

The real question is: When can this take place? It goes without saying, and there the Governor of the State, the Dean of the University and you and I are all agreed, that such a development must take place gradually and could not be realized immediately in the present state of public opinion and with the deep and ingrained prejudices of both the white folk and the colored folk of Georgia. But that it is an ideal which could be realized at least in training schools and graduate departments sometime during the next fifty years is certainly true.

If now Dean Cocking stated this as an ideal to be worked toward, he not only had a right to his opinion, but that opinion is shared by every person of intelligence who knows and has studied the South whether Southern or Northern born. Not simply the Rosenwald Fund but the General Education Board and the great educational experts of the country agree in this.

Governor Talmadge, on the other hand, speaking for the rank and file of the white people of Georgia has a right to oppose this ideal and to say that they will never so long as they live consent to any such breaking-down of racial lines. Moreover, the Governor has, in his official capacity, a right to so rearrange the Board of Regents of the University as to enforce his opinion backed as undoubtedly it is by the majority of opinion of the white people of Georgia.

But the real and crucial question comes: Did Dean Cocking state his ideals as a matter of present policy or as a matter to be aimed at in the future? Very unfortunately in his defense of his position, Dean Cocking did not say frankly exactly what his idea was concerning the future of race segregation in education, but simply insisted that he had not advocated any such present program. It would have been much broader educational statemanship on his part if he had said frankly: Yes, I believe that eventually and gradually, race segregation in education must disappear from Southern schools. I do not believe that such a program is practical now and I am not advocating, nor have I advocated, any such immediate change. But Dean Cocking did not admit this. He left those who were sympathetic with such a view entirely in the air and rested his case upon a question of verbal veracity as to exactly what he had said in a certain statement.

The point that must be insisted upon is that those people who believe that race segregation in education as well as in other matters must eventually disappear from the South and from the nation, if we are ever to have democracy, have a right to their opinion and a right to express it in Georgia and out. That, on the other hand, the persons who are backing and supporting Governor Talmadge have an equal right to express their opinions and to follow those opinions by legitimate and lawful action.

What really is happening, however, is the attempt to deny to any person, even a dean of the University of Georgia, any right to express an opinion which he holds, simply because that opinion is opposed to the majority of opinion of white folk of the state. There lies the kernel of intolerance and despotism. The white people of Georgia are not being educated by their leaders in modern social thought. Once the issue was drawn and the scurrying of white Georgia leaders was pitable. Not only did Dean Cocking himself refuse frankly to state his beliefs, but the City Superintendent of Atlanta Schools made the misleading statement that white children were superior to Negro children in intelligence; and friends of Cocking defended him as a man born of a Democratic family in a Republican state of parents who sympathized with the South when it was fighting for slavery! The only clear ringing statement was made by a certain Judge Jo Ben Jackson, member of the Board of Regents, who stated loudly "that the most ignorant white man was superior to the most intelligent Negro"!

The attack upon the Rosenwald Fund which has given over a half million dollars for white and Negro education in Georgia found not a single defender in the open hearing. White Georgians are being deliberately misled along the lines of their prejudices; and just as long as the intelligent social leadership of the South permits this denial of freedom of thought and opinion, just so long the South is going to continue to be the major social problem of this land.

THE FUTURE OF AFRICA IN AMERICA

BY

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

Of the social problems that must be faced anew, reconsidered and restated there is none of greater importance than that of the presence on the American continent of thirty millions of persons of Negro descent. Of these perhaps ~~fifteen~~ sixty millions have no visible intermixture of white blood, while possibly ~~twenty~~ millions are of mixed European, Negro and American Indian descent. There are many other millions, how many we cannot say, who are in fact of Negro descent but with so large an infiltration of white blood that the Negro blood is not in evidence and often quite unknown.

Two considerations set this body of American immigrants apart: their visibility, - the fact that more easily than in the case of any other body of immigrants they can be recognized; and secondly, and closely aligned with this, the fact that the overwhelming majority were forcibly transported as chattel slaves and consequently are only a generation or two removed from the lowest social status. The union of color and status, therefore, has fixed in the minds of men a psychological reaction which must be taken into account. One could hardly be born in America, North or South and not subconsciously regard color and low social status as inevitably connected. But there would be a difference in rationalizing this fact; in the United States color would assumed to be the cause of the status of blacks; while in South America status would include Negroes and Indians for social and historical causes. In the West Indies white descent largely determines status while caste applies usually to unmixed Negro blood.

It has been the fashion in practically every American nation to attempt to ignore the Negro-American as a problem. Even when this population affects other social problems, the situation is often considered and treated as though the Negro element were not there and did not greatly modify the conditions of the problem. For instance many books on immigration to the United States ignore entirely the Negro immigrant. When foreign immigrants are considered often the Negro is regarded neither as an immigrant nor as a native American. When restriction of immigration into the United States was debated between 1917 and 1927, the basis gradually was changed from the proportion of the different origins of the foreign-born to consideration of the original racial stocks as the standard for future incomers. But at the beginning of the Nineteenth Century 19 per cent of the inhabitants of America were of Negro descent. It took some adroit working of the law and administration of its provisions to avoid this uncomfortable fact. Visitors to the West Indies, especially if they are from the United States are surprised and intrigued at the fact that the West Indies are predominantly Negroid, but they say little about it. Thereafter they leave the West Indies out of their consideration of democracy and equality; of general progress and development, without the openly stated reason, but with the reserve judgment that such development is either impossible or undesirable in a land of Negroes. Thus the West Indies and Central American tend to become a sort of international slum explorted by foreign capital and tourists.

On the other hand, it is increasingly evident that we must in the future give more notice to this element among the nations of the Americas. When after this second World War we come to consider the pressing social problems before us, the Negro is going to be an element in that problem, not simply because of his actual social conditions, but because of the psychological reaction of his fellow citizens toward him. In the matter of poverty, for instance, which after the war, we are going to face, not as an inevitable curse, but as something which will yield to remedial measures; we will have to remember that the plight of labor in South America and the West Indies makes poverty a pressing and immediate problem and that the condition of labor there finds its greatest and most convincing excuse in the fact that the labor of these countries is largely Negro and Indian. That Negroes and Indians will always be poor is accepted as both probable and bearable and the only solution will lie in their becoming white by absorption and white immigration. Until that time former philosophy has assumed that poverty, disease and inefficiency must characterize the laboring class. Imported capital will thrive on low wage and servile condition, while labor laws and unions will be few. In the same way in the United States the whole labor movement especially in its attempt to fight poverty by unionization has long been faced and frustrated by the fact that perhaps an eighth of that labor is of Negro descent and unless unionized, can be and has been widely used to break down and keep down the wages of white labor. Skilled labor enclaves, like the locomotive engineers have maintained a purely racial exclusion from these unions, but where mass production has superceded special skills, the Negro worker competes as in the automobile industry. On the other hand, white labor because of inherited cultural patterns and surrouding public opinion is unwilling to recognize Negro laborers as fellow human beings. Often his resentment flares in riot and mob rule.

Out of this situation arise, as children of poverty, disease and crime: a widespread incidence of communicable and dangerous disease, a great loss of time through sickness, the death of millions of people in the prime of life. And also a great amount of crime evidenced as crime always is among the young by stealing and fighting and low sex mores and leading to bitter reprisals and large expense of police and courts; and by the continuous manufacture of a distinct criminal element.

What now is going to be said of a frontal attack on poverty after this war if this attack is to include not only the Southern United States and the Negro slums of New York and Chicago, but also Cuba, Puerto Rico, Honduras and Bahia? Will not the ready reply be: Impossible! Inconceivable! and would not the cost include dearer sugar and cocoa and a lower return on investment? Finally, there would be the one unanswerable reason against any action: Race. The alternative would be to attack poverty among white workers only and this cannot be done in America today.

Stepping beyond this, we face even greater post-war difficulty, when we come to the problem of applying something of what we have been newly preaching and even screaming about democracy, after two wars to defend democracy have been fought. Long before these wars, there was the deliberate exclusion of the great majority of Negroes from political rights by reason of poverty and ignorance, in the West Indies and South America; the attempt to realize anything that could really be called democracy involves equality; equality of status based at least on approach to equality of income. So far as Negroes are not regarded as equals, there can be no real conception of a democracy which includes them. In the United States most Negroes have been disfranchised no matter what their social and intellectual status might be.

Historically Americans have sought three ways out of this impasse: religious conversion; climatic extinction and biologic inferiority. The conscience of England and New England based excuse for slavery on heathenism, from which the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel proposed wholesale conversion. Invested capital in the colonies resisted this effort first by obstructing the instruction of slaves and finally by declaring openly with Virginia in 1667. "Baptism doth not alter the condition of the person as to his bondage or freedom, in order that diverse masters freed from this doubt may more carefully endeavor the propagation of Christianity."

There is no doubt of the large public opinion which historically turned to one solution of this and that was the question of how to be rid of these people by natural death; how by physical removal or social pressure so to reduce the number of proportion of persons of Negro descent that the residue could be absorbed without noticeable difficulty. It is interesting to reflect how sincerely we have hoped in the past for some such solution. When for instance, the fathers of the American Revolution suppressed the slave trade they believed that they were not only curbing an unholy traffic, but also, by cutting off the artificial increase of the Negro population, they were going to leave the Negroes already in America to a fate inevitable extinction. Relying on the evidence of the slave trade in the West Indies and in some parts of the United States, they believed that from climatic reasons and biologic differences, the Negro could not survive, unassisted by foreign immigration. Jamaica, for instance, had in 1690, 40,000 Negroes. Between 1620 and 1820, 800,000 more were imported. Yet in 1820 there were only 340,000 Negroes on the island. The supporters of the colonization movement were of many minds; some wished simply to transport free Negroes. But numbers hoped to assist nature by starting Negro emigration, which would gradually so grow in volume as to reduce the Negro population and leave the residue to self-extinction, through the very hopelessness of their situation.

After the American Civil War this hope was reborn. Governor Sharkey of Mississippi sat before a congressional committee in 1866 and assured them with tears in his eyes that the emancipated Negroes were bound to die out. "My expectation concerning them is that they are destined to extinction, beyond all doubt. We must judge of the future by the past. I could tell you a great many circumstances to that effect; I am sorry I did not come prepared with means to state the percentage of deaths among them. It is alarming, appalling. I think they will gradually die out. Some of them will become thrifty and prosperous; but as a general thing, I think they are destined to extinction. I may be mistaken; I hope I am; but that is my impression." The census of 1870 seemed to confirm this; showing an increase of less than 10 per cent for Negroes in the decade but when in 1880 there came a census more accurately and more scientifically taken, the whole nation was aghast at an apparent Negro increase of 35 per cent. The nation, we might say was bitterly disappointed because the Negro race in America was surviving; and was only partially appeased when these official figures were officially "revised" to increase of 21 per cent and 22 per cent respectively.

In somewhat similar ways, in the West Indies after emancipation there was a more or less tacit thought that England and France and Denmark might profitably wait and let matters go as they would, until the Negroes of those most beautiful parts of America were so decimated by laziness and disease that they could be replaced by white immigration. The Negro refused to die.

In South America the same problem was faced in a different way: there was no question of letting the chief labor force die out; let it live and work; but let it become a real part of the state only as it was physically absorbed into the white race. Brazil, with eighteen million Negroes and mullatoes out of fifty million inhabitants in 1940 was never particularly worried as to whether the Negro died out or not, so long as he remained a fairly submissive laborer and was gradually absorbed into the nation leaving white culture dominant.

Realising at last more or less clearly and after the lapse of long years, that the Negro physically is a fixture in America, without the slightest hope that he is going to decrease in numbers, we are faced by the question as to how far force, either the social force of caste or actual physical force in other guise, can be used to settle this problem of black folk in America. Of course the greatest hindrance here is the ethical problem. After all, America represents the part of the world where the Christian religion has shown in some respects its highest development and most efficient organization. It was possible so to twist the tenets of that religion as at first to excuse the slave trade and afterward to condone slavery; but it was more difficult for christians to face the problem of caste restriction and social suppression.

Deliberate and planned suppression of a group of human beings could only be defended if it were based on religious dogma or on accepted scientific proof of an inborn and unchangeable inferiority that no wish nor act could change an which put the sacred duty of self defense on white civilization.

The attempt of the Christian church, Catholic and Protestant to build a foundation of religious dogma and biblical sanction beneath Negro slavery is one of the most curious and disreputable incidents of organized religion. As Bishop Hopkins solemnly voiced it: "The Almighty, foreseeing this total degradation of the race, ordained them to servitude or slavery under the descendants of Shem and Japheth, doubtless because he judged it to be their fittest condition. And all history proves how accurately the prediction has been accomplished, even to the present day."

Gradually appeal was made to science in place of theology. It is astonishing with what bitter almost missionary zeal the attempt to prove the biological inferiority of the Negro was carried on for over a hundred years and still persists in wide circles. It began with the Cotton Kingdom and the attempt to defend its income by proving Negroes were natural and eternal slaves. Religion, and philanthropy were forced into subserviency to this dogma. And even today when when science has rebelled and regained its independence and self respect, the belief in Negro inferiority widely persists.

The argument against Negro equality began with an appeal to history and observable facts; the white race alone was civilized and the inventors and spreaders of civilization; the yellow race had contributed a little; the black race nothing. Then came the Darwinian survival of the fittest; Africa was a land of slavery because Negroes were fit slaves and white men, fit masters; when biology began to question race distinctions, measurements of head form and brain weight were appealed to when the results of such studies yielded further confusion there was widespread appeal to psychological reactions which were supposed at first to measure "native" intelligence.

With this went a serves of historical and social studies designed to disclose the ignorance and inefficiency of emancipated Negroes. The leading universities of the United States united to show that the worst result of the Civil War was the enfranchisement of Negroes and that the emancipated Slaves was worse off than his fathers.

Despite this desperate and ruthless crusade backed by fiction and art, the experience of Brazil, the West Indies and the United States emphasizes the fact that a considerable and growing proportion of Negroes and mulattoes are modern civilized men, with every prospect of becoming increasingly efficient and creative. The contrast between the white and dark populations of America can no longer for a moment be considered a contrast between cultivated and the uncultivated. The most we can say is that, if one compare, the two groups of white and black; one will find at the bottom a larger proportion of Negroes and Indians than whites; but in both groups these lower classes share the same human characteristics. On the other hand, at the head of both these groups you will find a small but undeniable proportion of Negroes and Indians side by side with the larger proportion of whites but with no essential differences in ability and creativeness.

The social average of the Negro group is at present considerably lower than that of the white group; but there are Negroes, and many of them, quite as cultivated as the corresponding classes of whites, just as there are whites quite as hopeless as the lowest class of Negroes. It is the unquestioned truth of facts like these that, in spite of all the accumulated race fiction, has swept the foundations away from modern theories of race and especially of race distinctions based on the color line. There is no scientist of repute today who for a moment would declare that biological differences between white folk and black consign any individual of either race inevitably to a lower status. Consequently the whole argument for a different treatment and a different fate to be meted out for Negroes can no longer be based upon the biological or evolutionary argument. We must face the Negro problem as a series of cultural facts.

We have, of course, the right to believe that under other circumstances it would have been wiser, and we would have preferred to keep peoples of different cultural backgrounds and different physical appearance in the parts of the world where they were first developed or at least to make contacts under happier conditions. This may or may not have been advisable; probably not when we consider the cultural values of race and group contact under any conditions. In any case we must remember that it was the greed and adventure of the white race that in modern days disturbed the ancient distribution of mankind and that Europeans did this primarily for their own selfish purposes. Moreover, we have no right to say that because other generations were guilty of the African slave trade and the domination of Asia, that present peoples have no part in the blame. They are heirs of their success, if success it may be called. They are heirs to the enormous prosperity of the Sugar Empire and the Cotton Kingdom and of the capitalistic methods of production which Negro slavery in America was primarily responsible in upbuilding in England and Europe. America could not have been America, without the African slave trade and African slavery. If, therefore, Americans are the heirs of an ancient error, so long as they insist upon grasping and holding the advantages of that error, they must pay for it.

In the United States we have gone far enough to know that the ability which can be developed among Persons of Negro descent, is of the widest range; that in physical, intellectual and artistic lines, the Negro is not only in evidence but if it were not for deliberate hindrances to his development he would make even better showing. We know that his health and crime can be adequately explained by his poverty, and that increased income and education can without reasonable doubt raise the mass of the Negro people to or above the average level of their white neighbors.

But these very facts disclose a problem which the nation and the white world are unwilling to face. Even with present barriers, if the Negro continues to develop in the United States and Latin America, there is not a single door of human progress and of social recognition at which he is not going to knock in the future with increasingly bitter violence. On the other hand, if the barriers are done away with, the Negro race in America is going to reach within a calculable time a level of efficiency which will challenge the whole assumption of the natural superiority of the white race. It will take more and more deliberate effort on the part of whites to enforce caste restrictions.

What do we propose to do about this after the world war? Are we going to see that the Negroes of the Southern United States are admitted to the ballot on the same terms as white folk? Are we going to insist that the England which we have rescued at fabulous expenditure of treasure, installs democratic forms of government to control capital and investment in her colonies and especially in the West Indies? Are the states of South America like Venezuela, Brazil and Colombia going to see to it that through education and social uplift, a foundation of real democratic government is built upon this Negro and Indian Labor? Are we going to continue to let North American influence in South American emphasize and even insist on white supremacy and color discrimination, while all South American and Central American countries who wish capital and tourists respond to this pressure?

In answer to these queries we may note today four centers of solution for future relations between black people and white on the American continent: the policy of racial absorption especially in Brazil; the policy of absorption with Negro suppression through the domination of capital as in Jamaica and Cuba; the policy of racial segregation illustrated by Haiti; and the policy of legal caste shown in the Southern states of the United States.

We have grown used to being told the settlement of the Negro problem in Brazil is merely a matter of time and absorption; that if we shut our eyes long enough, a white Brazil and white Venezuela and Colombia will emerge and Africa in South America disappear. The United States has made a wry face at such a process and tried to blame most of the political and social ills of American regions south of us to this miscegenation. Many of our unfortunate relationships with our continent neighbors have arisen because of this racial prejudice. We have established ourselves as missionaries of white supremacy and refused personal relationships with South Americans who show too evidently Negro and Indian blood.

Backed by the tremendous power of our capital and tourist wealth this attitude has unduly influenced race relations and when added to the equally strict but more carefully expressed attitude of England, countries like Brazil, Chile, Peru, Colombia and Venezuela have striven to be "white" nations and make the process of the absorption of Indians and Negro involve the gradual disappearance of these people.

Biologically such absorption was difficult because of the numbers involved. Fully half of the fifty million population of Brazil today is of acknowledged Negro and Indian descent and the proportion of whites has only been maintained by large Portuguese and Italian immigration. Of the fifteen million people in Ecuador, Colombia and Venezuela not more than 20 per cent are white - perhaps only 10 per cent of Peru's six and one-half millions. The means that biological absorption into a "white" race will be difficult without greatly increased white immigration. Such immigration is hard to procure because Indians and Negro form a chief laboring proletariate with whom white labor cannot compete. The result is a noticeable darkening of the white group in most of those countries with a distinct Indian or Negroid mixture.

In addition to this, and of far greater importance is the question of cultural blending. The Negro brought to America strongly developed cultural patterns which even slavery could not entirely efface. With emancipation came frantic efforts to adopt white European culture but the net result has been a cultural blending which has deeply stamped South America in music, dance, art and literature. So much so that in the deeper currents of thought a new race is envisioned in which the strong Negro element is frankly recognized.

On the other hand, the economic trend is away from this. No South American country wishes to be regarded as "colored" in a world organized in industry and politics for white peoples. In diplomatic and social intercourse usually with Europe, always with North America, South America suppresses color, and in this policy the Negroids usually consent and cooperate. A dark Brazilian might occupy a high office of state but he would never be ambassador to St. James. And even domestic industry using English and United States capital would tend to keep the black worker "in his place" and withold authority from mulattoes. There are only occasional signs of revolt against this pattern of action on the part of blacks and mulattoes, although this may increase.

The racial absorption in Brazil therefore is not simple and has not had altogether happy results. With the avoidance of racial friction and the open color bar which Brazil has accomplished, there has come the economic class line, when color combined with poverty has kept a large class of dark laborers in a depressed condition; and which consequently makes it unlikely that a Brazilian would care to boast of his African ancestry as openly as he would assert his descent from white Europeans. Unless, therefore, racial absorption in Brazil is going to be accompained by economic emancipation and a real democracy of equals, the solution of the Brazilian problem of African and American cannot be really accomplished. Moreover such amalgamation, as many see, will not leave Brazil"white". Negro and Indian blood will produce a new race, undeniably "colored."

In the West Indies the pattern again changes. Of the 13 million inhabitants, probably 10 millions are of Negro descent. This means that the so-called whites are largely mulattoes. In Cuba for instance, competent authorities maintain that 60 per cent are of Negro descent although the census admits less than 40 per cent.

Manifestly, the white minority cannot absorb the black majority of West Indies. The partial absorption dating from the sixteenth century has established a powerful class of mulattoes who for the most part are distinctly white in mores and often white in color. Every economic and social incentive drives these folk to escape into the white race. It is this that leads the Domimion Republic to welcome Jews and bar black immigration.

On the other hand, the blacks, both in culture and blood dominate this beautiful, rich and intriguing part of the world and are held by the unyielding color bar especially of England and American. United States capital and English investment in Jamaica, Cuba, Puerto Rico, Haiti and the Domimion Republic, rules like a tyrant, to establish color caste, keep down wages and deny labor the right to organize. Political power is mainly in the hands of the whites and the property holding mulattoes. In Cuba and puerto Rico where the dark proletariat has some power and is trying to exercise it, the whole power of property and foreign investment is holding them in check

In most of these islands, one sees a frantic rush of black folk to be included in the privileged status of the whites. Most Negroes seek to accomplish this not so much by cultural progress as by breeding white at any social sacrifice. The cost of this to family life, normal contacts and political action is too great. Always you have left a poverty-stricken black peasantry who can be deprived of real political power and social advantage because they are a depressed economic class, in addition to being Negroes. American capital comes in to strengthen and perpetuate this class and caste.

In the case of Haiti one has the solution of separation: a black republic with a mulatto elite but with the African cultural background distinctly recognized. Instead of that being solution, it makes Haiti at distinct disadvantage in her whole intercourse with the white world. She not only suffered immense economic injustice in her brave effort to make herself free from France, but she has suffered the same injustice in her intercourse with England, the United States and South America. She has become a sort of parish of the Western Hemisphere excluded largely from cultural contact, from economic cooperation and from recognition in the society of nations.

In her inner social development Haiti occupies a peculiar place. Her land belongs primarily to her illiterate peasants which means that the weapon of land monopoly has been denied to Haitian aristocrats. The Haitian elite, therefore, has not become like the East Indian elite and the white overlords of Cuba, a rich oligarchy. On the other hand, they are, on the whole poor men but educated and cultured. If there can be built up between this leading aristocracy and the peasantry a nexus of leadership and direction without slavery of labor which has in the past and in so many places characterized this leadership, Haiti may give to the world an extraordinary example of economic and social development. There are some signs of this: there is a educational movement among the younger educated people and an interest in Haitian folklore and African cultural survival which are encouraging. Perhaps no other part of the West Indies, or even of South America, has so rare a chance for social experiment.

Haiti's prolonged and determined fight for recognition is one of the finest the modern world has seen. She rigidly claims as her greatest statesman said at the recent American Conference of National Commissions of Intellectual Cooperation at Havanna, to be the center of French culture in America. Haitian art and literature is no small part of French art. But far more than this, Haiti represents Africa. Nearly all the chief African tribes have left their cultural imprints and this is being consciously developed to a degree. Alone of American peoples, Haiti is not ashamed to be black.

In the United States our whole social advance has been continually frustrated and made paradoxical by our attitude toward Negroes. We declared all men free and equal when we owned 750,000 black slaves. We fought for a Union of white men and could get it only after using a half million black soldiers and laborers and emancipating four million slaves as a desperate bid for victory. We cannot today discuss democracy; we cannot carry through a draft for war; we cannot hold an election; we cannot establish hospitals; we cannot raise wages or do any one of the thousand things that social uplift calls for, without running across a discrimination with regard to Negroes that either blocks or weakens our best efforts or convicts us as hypocrites. With all our tumult and shouting and pious rage against Hitler we are perfectly aware that his race philosophy and methods are exactly the same as ours, save that he is drawing his lines in some what different places. It is ridiculous for an intelligent nation to allow this to go on.

In order to preserve our intellectual honesty and ethical pretensions this question must come in for frank discussion and decision. We cannot permit the Southern United States to be a social back-water in order to hold the Negro "in his place". Neither can we allow the West Indies and Central America to be made deliberate slums for the profits and vacation activities of the whites. In South America we have long pretended to see a possible solution in the gradual amalgamation of whites, Indians and blacks. But this amalgamation does not in our mind envisage any decrease of power and prestige among whites as compared with Indians, Negroes and mixed bloods; but rather an inclusion within the so-called white group of a considerable infiltration of dark blood, while at the same time maintaining the economic exploitation and consequent political disfranchisement of dark blood as such. We have thus the spectacle of the Dominican Republic, Cuba, Puerto Rico and even Jamaica trying desperately and doggedly to be "white" in spite of the fact that the majority of the white group is of Negroaor Indian descent.

Before everything today in our thought must stand the question of the induction of the American Negro in the whole Western Hemisphere into the democratic states. Democracy cannot have a rebirth in the world unless it firmly establishes itself in America. It cannot establish itself in America if the majority of Negroes in the United States are disfranchised despite intelligence and property; if property barriers and administrative oligarchy reduce Negroes to serfs in the West Indies; and if there is in South America no determined attempt through education and social uplift to make the Negro and the Indian and the mixed blood an intelligent, modern citizen. Denial of steps like these is simply conspiracy of industrial exploitation, the rule of political oligarchies and the encouragement of future war.

This problem of the African in America cannot be avoided. He is not dying out; and he is not likely to die out. His sudden physical absorption without planned social effort would result in a distinct lowering of the level of culture over wide areas. His slow absorption if accompained by curbing and extinction of his genius is but worship of white domination. On the other hand, the attempt to raise culture among the whites and lower or even retard it among the Negroes and mulattoes, is a task inexcusable if not impossible.

There is needed, therefore, in the Wester world widespread consultation and planning, backed by united effort, first to decide just how far we are willing to treat Negroes and mulattoes as human beings, and if not, what tenable justification we have for denying it. If we are going to break down the barriers and at great cost in wealth and effort gradually raise this depressed class to the level of culture of which they are capable, we must frankly understand that this does not involve the continued domination of white world, in the future; in fact, it is the begining of the end of such domination. There is no moral question facing the American of greater and more pressing importance than this question of racial tolerance in the Western Hemisphere.

We are only deceiving ourselves if we try to think that the solution of the problem of these millions of black folk in America is going to cost us nothing. That simply by a polite waving of the hands and judicious propaganda the problem will disappear. No. If we want to realize humanity and world peace, this can only be done at the cost of so thorough and drastic an overturning of our inherited fixations and cultural patterns as will shake the Western World. In the first place it will call for a stern attitude toward Europe and especially the British Empire. The British Empire is predominantly colored: black, brown and yellow people form the overwhelming majority of its folk. It has never been a democratic organization and never proposes to be one, because its white minority is supporting itself in luxury from the depressed wage and cheap raw material which they are extracting from colored folk through their organized and dominant military power and industrial technique.

Not only has this got to be overthrown but the means of its overthrowing is a firm conviction on the part of white America that a change in the present organization of the world is best for the world. And that only by recognition and conviction, and action following such conviction, can the world come to a place where it recognized human being as essentially equal and works toward the actual equality which may be accomplished.

There are many people in the Americas and especially in the United States who would rather die than see any such world of equal white and colored people. They must be made to realize that this is the ultimate price which they are going to pay for the solution of the Negro problem. That otherwise they are setting before the world a vision of continual struggle, of continual reoccurrence of war after war, the end of which no living man can see.

JULIUS ROSENWALD FUND

The Julius Rosenwald Fund, founded in 1917, has directed its chief efforts toward the improvement of education, especially in the South, the development of enlarged opportunities for Negroes, and the betterment of race relations.

During the two-year period ending June 30, 1944, the fund expended $1,615,513 on its programs. Of this amount, $336,471 was spent on rural education, $185,417 on fellowships, $226,169 on race relations, $646,948 on Negro universities, and $94,464 on Negro health.

Its chief activities during this two year period were (1) education of teachers for work in the rural schools of the South, both Negro and white; (2) endowment of Dillard University in New Orleans; (3) fellowships for exceptionally promising Negroes and white Southerners; (4) efforts to improve race relations.

A division of race relations was set up in July, 1942. The fund's activities in this field included contributions to the following organizations: American Council on Race Relations, Southern Regional Council, National Council of Negro Women, National Urban League, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Associated Negro Press, and the Nat onal Committee on Housing.

During the two-year period the fund distributed more than 100,000 books and pamphlets to agencies and individuals throughout the country, and granted 74 fellowship awards, of which 43 went to Negroes and the others to white Southerners.

A REPORT FROM SAN FRANCISCO

We have failed essentially at San Francisco. It is not utter failure but it is failure because we have surrendered the chief fortress without a fight. On this surrendered redoubt, we gallently flew a flag of human rights and racial, religious and sex equality; but we dragged it down to half-mast by denying to the super-state any power to enforce these principles in a particular state except in the unlikely case that the great powers would declare a given area of race hate actually dangerous to world peace. Thus we asserted and contradicted almost in the same breath, the rights of man.

Warned sharply by the Senate of the United States, we established forts through the whole Pacific area with a right flank on white Australia and a left wing on conquered Japan, so that the white race by universal and continuous armament can keep forever the peoples of Asia in thrall. We camouflaged this effort by benevolent talk of "trusteeship" over the handful of Natives on forgotten isles, where eventually the population of guns will be greater than that of human beings. Ostentatiously we omitted all real mention of the more than 700 millions of colonial peoples. They are still left disfranchised, outside the world, without voice in world councils and at the mercy of colonial powers.

Meantime, continuously we dragged the red herring of Poland back and forth across the scene to decry Russia and to conceal the determination of the Western World to preserve the cordon sanitaire against communism by means of a Poland dominated by landlords, capitalists and the reactionary section of the Catholic Church.

Despite all this, out of our effort emerged one statesman and one alone - Molotov. Among the rotten reporters' eggs and columnists' red tomatoes he insisted that the San Francisco Conference should not be presided over solely by the Steel Trust. He talked "turkey" about Argentina, repeating exactly what Roosevelt and Hull had already said. He refused to be distracted by the plight of 16 Poles who may well be the stooges of London; and he was the only leader among the great nations who dared to talk frankly and openly about colonies. What he said was distorted and curtailed by most of the press. He spoke May 7th as follows:

ON RIGHTS

"First. Chapter 'purposes' expressly provides now for the observance of the principles of justice and international law. It also contains a reference to the necessity of respecting the principles of equality and self-determination of nations to which the Soviet Union has always attached first-rate importance. The principles of justice and self-determination of nations proclaimed by the international security organization will draw particular attention of the population of colonies and mandated territories; this will help realize the sooner these great principles which is so vital.

"Besides, Chapter 'purposes' now provides for the encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, language, creed or sex. Such a program is incompatible with the membership of Fascist countries in the organization of international security. .....

RIGHT TO WORK

"The Soviet delegation did not insist on its proposal to the effect that reference should be made to the right to work and the right to education as some of the most important human rights. It has been pointed out that it would be inadvisable to mention any specific rights. But is it not clear that the right to say, work is of vital importance to working men and women in the transitional period from war to peace when the danger of mass unemployment will be particularly grave....

MASS SOLUTION

"Five. Only recently proposals have been put forward concerning territorial trusteeship and now being widely discussed by the press. American and British proposals relative to this question differ and so require study. The Soviet delegation realizes that from the viewpoint of the interests of international security we must first of all see to it that dependent countries are enabled as soon as possible to take the path of national independence."

76-2-276

At San Francisco, we ordered an international army but we did not do nearly as much to curb fascism as we did to curb Russia. China under the Soong trust was dumb. We heard no further whisper of the race equality which she voiced at Dumbarton Oaks. Australia and New Zealand were more liberal toward dependent peoples than the United States. On every great moral question the Western peoples contradicted themselves. Smuts of South Africa talked of human rights and demanded absolute power over the Natives of Southwest Africa without even the advice of a mandates commission. England gave no leadership, expressed no ideas, laid down no goals. With all the traditional charm of the ancient Garden of Eden, she simply stood within the shadows, keeping watch above her own.

N° 1 Defend-Paper sent

I attended yesterday the opening plenary session of the United Nations Conference on International Organization. We sat in a great opera house, built as a memorial to the soldiers who, as the Mayor of San Francisco said, "died in vain" in the first World War.

30-6-125

Before us rose four golden columns against a cerulian blue background with three festoons drooping between, and the massed brilliance of the flags of 46 nations.

Down below was the blue-green podium, with green garlands, and above and at the sides leared the golden masks of tragedy and comedy. On the mezzanine floor was massed the press with its machines, eyes and ears of the world, snapping and grinding. Its engineers ran crouching to and fro, up and down the aisles. In the seats under blazing lights were all types of mankind, all languages and shades of color - Arabia and China, India and Africa were conspicuous, Latin-America and all Europe and America.

Franklin Roosevelt was curiously absent. God lacks a sense of drama, otherwise he would have let the dead President make here his last speech and appearance. There, too, was an absence of music. A military band screeched intermittently but no one listened. It may have been playing national anthems but I could not hear. A great music of organs and trumpets ought to have sounded but there was severe simplicity, perhaps even a little over done. Only one fine note, and that was the minute of silent meditation.

The ceremonies were rather conspicuously American, English; no other tongue was heard, no allusion to other cultures. There came in first 17 young folk in military dress: soldiers, sailors, Wacs, Waves and Spars. I was sorry there was no colored face among them. It would have been a world-wide gesture of significance, if some one had thought of that. But there were a number of things here unthought of. Four men sat on the platform, and a Voice. The young white-haired Stettinus presided. The President of the United States spoke from Washington in a flat mid-western voice; clear, not altogether logical in sequence, but stressing on the whole what needed to be stressed. We represent here the overwhelming majority of all mankind - do we? Where are the colonies? The Governor of California, that astute politician, made a conventional speech. The best speech of the day in thought and diction was that of the Mayor of San Francisco.

Then Stettinus welcomed the conference, and said two words: "Always the West has meant the future" and "We meet on the ocean named Peace."

The audience in all the short but simple ceremony was tense. It was composed of older people. There were bald heads and gray hair; many women. There were few soldiers and no youth. Outside, the masses craned their necks and stared. They cheered Molotov but no one else. They eagerly sought glimpses of other celebrities.

Naturally I looked for color. It was there, and on the whole conspicuous. To my consternation I came near being photographed with the Indian delegation, three hand-picked stooges of Great Britain, one turbaned; but I escaped. I saw the Vice President of Liberia but did not see the Ethiopians. The Arabians were distinctly Negroid.

American Negroes appeared by magic as I walked down the steps of the opera house. There was the President of Howard University and Rayford Logan. There were the editors of the Chicago Defender and the Pittsburgh Courier, Noble Sissle was there, Mrs. Bethune and Mr. White, and representatives of the National Baptist Association. The city stood with open arms. They transported guests from the Civic Center to the hotels gratis and with smiling courtesy. There was no conspicuous evidence of the color line. Quite the contrary.

And so now we are on our way, and the world is in conference with arrangements near perfection for hearing and listening over all the globe. There remains but the matter of knowing what to do and how to do it.

WORLD PEACE AND THE DARKER PEOPLES

The plan of trusteeship now being considered by the UNCIO has to do with not more than 2 million colonial peoples. If there is added to this number the people in colonies mandated after the first world war they may amount to 10 million people. Certain territories may be internationalized and mandated after this war which would bring the total number of colonial peoples under trusteeship of mandates up to possibly 25 millions. There would still be left 725 million in colonial regions. The British would control 400 millions in Asia, 60 million in Africa, 3 million in the Islands of the Sea. The French would control nearly 30 millions in Asia, 35 millions in Africa and the Netherlands 67 millions in East Asia. Portugal and Spain would have 12 millions.

It is in these colonial peoples that the world should be interested if it wants to maintain peace. Their attitude toward them today is that they are backward, not because of their history but because of their lack of ability. The world believes that in accordance with former race theories they must be ruled for their own good as well as for the profit of Europe and North America. This is a dangerous doctrine, first, because it is not true. There is no scientific proof that any of these colonial peoples are not capable of progress and advancement, but the second reason is even more cogent. So long as these colonial peoples remain poor, ignorant and diseased, their domination by white Europe and America will be profitable and the fight to obtain the profits of their exploitation will cause wars in the future as it has in the past.

And in addition to this, some time and some how these people themselves are going to rebel against domination. We may think that European technique will prevent this, and that European power can keep one-third of the human race in permanent subjugation. This is a false dream. It is going to be the cause, if not of a third World War, certainly of a fourth or fifth.

The UNCIO ought not to adjourn without distinctly providing for the implementing of the following three propositions which have been laid before it by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People:

The main groups of mankind, commonly called races, are essentially equal in capability of progress and deserve equality of treatment, opportunity and respect.

In the eye of both science and religion, all men are brothers, with rights to freedom of thought, belief and expression; freedom of domicile movement and communication; justice before the courts and equal, civil, economic, political and social rights. The first duty of civilization is to see to it that no human being is deprived of these rights because of poverty, disease or ignorance.

The colonial system of government, however deeply rooted in history and custom, is today undemocratic , socially dangerous and a main cause of wars. The United Nations recognizing democracy as the only just way of life for all peoples make it a first statute of international law that at the earliest practical moment no nation nor group shall be deprived of effective voice in its own government. An international colonial commission on which colonial peoples shall have representation should have power to investigate the facts and implement this declaration under the Security Council.

A CUP OF COCOA AND CHOCOLATE DROPS

If coffee is stimulating and tea soothing, cocoa has a certain added satisfaction of comfort and "gratefulness" which appeals widely to mankind. Add to this all the luxury of its derivative, chocolate, and the cocoa crop is a matter of world interest. The West Coast of Africa is the chief centre of this crop.

The British West African Cocoa Crop has averaged since 1932 about 250,000 tons per year, worth, normally, about $40,000,000 dollars. It is raised entirely by natives, on samll farms offrom one to five acres, and has become the mainstay of thousands upon thousands of peasant farmers who employ countless numbers of wage labourers. It is the main provider of external purchasing power for the Colonial Government.

The average production is one ton per farm, annually. The actual peasant producers receive for this crop, nominally 15,000,000 dollars or less, or $40 to $60 per ton. There is, however, to-day a special Government war sur-tax on the export of this cocoa, of $3.75 per ton, which, while paid by the exporters, is immediately deducted from the amount paid to the farmers, making the net income of the producers less than $30 per farm, per year.

The cocoa is taken to Europe and America and processed. Cocoa butter is abstracted and theobromine (a source of caffein) and the pressed cocoa cake is left. From this comes the world's supply of chocolate for candy, cooking and drinking.

The total product thus obtained is sold and reaches a very high figure. It involves for processing, costly machinery and a large body of factory labour, but, even after this is paid, the profits have made millionaires of the promoters and investors in many lands.

Here, now, is a chance to ascertain some of the facts concerning the modern distribution of wealth, and the division of labour and services, involving Colonial labour; and, in the case of this labour, the problem is simplified because foreign capital is not involved in primary production, so far as the raising of cocoa is concerned.

Cocoa raising on the West Coast of Africa is an extraordinary phenomenan; it is a case where the impossible, or should we say, the unexpected has happened. Usually the indictement brought agains Colonial labour is that it is lazy, backward and inefficient. White capital is needed and can only yield reasonable profits if low wages are paid to labour and expensive management and highly-paid white labour are imported.

Quite contrary to this pattern, familiar in South Africa and Rhodesia, on the Gold Coast the natives themselves have developed a product in international world demand. The transplanting of the cocoa industry from Spanish to British Africa was a matter of native ingenuity and resourcefulness, at a time when the British cocoa industry was using the excuse of slavery in St. Thome and Principe to remove the control of the cocoa crop from Spain to Britain. I heard this charge made at a public meeting in Lisbon in 1923. The plantation system in cocoa-raising, which had been the rule in Spanish Africa, still is is British Grenada. There land monopoly prevails, and one or two shillings per day is paid labour, which gets work only two or three days each week. On the Gold Coast the Negroes forged ahead and began raising cocoa on their own peasant holdings, with the result that the problem of private profit for the Europeans became a matter of controlling sales and prices of the products rather than the time-honoured method of conducting plantations with serf labour.

If the Gold Coast had been a white colony the developement would have been swift and direct, following the lines of Australian wool, Rhodesian copper and the South African mines. West Africa would have become a prosperous community, with independant peasant farmers, industry engaged in at least partial processing of raw material, and, eventually, in politics Dominion Status within the British Empire.

But West Africa was black, which means not necessarily conscious discrimination based on race, but rather that because nobody felt any interest in what was going on in West Africa, every device of concealment and exploitation could be used by selfish interests to extract the last penny of profit from the farmers' produce and give them no voice, either in the state or in the industry, to express legally and clearly their wishes and complaints. Creech-Jones, Under Secretary for the Colonies, says:

"It is an odd contradiction in the British people that they effect a pride in Colonial achievement and in the possession of a far-flung, long established Empire but show little disposition to aquire genuine knowledge of its essential facts."

Rita Hinden adds:

"Parliament devoted aproximately one day a year to Colonial debate, during which a few stalwarts harangue the empty benches."

The results make interesting economic history. From the beginning of European trade on the West Coast, the object of the merchants has always been to obtain such monopoly that they could keep the prices paid for the produce down. They, therefore, continually attempted trade agreements amongst themselves to control the price of raw materials and to fix the selling price of imported merchandise.

Against these cartels and restrictive trade agreements, African producers and consumers have made a continuous fight. But, unfortunately, the local Governments, far from being under the control of the farmers, were almost completely under the control of the cocoa-buying firms, partly because the firms themselves were directly represented on the Governor's council; and, more especially, because at home in Great Britain their sponsors had indirect but tremendous influence upon the Colonial Office itself, and over the appointment of officials to the Colonies by that office.

"In fact, for a long time, the cocoa farmers of the Gold Coast and Nigeria had maintained that the local Governments were either in the deal with the European firms or were too weak to keep check on the growing arrogance and unbridled rapacity of the combines. But it was not until shortly before the close of the last Conservative Government that Colonel Oliver Stanley, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, admitted in debate in the House of Commons, that in the Colonies sometimes the European firms had been allowed to grow so strong that on several occassions they had even threatened to challenge and overthrow the authority of the local Governments."

(FR)

One result of this situation was violent fluctuations in the local prices paid for cocoa, due to the speculative world produce market and to the success or failure of the local buyers competition. For instance, in 1927, Gold Coast cocoa exports rose to 210,000 tons, valued at more than $47,000,000. In 1934, with a crop of practically the same size, the value sank to $16,000,000. Such fluctuations, of course, not only spelled ruin for thousands of farmers, but caused intense political and social unrest. At the same time it encouraged the usual system of borrowing by farmers threatened with bankruptcy, so that the farmers fell more and more in debt to moneylenders. In 1933/34 75% of the farmers had pledged their crops to the moneylenders, who were getting sometimes 100% interest ontheir loans.

Repeated attempts to organise boycotts on the part of the farmers against the buyers were organised before the present war, and finally in 1937/38 a succesful boycott was organised, which lasted for eight months, with disastrous effects on the revenue of the local Governments.

The boycott of 1937/38 had been precipated by a so-called Buying Agreement on the part of the cocoa firms. This meant that their efforts, covering many years, to monopolise the market, had now been succesful. The thirteen European firms, of which one firm alone took half the crop, had come into complete agreement and were buying as one organisation, with one fixed price and without competition. As a result of this boycott a Royal Commission, with William Nowell as Chairman, was appointed by the Colonial Office. The Nowell Commission investigated the situation at length and reported in 1938:

> "We have reached the conclusion that the continuance of the Buying Agreement introduced in the Gold Coast and Nigeria is undesirable"..... and....."in the circumstances it is our opinion that the Agreement should be finally withdrawn."

The Commission went on to make recommendations for the future, and laid down these principles:

(1) The strengthening of the economic position and morale of the producers in relation to the buyers, both European and African.

(2) The Recognition of the legitimate interests of both the African community and the shipper.

(3) The maintenance of free competition in the purchase of the cocoa crop.

They finally observed that:

> "After consulting many opinions and after prolonged thought, we see no other way of meeting these conditions than by ..... the association of producers for the collective marketing of their produce, and for the representation of their joint interests."

Unfortunately, before any steps could be taken, the war intervened, and immediately the situation was changed. The British Government took over the whole production, undertaking to buy and sell the crop and to fix prices. In 1938, the members of the Nowell Commission foresaw the likelihood of a Government monopoly in the future and remarked:

36-7-136

> "A monopoly backed by statute and dominated by the Agreement firms, whose operations are already suspected of aiming at monopoly, would simply not be acceptable to African opinion. We believe that official participation would do more to weaken the prestige of the Colonial Governments than to allay the suspicions of the Africans."

The purchase of cocoa under Government control was first carried out by the Ministry of Food, then by the West African Cocoa Control Board, and at present, by the West African Produce Control Board. In 1939/40 the local Colonial Governments fixed prices, while the individual firms in the trade did the purchasing and handling, in the same proportion as they had previously carried on business in the trade. The firms were paid their expenses and guaranteed an agreed rate of profit; thus capital could not lose.

The first Control Board consisted of the Under-Secretary of State in London, the head of the West African Department of the Colonial Office, the head of the Economic Department, one of the leading cocoa manufacturers in England, John Cadbury, and various Europeans nominated by the Colonial Government, mostly former Civil Servants. In May, 1942, this Board was enlarged and given power over ground nuts and other produce. There was added to it a representative of the English Wholesale Co-Operative Societies and a member of a leading firm trading in oil seeds and oil. This Board, in consultation with the Colonial Governments, fixes prices.

During the first year of its operation, 1939/40, there was a deficit of some $800,000, practically all of which was due to the purchase of French Cameroon cocoa, as a help to Free France. In 1940/41 the prices paid farmers were reduced by $8 to $12 per ton, and the result was a profit of £800,000.

In the third season, 1941/42, the United States banned shipments because of her need for boats for war purposes, and there was increasing U-Boat danger. The Gold Coast crop was short, reflecting probably some resentment at the policy of the Board, which was unloading losses upon the farmers. Prices were advanced slightly, and a good deal of the cocoa held over; but a large amount had to be destroyed. The net loss the season was 1,2000,000 dollars.

This matter of destroying the cocoa brought, of course, much controversy; the cocoa held over was eventually sold at a large profit, but there were few facilities for storing cocoa on the Gold Coast. That would have called for careful building, and the material for such building was scarce. But in addition to this, the cocoa operators had never wanted cocoa stored, which would have been a method of stabilising prices, and a temptation to the farmers and black business men to start processing. Nevertheless, some storage was attempted, and considerable cocoa-butter, as the oil from the c ocoa is called, was extracted, used locally and exported. This developement, however, was against the interests of foreign monopolies and traders, and was quickly stopped when ships became available for export. If it had kept up it would have called for modern machinery and the rise of a small class of skilled native labour.

Meantime, the cocoa farmers began to protest; they declared that in 1941/42 the Government was buying cocoa at 60dollars a ton, and selling it at $180 per ton in the United Kingdom, and over #200 per ton in the United States. On this was piled the war export tax of $3.80 per ton.

On the other hand, the price of imported merchandise was not controlled. Cotton print which sold before the war for $2\frac{1}{2}$ was now selling at $18, kakhi had risen from 60c to $3.20, cement from 40c to $1.60, and sheet iron from $1 to $20.

"The result of this situation is that to-day many of the farmers have been completely impoverished and paralysed economically."

In the next season, 1942/43, the Government followed the long neglected advice of the farmers and did away with agents and intermediaries used in the collecting of cocoa. Prices were again lowered but freight payments equalised by applying the prices paid to inland depots and not simply to the sea-side ports. Finally, the United States lifted its ban on shipments, the cocoa held over from the last season, as well as the current crop, was sold at high prices, and the profit amounted to over $8,000,000. (£ 3,676,253)

The war difficulties now over, further destroying of crops was unneccessary and the Colonial Government promised that the prices paid to the cocoa farmers for 1944/45 and 1945/46 would be increased 70% over the prices of the first four years of control, that is to $100 per ton.

The new Labour Government outlined their plan for the future. This plan proposed that, beginning with the 1945/46 cocoa season, the Government would continue its control of the cocoa crop and of the other important crops of British West Africa. This control was to be exercised on the Gold Coast through organisations having an official majority appointed by the Colonial Government, and including Africans and representatives of business interests. It was promised that , eventually, "representatives for the producers will consititute the majority in the proposed organisation." In Nigeria, the Government was to be in control, but there was to be an Advisory Committee with representatives of the farmers and traders. Especially, it was emphasised, that the Co-Operative Movement was to be developed and through that, direct representation of the farmers increased.

Immediately the farmers protested. They said:

"It is abundantly clear that, with the approval of the Imperial Government, the West African Produce Control Board was put in a priviliged position where it is now exercising a virtual monopoly over all agricultural produce in British West Africa. This official monopoly, which was specifically denounned by the Nowell Commission, could be tolerated by the Africans to some extent only as a war measure - as both the Imperial and local Governments have repeatedly made the farmers understand. But the Imperial Government has now suggested the continuance of the war-time control schem as a future policy for the post-war period."

First they protested against the lack of any real representation on the Control Board. The "Africans" appointed to the Board would be the Chiefs, who, by recent legislation, are Government officials, paid by the Colonial Governments and under their control. They do not and cannot represent the Farmers. They declared that the so-called Co-Operative Movement in West Africa was not co-operative in the British sense of the term. Instead of being democratic organisations, run by the producers and consumers, they were supervised by the Government department of Agriculture, and were under strict Government supervision.

The so-called official Co-operatives handled

They could do nothing that the Government did not oversee and permit. This is flagrant abuse of the elementary principles of co-operation. The so-called official Co-Operatives handle only 3% of the crop, while the farmers who handle 97% of the crop have their own collective organisations, which are unrecognised by the Government.

The farmers protested against the proposal to continue to recognise the monopoly of the present cocoa firms. The Government first arranged that the purchase and export of cocoa should be shared by firms already in the business, in proportion to the amount of business that they had previousely been carrying on. Some small shippers were admitted in the first year, and in the second year the quota of the Government Co-Operatives was increased. But new entrants into the business were barred.

The farmers protested: "The Africans view with growing apprehension the action of the local Governments, by which the entire merchant trade of West Africa had been placed exclusively in the charge of certain particular firms. Such an action is always a measure of restraint of legitimate trade, and the local Governments should be expected to discountenance, instead of encouraging and sponsoring, this evil practice."

The farmers were especially apprehensive concerning the future of the cocoa market: "The position of the international cocoa market in the future seems to show a tendency towards concentration of the buying interests so that the circle of potential cocoa buyers would probably be narrowed to a very small number, say four big manufacturers in the United States, two existing, and perhaps one extra in this country, one huge buyer on the continent of Europe - the Federated Soviet Buying Commission - which would probably cover the requirements of most European countries (as predicted long ago by Field Marshal Smuts) etc. etc. Such huge and important buyers could be easily dealt with by the Farmers Committee of West Africa Limited, eventually under Government supervision, without the so-called "other interests" mentioned in the Report, viz. traders, shippers etc., for the simple reason that in the light of the coming economic and political relations the necessity for the continuation of their services, at least in the cocoa trade, is evidently disappearing."

These farmers, who are the majority of the population of the Gold Coast and Nigeria, and certainly the bulk of the cocoa growers in Nigeria, are not mentioned at all, except that they would be obliged to submit themselves to the proposed Government Selling Organisation. Such discrimination in favour of Co-Operative Societies which are of no economic importance, for the Gold Coast and Nigeria cocoa industry, is entirely incomprehensible. Seeing that the non-co-operative cocoa producers were almost entirely for the West African Cocoa delivered so far at self-sacrificing prices to the Cocoa Control, and that furthermofe, they are the majority of the population of West Africa and, as such, have been helping the Empire's war effort in every way possible, such as man-power, money contributions, augmented deliveries, etc., the discrimination in favour of the Co-Operative Societies against the non-co-operative producers is entirely unjustifiable.

But the farmers protested especially concerning the money which represents the profit on Government control of West African cocoa since 1939, this amounts at present to $15,00,000, and may amount to 20/25,000,000 when the results of the season of 1943/44 are known. The British Government has treated the question of these profits rather queerly; at first, it talked of operating "with the British tax-payers money". This, of course, was not true and could never have been true, except in the contingency of loss in the operation. It then proceeded to treat the surplus as funds belonging to the British Government, promising, however, that Parliament would appropriate a similar sum "to be returned to the cocoa producers, or used for their benefit". When the Labour Government came in, this plan was expanded into using the money partly for research and partly as a revolving fund to finance price fluctuations in the cocoa industry.* Thus the farmers, and not the traders and investors, are going to be asked to bear the cost of research and the furnishing of finance capital, an extra-ordinary proposal.

* the profits made 1939/43, now amounting to £3,676.253, and now added to the profits of the 1943/44 season, which will be substantial, will be used as the finance capital of this cocoa scheme; since these profits cannot be returned to each producer because there are so many producers and no detailed records. A Research staff will be set up, for which £1,250,000 will be allocated. This capital sum may eventually be returned and become a part of the capital of the marketing organisation.

Against this the cocoa farmers protested bitterly:

"We earnestly point out that this money does not belong in any way either to the British Government, or the local Governments of the Gold Coast and Nigeria. It belongs to the cocoa farmers, and they are the only people who have a right to the ultimate disposal of the outstanding credit; The cocoa industry in both countries is the result of the initiative and labour of the Africans themselves, and there is no evidence on record that the local Governments had ever assisted or subsidised the developement of the cocoa industry in British West Africa."

36-7-141

The funds for this scientific undertaking should either come from the Imperial funds or provision should be made for such sums as are needed in the annual estimates. This has been the practice hitherto, and the research should not be undertaken at the expense of the cocoa producers, who are already impoverished and over-taxed, simply because they have realised some profit on their own labour under the strenuous circumstances of war-time economy.

Research institutes in both the Gold Coast and Nigeria have not been able to save the cocoa industry from deterioration. The only remedy is, and will be, a better price for the producer, to enable him to keep pace with the rising cost of labour, otherwise more farms will be neglected, which means a further spread of the swollen shoot menace.

The Governments of the Gold Coast and Nigeria have persistently refused to give any sympathetic consideration to the legitimate demands of the producers - a state of affairs which, we earnestly remark, has considerably shaken whatever confidence the farmers have in the local Governments of British West Africa.

These deplorable conditions have been tolerated by the African producers because of their desire to win the war. But now the war is over, the farmers do not consider the existence of the West African Produce Control Board as necessary any longer, and are in no way inclined to subject themselves to the continuance of the hardships and unfair treatment which the Board had imposed upon the farmers while the war was still in progress.

It is a breach of faith to continue to operate these various oppressive economic devices which were introduced under disguise as war measures, since the African producers aquiesced in them, but not without organised protests, only after the local Governments had given repeated assurances that the new measures would be removed as soon as hostilities ceased.

The Farmers Committee of British West Africa Limited would be quite fit to manage the whole affair of the proposed Centralized Sales in all its aspects. However, if it is insisted upon, they would be agfeeable to accept eventually Government supervision. They have their plans to meet every emergency and, in this connection, they are of the opinion that first of all a special international Cocoa Council should be formed, which would consist of representatives of cocoa producers and consumers all over the world. They furthermore consider that such a Council would greatly simplify the task of Centralized Sales of the West African cocoa, and that it would also safeguard West Africa's future in the world cocoa trade.

West Africa is especially sensitive on this matter of research. They know quite well that the land needs guidance and knowledge of modern technique. But it often happens that instead of this being imparted to the Africans, it is held as the monopoly of Englishmen sent out to the Colonial Service. This is one of the great rewards of Imperialism. It opens a field to vast number of young Englishmen who find well paid service in the Colonies, with special caste privileges, high salaries, large allowances, long vacations, and a liberal pension system. Whether they are specially trained or not, they do not impart their knowledge willingly to the natives, nor are they permitted to do so by the regulations. On the other hand, they themselves often lack the special and local knowledge which the native has. There is an apposite story from Sierra Leone; the large and valuable fish crop was not being properly preserved; the Government took the matter in charge and brought highly-paid experts from England. They bought special ships with refrigerating apparatus and other machinery. At the end of the year, the budget showed an expenditure of £10,000 and an income of £300. Protest and inquiry brought the explanation that while the experts knew what to do with the fish after they were caught, they did not know where to find them.

At the Pan-African Conference, recently held in Manchester, a Committee representing the West African Cocoa Farmers was present. They brought with them a petition to the Colonial Office. The chairman who explained it had a face like the Man of Sorrows, black and deeply carven. He was in desperate earnest and shouted repeatedly, "We must be free, we will be free".

I did not quite understand his emotion until I read the petition and learned that the new Secretary of State for the Colonies had refused to receive the Committee or listen to its message. He declared that the Committee was not official, which meant that it was not appointed in accordance with the procedure of the Colonial Governments, and was not composed of the representatives which these Governments had officially chosen.

The Committee finally secured a hearing before the Colonial Section of the Fabian Society, which acts as a sort of Brain Trust to advise the Labour Government on Colonial Affairs. On the committee were many people of importance; Mr. Creech-Jones, the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Miss Rita Hinden, Lord Farringdon, the Secretary of the Aboriginees Protection Society, and others. The committee listened for a while, but several left before the hearing was over. The representatives of the farmers, therefore, brought their case to us and laid it before us. They had been sent to London at the expense of the farmers, and had established a permanent office in Arundel Street. They were prepared for a long, hard fight and the Pan-African Congress pledged help.

The cocoa farmers make the following demands:

(1) That since the war is over, the recommendations of the Nowell Commission be implemented, and that the Imperial Government now make good the promises made to the African farmers.

(2) That the price of $160 per ton should be paid farmers, and should be set for the 1945/46 season.

(3) That the profits from cocoa control since 1939, amounting as it probably will to $25,000,000, be turned over to the farmers' own existing organisations as capital for the establishment of co-operative agricultural banks in British West Africa.

(4) That the operations of the West African Produce Control Board should cease and a new system of centralized marketing should be installed, and effective co-operation, under the controlof the farmers' own organisations, be established.

(5) That the present quota allocation of the crop to special buyers be abolished, and that the farmers be free to market their crop collectively to their own accredited agencies.

(6) That the present restrictions of exports and imports be removed in order to allow the West African farmers to trade with the United Kingdom and other countries through their own agencies.

(7) That an International Council on cocoa should be planned, in order to adopt a comprehensive approadh to all problems of cocoa as an important world commodity.

(8) That the Ordinances of British West Africa with regard to Co-Operation be changed so as to correspond to practices in the United Kingdom.

And the farmers concluded:

"This delegation of Gold Coast and Nigerian farmers are of the opinion that there are enough men and women of goodwill in the Imperial Government of Britain who might bring economic justice to bear on these pressing problems, and thus might prevent the occurrence of a tragic economic upheaval, the consequences of which, unfortunately, might effect the peaceful life of innocent people in all parts of the world and not only in West Africa and Britain."

If this is not statesmanship, which eventually must be listened to, I am greatly mistaken. It seems to me to point a path towards the emancipation of the world's colonial populations and the beginning of democracy among the majority of the people of the world, for which we have recently fought two devestating world wars, without yet seeing the light.

If coffee is stimulating and tea soothing, cocoa has a certain added satisfaction of comfort and "gratefulness" which appeals widely to mankind. Add to this all the luxury of its derivative, chocolate, and the cocoa crop is a matter of world interest. The West Coast of Africa is the chief centre of this crop.

The British West African Cocoa Crop has averaged since 1932 about 250,000 tons per year, worth, normally, about 44,000,000 dollars. It is raised entirely by natives, on saml farms offrom one to five acres, and has become the mainstay of thousands upon thousands of peasant farmers who employ countless numbers of wage labourers. It is the main provider of external purchasing power for the Colonial Government.

The Nowell Commission investigated the situation at length and reported in 1938:

> "We have reached the conclusion that the continuance of the Buying Agreement introduced in the Gold Coast and Nigeria is undesirable"..... and....."in the circumstances it is our opinion that the Agreement should be finally withdrawn."

The Commission went on to make recommendations for the future, and laid down these principles:

(1) The strengthening of the economic position and morale of the producers in relation to the buyers, both European and African.

(2) The Recognition of the legitimate interests of both the African community and the shipper.

(3) The maintenance of free competition in the purchase of the cocoa crop.

They finally observed.that:

> "After consulting many opinions and after prolonged thought, we see no other way of meeting these conditions than by ..... the association of producers for the collective marketing of their produce, and for the representation of their joint interests."

Unfortunately, before any steps could be taken, the war intervened, and immediately the situation was changed. The British Government took over the whole production, undertaking to buy and sell the crop and to fix prices. In 1938, the members of the Nowell Commission foresaw the likelihood of a Government monopoly in the future and remarked:

> "A monopoly backed by statute and dominated by the Agreement firms, whose operations are already suspected of aiming at monopoly, would simply not be acceptable to African opinion. We believe that official participation would do more to weaken the prestige of the Colonial Governments than to allay the suspicions of the Africans."

The purchase of cocoa under Government control was first carried out by the Ministry of Food, then by the West African Cocoa Control Board, and at present, by the West African Produce Control Board. In 1939/40 the local Colonial Governments fixed prices, while the individual firms in the trade did the purchasing and handling, in the same proportion as they had previously carried on business in the trade. The firms were paid their expenses and guaranteed an agreed rate of profit; thus capital could not lose.

The first Control Board consisted of the Under-Secretary of State in London, the head of the West African Department of the Colonial Office, the head of the Economic Department, one of the leading cocoa manufacturers in England, John Cadbury, and various Europeans nominated by the Colonial Government, mostly former Civil Servants. In May, 1942, this Board was enlarged and given power over ground nuts and other produce There was added to it a representative of the English Wholesale Co-Operative Societies and a member of a leading firm trading in oil seeds and oil. This Board, in consultation with the Colonial Governments, fixes prices.

During the first year of its operation, 1939/40, there was a deficit of some $800,000, practically all of which was due to the purchase of French Cameroon cocoa, as a help to Free France. In 1940/41 the prices paid farmers were reduced by $8 to $12 per ton, and the result was a profit of [illegible] & more

In the third season, 1941/42, the United States banned shipments because of her need for boats for war purposes, and there was increasing U-Boat danger. The Gold Coast crop was short, reflecting probably some resentment at the policy of the Board, which was unloading losses upon the farmers. Prices were advanced slightly, and a good deal of the cocoa held over; but a large amount had to be destroyed. The net loss the season was 1,2000,000 dollars.

This matter of destroying the cocoa brought, of course, much controversy; the cocoa held over was eventually sold at a large profit, but there were few facilities for storing cocoa on the Gold Coast. That would have called for careful building, and the material for such building was scarce. But in addition to this, the cocoa operators had never wanted cocoa stored, which would have been a method of stabilisi prices, and a temptation to the farmers and black business men to start processing. Nevertheless, some storage was attempted, and considerable cocoa-butter, as the oil from the c ocoa is called, was extracted, used locally and exported. This develppement however, was against the interests of foreign monopolies and traders, and was quickly stopped when ships became available for export. If it had kept up it would have walled for modern machinery and the rise of a small class of skilled native labour.

Meantime, the cocoa farmers began to protest; they declared that in 1941/42 the Governmentx was buying cocoa at 60dollars a ton, and selling it at $180 per ton in the United Kingdom, and over #200 per ton in the United States. On this was piled the war export tax of $3.80 per ton.

On the other hand, the price of imported merchandise was not controlled. Cotton print which sold before the war for $2½ was now selling at $18, kakhi had risen from 60c to $3.20, cement from 40c to $1.60, and sheet iron from $1 to $20.

"The result of this situation is that to-day many of the farmers have been completely impoverished and paralysed economically."

In the next season, 1942/43, the Government followed the long neglected advice of the farmers and did away with agents and intermediaries used in the collecting of cocoa. Prices were again lowered but freight payments equalised by applying the price paid to inland depots and not simply to the sea-side ports. Finally, the United States lifted its ban on shipments, the cocoa held over from the last season, as well as the current crop, was sold at high prices, and the profit amounted to over $8,000,000. (£ 3,676,253)

The war difficulties now over, further destroying of crops was unnecessary and the Colonial Government promised that the prices paid to the cocoa farmers for 1944/45 and 1945/46 would be increased 70% over the prices of the first four years of control, that is to $100 per ton.

The new Labour Government outlined their plan for the future. This plan proposed that, beginning with the 1945/46 cocoa season, the Government would continue its control of the cocoa crop and of the other important crops of British West Africa. This contro was to be exercised on the Gold Coast through organisations having an official majority appointed by the Colonial Government, and including Africans and representatives of business interests. It was promised that , eventually, "representatives for the producer will consititute the majority in the proposed organisation." In Nigeria, the Government was to be in control, but there was to be an Advisory Committee with representatives of the farmers and traders. Especially, it was emphasised, that the Co-Operative Movement was to be developed and through that, direct representation of the farmers increased.

Immediately the farmers protested. They said:

"It is abundantly clear that, with the approval of the Imperial Government, the West African Produce Control Board was put in a priviliged position where it is now exercising a virtual monopoly over all agricultural produce in British West Africa. This official monopoly, which was specifically denounned by the Nowell Commission, could be tolerated by the Africans to some extent only as a war measure - as both the Imperial and local Governments have repeatedly made the farmers understan But the Imperial Government has now suggested the continuance of the war-time control schem as a future policy for the post-war period."

81-7-18

First they protested against the lack of any real representation on the Control Board. The "Africans" appointed to the Board would be the Chiefs, who, by recent legislation, are Government officials, paid by the Colonial Governments and under their control. They do not and cannot represent the Farmers. They declared that the so-called Co-Operative Movement in West Africa was not co-operative in the British sense of th term. Instead of being democratic organisations, run by the producers and consumers, they were supervised by the Government department of Agriculture, and were under strict Government supervision. The so-called official Co-Operatives handled

They could do nothing that the Government did not oversee and permit. This is flagrant abuse of the elementary principles of co-operation. The so-called off: Co-Operatives handle only 3% of the crop, while the farmers who handle 97% of th crop have their own collective organisations, which are unrecognised by the Gover

The farmers protested against the proposal to continue to recognise the mono of the present cocoa firms. The Government first arranged that the purchase and export of cocoa should be shared by firms already in the business, in proportion to the amount of business that they had previousely been carrying on. Some small shi were admitted in the first year, and in the second year the quota of the Government Co-Operatives was increased. But new entrants into the business were barred.

The farmers protested: "The Africans view with growing apprehension the action of the local Governments, by which the entire merchant trade of West Africa had been placed exclusively in the charge of certain particular firms. Such an action is always a measure of restraint of legitimate trade, and the local Governments should be expected to discountenance, instead of encouraging and sponsoring, this evil practic

The farmers were especially apprehensive concerning the future of the cocoa marke "The position of the international cocoa market in the future seems to show a tendency towards concentration of the buying interests so that the circle of potential cocoa buyers would probably be narrowed to a very small number, say four big manufacturers in the United States, two existing, and perhaps one extra in this country, one huge buyer on the continent of Europe - the Federated Soviet Buying Commission - which would probably cover the requirements of most European countries (as predicted long ago by Field Marshal Smuts) etc. etc. Such huge and important buyers could be easily dealt with by the Farmers Committee of West Africa Limited, eventually under Government supervision, without the so-called "other interests" mentioned in the Report, viz. traders, shippers etc., for the simple reason that in the light of the coming economic and political relations the necessity for the continuation of their services, at least in the cocoa trade, is evidently disappearing."

These farmers, who are the majority of the population of the Gold Coast and Nigeria, and certainly the bulk of the cocoa growers in Nigeria, are not mentioned at all, except that they would be obliged to submit themselves to the proposed Government Selling Organisation. Such discrimination in favour of Co-Operative Societies which are of no economic importance, for the Gold Coast and Nigeria cocoa industry, is entirely incomprehensible. Seeing that the non-co-operative cocoa producers were almost entirely for the West African Cocoa delivered so far at self-sacrificing prices to the Cocoa Control, and that furthermore, they are the majority of the population of West Africa and, as such, have been helping the Empire's war effort in every way possible, such as man-power, money contributions, augmented deliveries, etc., the discrimination in favour of the Co-Operative Societies against the non-co-operative producers is entirely unjustifiable.

But the farmers protested especially concerning the money which represents the profit on Government control of West African cocoa since 1939, this amounts at present to $15,00,000, and may amount to 20/25,000,000 when the results of the season of 1943/44 are known. The British Government has treated the question of these profits rather queerly; at first, it talked of operating "with the British tax-payers money". This, of course, was not true and could never have been true, except in the contingency of loss in the operation. It then proceeded to treat the surplus as funds belonging to the British Government, promising, however, that Parliament would appropriate a similar sum "to be returned to the cocoa producers, or used for their benefit". When the Labour Government came in, this plan was expanded into using the money partly for research and partly as a revolving fund to finance price fluctuations in the cocoa industry.* Thus the farmers, and not the traders and investors, are going to be asked to bear the cost of research and the furnishing of finance capital, an extraordinary proposal.

* the profits made 1939/43, now amounting to £3,676.253, and now added to the profits of the 1943/44 season, which will be substantial, will be used as the finance capital of this cocoa scheme; since these profits cannot be returned to each producer because there are so many producers and no detailed records. A Research staff will be set up' for which £1,250,000 will be allocated. This capital sum may eventually be returned and become a part of the capital of the marketing organisation.

Against this the cocoa farmers protested bitterly:

"We earnestly point out that hhis money does not belong in any way either to the British Government, or the local Governments of the Gold Coast and Nigeria. It belongs to the cocoa farmers, and they are the only people who have a right to the ultimate disposal of the outstanding credit; The cocoa industry in both countries is the result of the initiative and labour of the Africans themselves, and there is no evidence on record that the local Governments had ever assisted or subsidised the developement of the cocoa industry in British West Africa."

The funds for this scientific undertaking should either come from the Imperial funds or provision should be made for such sums as are needed in the annual estimates. This has been the practice hitherto, and the research should not be undertaken at the expense of the cocoa producers, who are already impoverished and over-taxed, simply because they have realised some profit on their own labour under the strenuous circumstances of war-time economy.

Research institutes in both the Gold Coast and Nigeria have not been able to save the cocoa industry from deterioration. The only remedy is, and will be, a better price for the producer, to enable him to keep pace with the rising cost of labour, otherwise more farms will be neglected, which means a further spread of the swollen shoot menace.

The Governments of the Gold Coast and Nigeria have persistently refused to give any sympathetic consideration to the legitimate demands of the producers - a state of affairs which, we earnestly remark, has considerably shaken whatever confidence the farmers have in the local Governments of British West Africa.

These deplorable conditions have been tolerated by the African producers because of their desire to win the war. But now the war is over, the farmers do not consider the existence of the West African Produce Control Board as necessary any longer, and are in no way inclined to subject themselves to the continuance of the hardships and unfair treatment which the Board had imposed upon the farmers while the war was still in progress.

It is a breach of faith to continue to operate these various oppressive economic devices which were introduced under disguise as war measures, since the African producers aquiesced in them, but not without organised protests, only after the local Governments had given repeated assurances that the new measures would be removed as soon as hostilities ceased.

The Farmers Committee of British West Africa Limited would be quite fit to manage the whole affair of the proposed Centralized Sales in all its aspects. However if it is insisted upon, they would be agreeable to accept eventually Government supervision. They have their plans to meet every emergency and, in this connection, they are of the opinion that first of all a special international Cocoa Council should be formed, which would consist of representatives of cocoa producers and consumers all ove the world. They furthermore consider that such a Council would greatly simplify the task of Centralized Sales of the West African cocoa, and that it would also safeguard West Africa's future in the world cocoa trade.

West Africa is especially sensitive on this matter of research. They know quite well that the land needs guidance and knowledge of modern technique. But it often happens that instead of this being imparted to the Africans, it is held as the monopoly of Englishmen sent out to the Colonial Service. This is one of the great rewards of Imperialism. It opens a field to vast number of young Englishmen who find well paid service in the Colonies, with special caste privileges, high salaries, large allowances, long vacations, and a liberal pension system. Whether they are specially trained or not, they do not impart their knowledge willingly to the natives, nor are they permitted to do so by the regulations. On the other hand, they themselves often lack the special and local knowledge which the native has. There is an apposite story from Sierra Leone; the large and valuable fish crop was not being properly preserved; the Government took the matter in charge and brought highly-paid experts from England. They bought special ships with refrigerating apparatus and other machinery. At the end of the year, the budget showed an expenditure of £10,000 and an income of £300. Protest and inquiry brought the explanation that while the experts knew what to do with the fish after they were caught, they did not know where to find them.

At the Pan-African Conference, recently held in Manchester, a Committee representing the West African Cocoa Farmers was present. They brought with them a petition to the Colonial Office. The chairman who explained it had a face like the Britain who might bring economic justice to bear on these pressing problems, and thus prevent the occurrence of a tragic economic upheaval, the consequences of which, unfortunately, might effect the peaceful life of innocent people in all parts of the world and not only in West Africa and Britain."

If this is not statesmanship, which eventually must be listened to, I am greatly mistaken. It seems to me to point a path towards the emancipation of the world's colonial populations and the beginning, among the majority of the people of the world, for which we have recently fought two devestating world wars, without yet seeing the light.

SHOULD THE NEGRO RETURN TO THE REPUBLICAN PARTY?

In the days of my youth---say from 1890 to 1910-- a subject such as this, would have been simply inexplicable to Americans of any color; Negroes of that day did not return to the republican party: They never left it. The very suggestion of leaving savored of sacrilege. I remember well, when in 1912, following the lead of Bishop Alexander Walters of the African Zion Church I proposed that in that election Negro voters should support Woodrow Wilson. We were met not so much by argument as by shocked astonishment that any Negro American in his right mind, could so far forget the party of Abraham Lincoln as ever to dream of supporting the party that drove this land into Civil War by defending human slavery.

It was indeed a curious series of events that induced us to advocate so radical a step. From enfranchisement in 1868 to the inauguration of Theodore Roosevelt, the Republican party had owned the Negro voter, body and soul, as Frederick Douglass himself said, "The Republican Party is the Ship, all elese is the Sea." Our consternation at Cleveland's election in ~~1880~~ 1884 and his re-election in 1892 was only partially allayed by his following northern business rather than Southern Bourbons and by appointments like that of William Trotter as Recorder of Deeds.

The Republicans still depended on Negro Delegates to the National Nominating Conventions, over one ~~xx~~ of which ~~xx~~ John R. Lynch of Mississippi ~~xxxx~~ had presided. Few Democrats had dared oppose Negro disfranchisement or even publicily to decry lynching. Then Theodore Rooveselt came to power, appointed Crum and had Booker Washington to Lunch. The Democrats raged and Roosevelt began to retreat before the resurgent South while his Successor Taft promised no appoints which the White South did not approve.

The Negroes turned against Taft, and when Teddy Roosevelt also turned and accepted leadership of the Bull Moose Progressives, intelligent Negroes prepared to follow him out of the republican party into a Third Party Movement. With NAACP leaders I wrote a proposed plank appealing to Negro support, and sent it to that revival meeting in Chicago. But Teddy Roosevelt whould have none of it. He flatly repudiated my plank, Negro delegates and Negro support, pinning his hope of election on a Progressive White South as represented by Parker of Louisiana. Slapped thus on both cheeks we Negro Progressives turned to Woodrow Wilson: A man of letters, Southerner, but as we hoped, reconstructed: And he to our satisfaction openly promised us "Justice and not mere grudging Justice."

36-7-2

In the ensuing campaign, more Negroes voted the democr tic ticket than ever before in history. The total number was not large and was confined to the few Northern states where Negroes at that time formed an appreciable number of voters. Undoubltedly they were infulential in certain pivotal states. At any rate Wilson ~~x~~ was elected. Then came the pay-off. The South had for the first time since the Civil War, a Southerner as President: A man who from birth regarded race segregation as so normal as never to have considered it seriously. Southerners with planned collusion intorduced a mass of anti-Negro legislation both in congress and in state legislatures. The largest number of such bills ever before attempted sought to fasten color caste on the nation. North and west came forth with bills to prohibit race intermarriage, to segregate Negroes in residence, schools and travel. The recent incorporation of the NAACP and its political and anti-lynching activity and court actions, re-enforced this bitter animosity. Wilson and liberal democrats, taken by surprise, side-tracked most of the proposed national legislation, but yielded in segregating federal employees in Washington and in accepting residential segregation in many states and cities. Only by most desperate appeals was wilson finally induced to denounce race riots and lynching. Naturally in the election of 1916 Negroes returned in large numbers to the republican party although Hughes was reluctant to make them specific promises. Due largely to his anti-war stand wilson was re-elected by narrow margin, almost immediately we went into the First World War.

The whole status of Negroes assumed a new aspect:

(1). Negroes migrated North by hundreds of thousands to fill the gap made by suspended immigration of foreign labor, and thus began to compete with Northern labor and also to increase their own political power.

(2). After a moment of hesitation, Negroes became a substantial part of the armed forces of the nation, and their continued loyalty was a matter of grave concern. A spy scare developed and frantic witch-hunting.

(3). The whole color caste system was put on trial in the draft and a democratic administration had reluctantly to face it. It was after desperate resistance and wild appeal to phony intelligence tests compelled to send Negro Divisions to the front as fighters and to commission 700 Negro officers.

(4). The trade unions after riot and opposition began to lower the color line and admit Negroes.

(5). The NAACP increased its systematic and intelligent campaign to eliminate color caste and put political parties on record. In 1920 and 1924 Harding and Coolidge held most of the Negro vote because of war reaction, the blundering foreign policy of the Democrats and the revival of the K.K.K. Taking advantage of this --Republicans disfranchised Southern Negro delegates in the councils of the party, and were so successful that Hoover thought he could ignore the Negro after he had carried a part of the Solid South on the anti-Catholic issue. The crash of 1929 sent him and his philosophy headlong and the reign of Roosevelt began.

Roosevelt won the Negro vote not simply as has been widely charged by alms-giving, poverty-stricken and unemployed Negroes certainly voted for the hand that fed them in 1932 and 1936. But Roosevelt was not simply a Santa Claus. He was a statesman: He recognized for the first time in American history that Negroes were Americans and not simply problems: He saw the need of the Negro for a decent wage: for necessary housing: for relief when unemployed; hw saw his suitability for public work projects: he finally dared a national directive against ~~first~~ color discrimination in Federal employment: He defended participation in collective bargaining. He broke down the color line in officer training and commissioned 2,000 Negro officers, and sent mixed fighting units to the front. Without fanfare, he received Negroes socially when their position or rank warranted it and entertained black foreign diplomats at state dinners. He did this, not as an exceptional effort, but by insisting that Negroes in law and administration be treated as human beings, and that t is was just as advantageous for white as for black Americans.

More than this, Roosevelt carried this program through with the aid of the Solid South and union labor --an astonighing feat. The Southern South was the most rectionary political group in the nation. From time to time it rebelled: it put every conceivable sort of pressure on Roosevelt. From time to time he yielded--sometimes laughingly, in matters too petty to notice: as when he delayed the first public housingproject for Balck Atlanta so as to let the later white project open first, and thus prove their "race superiority." In many more important matters he compromised to allay stupid prejudice: But he put pressure on labor unions to repudiate color discrimination and on the whole, and to an extent never before attempted he treated Negroes as men and they flocked to his support.

But today he is dead and his party has begun to disintegrate into warring factions. The reactionary Bourbon South has formed an frequesnt alliance with certain republicans and Mr. Taft, loyal son of his Father, has lately been South to assure the Southerners of the willingness of his party to cooperate. Its record in the last and present congress proves this. There is still a liberal South, as the clean record of Claude Pepper and the fair record of Hill of Alabama show. Four other Southern Senators and ten representatives voted right on the Poll tax and FEPC; but fully three-fourths of the Southern democrats in Senate and House have deserted the Roosevelt program on the Negro and are fellow-travelers with Bilbo, Rankin of Mississippi, Pappy O'Daniel of Texas, Cox of Georgia and Smith of Virginia.

Northern Democrats today stand hesitating etween the necessity of holding the Southern vote if they want to win, and a continued progressive program toward Negroes and labor. With Truman, they have found themselves trying at once to hold the South and the Negro vote without being able to carry the South with them in any Negro program. Thus a majority of the democratic senators and republicans voted so that the South smashed the F.E.P.C, held on th the poll tax, bitterly attacked labor, seized federal employment offices and refused to raise minimum wage. Only in a couple of major appointments did the Roosevelt policy survive.

The South did this of course by the aid of republicans, as well as Northern democrats. The repbulican party today is, as in the day of Hanna and McKinley, preeminently the party which represents the Large corporations and big business. It opposes labor unions as far as it dares and it is back of the capitalists now investing huge sums in Southern industry. The reactionary wing of these republicans has openly allied itself with the South--seven republican senators and 31 representatives voting against poll tax abolition and the FEPC The liberal Northern republicans while avoiding Southern dictation are not prepared to go far with the Negro: Like Dewey of New York they put through an FEPC for the state, but only after delay and postponement, and hard pressure from m nority groups.

The progressives who theoretically might here step into the breach and lead a third party movement, are divided in two by professed fear of the communists, but in reality they are confused because so many of the objects of the communists must logically be their own objects: Like abolition of poverty: control of corporate wealth: more equitable distribution of income: and Planned industrial economy, with Communists they must oppose the myth of a self-regulating world market or even national market; they must fight high finance and restoration of the gold standard, and refuse to regard land or labor as commudities.

But wehn Progressives find themselves st nding on the same platform with Communists in these matters, many of them incontinently desert their guns for fear that if they agree with Communists, in any thing they will be accused of accepting the complete Communist Dogma. No such fear restrains them when they are found to be fellow-travellors with republicans in support of the United Nations but not in war with Russia, or with Democrats in ~~raf~~ relief, but not in inciting Civil War in Poland or Greece.

Thus the progressive and liberal sentiment in this Nation, which might easily have been Marshalled behind a man like Henry Wallace has been deliberately led to neutralize itself and dissipate its time and energy in internal strife and witch-hunting, leaving the field open to small town Missouri politicians and fascist-minded industrialists. But the tragedy does not end there: even if the liberal elements of the nation were intelligently united, a third party could not win, as all students of national politics should know. The exaggerated political power of the South precludes ~~the~~ this, and this power is not perpetuated by sectional hate nor Civil War memories, but by present urge to economic power and private profit. It is at bottom not a political but an economic phenomenon.

Let us examine the facts: If we take the census of 1940, and the vote cast in 1946 for congressmen, we have a fair picture of how democracy is working in America. The picture is not accurate because the census figures are 6 years earlier than the vote; but this fact reduces rather than exaggerates the discrepancies.

The total voting population of the United States (i.e. citizens 21 years of age and over in 1940) was 80 million; of this number, 43% or 34½ million voted in 1946. This percent varied: in Minnesota 73% voted; in Illinois 64%; in New York 50.4%, in Kansas 48%. But in the South, only 17 % voted. Or to put it another way in the South over 83% of the potential voting population was disfranchised in 1946; either deliberately or by physical disability, illiteracy, poll tax non-payment, or carelessness! Is this democracy? Is that what we are exporting to Greece, Poland , or Turkey?

The voting record of the nation as a whole is bad: But that of the South is disgraceful and threatining.

(Charts)

In ~~mrk~~ other words, while we are trying to carry on the government of the United States by democratic methods, we are not succeeding because of the premium which we put on the disfranchisement of voters, especially in the South. Voters allow themselves to be disfranchised all over the land, in the West and North. But in the South, the disfranchisement is in the main deliberate and based on the planned disfranchisement of the Negro and poor white. Yet on the political power of this disfranchised vote, the rulers of the nation are chosen and the policy determined.

36-7-8

Who is interested in this disfranchisement, and who gains power by it? It must be remembered that the characteristic of our age is the growth of industry, especially in processing, manufacturing and transport. The control of this industrail organization is increasing in the hands of huge corporations, and even international cartels. In these industries the control was formerly in the hands of one man or a few parteners, who owned materials, machines and product, and hired labor. The laborers as such had no vioce in the object or conduct of the business and but small voice in in wages paid or conditions of work. The rise of Democracy in the 19th century, gave the worker some power in choosing officials of government, who exercised some control over industry, but secured little voice in the conduct of industry, until the so-called labor movement arose about the middle of the century. The Labor movement meant the intrusion of Democratic methods into the conduct of industry and was bitterly fought but this movement has spread until today it is widely recognized that the workers have at least the right to bargain with the owners as to wages and conditions of work, and to strike if they are dissatisfied. It was the great service of Franklin Roosevelt to bring the government of the United States into wide acceptance of this industrial democracy.

For this he incurred the bitterest opposition particularly from the forces of monopoly who opposed labor organization and collective bargaining, and who are still fighting.

Let all men remember today that the ~~fi~~ fiercest and most successful fight against democracy in industry is centering in the South; in just that region where ~~mediae~~ mediaeval caste conditions based mainly on color and partly on poverty and ignorance are more prevalent and most successful. And just because the labor is so completely deprived of political and industrial power in the South, investors and monopolists are today being attracted there in greater number and more intensive organization than anywhere else in the United States.

Climate attracts industry to the South , but not simply climate. There is sunshine, outdoor life, the ease of home-gardening; the smaller need of clothes or shoes; but more import nt than these to industry is the fact that the laborer on this account can live on less, laborers have been so used to lower standards that they reluctantly demand more. This leads to early marriage, a large birth-rate and fear for security for old age. There is thus in the South a reservoir of labor, more laborers than jobs and competing groups eager for the jobs. Industry encourages the culture-patterns which make then hate and fear each other. Company towns arise with control over education and religion. Machines like the cotton picker displace thousands and increase the demandfor jobs at any wages, and these laborers for the most part have few unions and cast few votes, for what is there to vote about?

Dominant Characteristics of the South's labor force as summarized by the United States Government economists are:

1. Greatest potential rate of labor force growth in nation.

2. Relatively large proportion of non-white workers.

3. Predominance of rural workers

4. Greater working-year-span: Southern ~~xxx~~ workmen take jobs earlier in life, retire later. (6-60)

5. Relatively fewer women in industrial empolyment.

Specifically, Business Week, reports that Southern industrialization has increased faster than the national average. In 1880 the South had less than 8% of total national manufacturing population: in 1939 it had 17.2% of total or 1,362,027 manufacturing wage earners.

Texas, for instance, bids fair to become a center of the chemical industry. It has petroleum, natural Gas, potash, sulphur, limestone, salt, cotton and ~~xxxx~~ pulp timber in large quantities. Thus it has all the materials for exploiting the latest

Steps Toward a Science of How Men Act

1. The only direct knowledge we have of what is true in this world is knowledge of our own emotions or feelings. In fact before the Cartesian "I think, therefore, I am", should stand "I feel, therefore, I am".

2. Feeling is the primary and the only direct knowledge of Truth which mankind has. Pleasant feelings are what we call pleasure or joy, and unpleasant ones what we call pain. We also know that we think about our emotions; but we cannot be certain of the relation of Thought and Emotion: are they one or separate? In other words, how far is thinking part of emotion or how far is it an aura accompanying it? Or is it a force that plans and guides? As our feelings change; as pleasure is succeeded by pain or pain by pleasure, there usually comes a sense of Effort, of deliberate application of force to change things.

3. But here we have no such direct knowledge as we have in feeling. If thinking is a sort of emotion, it is a differentiated sort, and all we can say is that this thinking seems to be done by an entity which we call the Self; and it seems to have some control of force. But this is assumption, not direct knowledge.

4. We have then one source of direct knowledge: feeling, accompanied often by thought and a sense of effort to change feelings and guide action; and this action has to do with our own bodies, the thoughts of others and the outside world.

But what is this Self and its Body? and what are other selves and what is the Outside World? Of all these things again, we have no direct knowledge. We have usually a sense that our thoughts belong to us, to an Ego, which seems to us unified and eternal; but naturally we cannot know it, except indirectly through our feeling. We attribute our thinking to it. But Thought after all can have no provable unity or single source.

We assume quite naturally that as we feel and think and act so other people do the same the world over and have for long ages of time. And that they act in an Outside World.

5. Yet of this outer world; of everything except our own emotions there is and probably never can be any direct knowledge. Everything concerning that outer world must be assumption upon our part. But it is natural assumption and for the most part makes our feelings and thoughts seem reasonable: the existence of other people is a perfectly natural assumption, but it cannot be directly perceived; it must be inferred from our emotions and thoughts.

No sooner than one realizes this, than there comes the Shadow of Doubt; if we cannot know, if we cannot prove even an outer world, how can we be sure of anything? Are we not left helpless wanderers in an unknown world of black Fear and Frustfation.

6. No. What cannot be proven may yet exist; may be real and usable and capable of being known at least in part and sufficiently for our education and progress. We assume the existence of an outer world. We know, of course, that in this assumption and other assumptions about people and things there are contradictions which we cannot resolve: What is the Self? How can there be a difference between selves? What is the real substance of this outer world? and so on to endless puzzling questions.

Nevertheless what we do in practice is to assume that these conceptions are true and this assumption is the Hypothesis upon which we base all knowledge and all science. In so far as the Hypothesis of what is true works, it is what we call True; if it does not work in any particular we have got to change our concept in accordance with the new found facts.

7. The doubt, the paradox of the possibility of knowledge beyond our own feeling and thought, remains forever. Everything may be fanastic mirage, beyond what we now feel. But the very statement of this is contradictory, since I must assume that you exist; and whatever your emotion is, you assume that I also feel; and our assumptions in the main work, they click, they correspond with our thinking. It is possible to go so far in this search for reality that language that tool of thought, fails us; its words lose and shift meaning and we fail in logic and precision.

8. Here the great scientific tool of the Hypothesis is discovered; we assume that certain things are true; we act as though this assumption is Truth. The ensuing facts of our experience arrange themselves in accord with our assumption. Therefore our assumption is True; or the facts agree except in certain particulars; we rearrange our assumptions to fit the new experience or more fully to explain the old. The new Hypothesis becomes accepted Truth. But all Truth, save our own feeling, we hold tentatively and watchfully, ready to change our conception, once a new explanation or phenomena fits the facts more perfectly.

To illustrate this abstract statement: we look out from our window and see a flat world with curving dome of heaven; ergo, the world is flat and the sky bends above it. That is obvious truth. But on a voyage to Europe, we see an approaching ship "rise" from the ocean; we descry its smoke, then its funnels, then its hull; manifestly the earth curves too; it is not flat. The ship is coming up over a vast curving surface. We alter our concept of the shape of the Earth. It is not flat. Often we do not surrender our conception of what is true. We refuse to face the newly discovered facts. We declare that they are false and we will not allow persons to talk about them or advocate them. Why do we do this? It is because of fear. We fear the ghosts of our fathers. These fathers said this and we always follow what they said. What they said must be true - we dare not alter it, even if we know it is false. Or again we fear for the future of our children. We are asked by these children to tell them what is true; can we dare tell them that we do not know? That we think that this or that is true, but that is possible that we are misled? That we can only be certain as we continue to search for facts and as those facts confirm what we have called the truth?

Soon, because of this fear and care for our children, the system of education becomes dogma it becomes absolute assertion of perfect knowlege, of eternal truth. This is of course plain contradiction of the facts. Yet we enforce our assertion by sanctions: we burn and kill. We ostracize and condemn. We almost appear at times to be afraid of the Truth. Yet slowly but surely, the scientific spirit prevails. And it prevails particularly regard to the outer world. Because of our discovery of Law, in the outer world, in our search for facts; tremendous and compelling law, like the law of gravitation; the laws of the combination of chemical elements; laws of force and reaction in physics. To study particularly in the outher world, of its phenomena, and the rhythm of its changes, we have ventured to turn because of the Industrial Revolution of the nineteenth century.

THE PROBLEMS OF THE HIGH SCHOOL AND THE JUNIOR COLLEGE

By
W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

I know of no more difficult problem than that which the High School and Junior College face. Whether it is North or South and whether it has to do with white or black students.

The raw material which comes to such institution is a mass of human beings who are passing through a critical time in their lives; in their physical lives, in their mental training, in their spiritual outlook. In some countries, Germany particularly before the Two World Wars, the student at this time of his education was put in what was called the "Gymnasium." This was a course of study which covered the last two years of the High School and the first tow years of college. During that time he was under strict and careful discipline. His whole life in school or out was under the eye and control of his teachers and the requirements were rigorous; the course difficult; after that when he went into what was called the University, he was given full freedom of choice with few rules as to conduct or study. It was assumed that by that time he was a full grown human being able to guide himself.

We have not yet come to that concentration of study and method of teaching in the United States. Perhaps we never will. But we must look with care upon the kind of student who comes into the high school and junior college. In the first place, we are living in a day when family controls are weakened. When the influence which the parents have over their children is far less than in former generations, so that the experience of the past is handed on with more difficulty. There are broken families; there is the peculiar phenomena of a rising group: That is, of the family whose children are trying to occupy a higher social position than their parents occupied. This means that they despise not only the disadvantages which their parents had, but also the experience and wisdom which their parents accumulated. They make of their own accord experiments, ventures, which the whole history of mank nd show have been dangerous and will continue to be dangerous. For instance:

The drinking of alcohol is dangerous to the yound and one of the causes of the death 60,000 persons a year from Tuberculosis. Because of this danger the German High School student was not permitted to drink. Sleep is absolutely essential to the young. In high school I went to bed at ten and arose at seven. In college no ball or party lasted after midnight. Today among us boys and girls drink and seldom go to bed before midnight.

First comes the problem of what students should study. WhenI was in high school there was a choice between two courses: one course led to college; the other course was for those who must go to work. The matter of going to college was settled very largely, although not entirely, by the financial position of the parents. This made the choice of studies comparatively simple. If one went to college, one must study latin, greek and mathematics with a little english and science. If he was not going to college, the latin and greek were left out.

Today the curriculum in both high schools and colleges is more flexible. This is supposed to give students wider choice according to their wishes and the objects for which they are studying. But as a matter of fact, it makes the choosing of courses for students in high school and college exceedingly complicated. First of all, and especially among us, it is only a few of the parents who are capable of making the choice for the student. And so far as the student himself is concerned, in nine cases out of ten he has not the slightest idea of what the different courses mean and where they will land him and what kind of education they will give him. We should therefore, first put before him a general idea of what education can and must do, and this is what I want to bring to your attention now.

There face the young student, first and foremost, two problems: that of knowing what the world is; and secondly that of earning a living. These are not the same thing and we must not pretend that they are: A man may know a great deal and not be able to earn a living; he may earn a good living and be ignorant. What we want is both knowledge and ability to earn a living and this is difficult to teach in one school. There is no question but that if civilization continues and if we as American Negroes are going to raise ourselves so as to take part in it, we must know what the world is. How is it made? What are the laws of its development? In order to know these things, the student must first of all, be able to read and write well and for a large number of students in college this is not a afct because of their poor elementary training.

Knowing how to read and write the student must learn the history of the world and of the various countries which compose it; He must know what men have thought of the world what they have done. This he learns through literature of all sorts: Essays, bibgraphys, letter, plays and novels. He must study what is in general, called science: that is, the systematic knowledge which we have of the forces in this world and how they develop under various laws; like that of gravity, of atomic weights, and of geological ages.

In order to follow straight reasoning, he must know mathematics: How to add, substract and divide; how to use symbols as in algebra, how to compare line and direction as in geometry; and how to think in abstract conceptions of quantity, as in higher mathmatics. The path thus laid out is long. A man could spend not only the whole of his life but many lives trying to master the immense accumulation of knowledge which today is the possession of the world. This only a few can attempt. But something of the knowledge of the world, everybody who lives in it successfully, must have.

Facing this is the problem of earning a living. If men will live they must work. There can be no life without effort, and what we call "Earning a living" is learning what efforts best and most economically bring us food, clothing and shelter. Moreover, men do not work separately and alone each for his own living. They strive together in groups and this mutual cooperation must be carefully and continuously learned.

The work of the world is exceedingly complicated. Some parts of it require long training and experience. Here again a man might spend his whole life in mastering certain intricate trades and problems of technique in engineering. Educating a child calls for sacrifice on the part of parents; or for his own hard exertions. He seeks to prepare himself for earning a better living than his father earned. So that the matter of earning a living is important. Beyond that there is the whole question of attitude toward work whether work is merely a method of earning a living or whether in itself, it is of importance.

Beyond all that, is the fact that this young man or young woman is a citizen of a state and has certain duties andprivileges inherentto that status of citizenship. There has been an attempt in the past to try to make it appear as though all these objects: Knowing theworld, earning a living, taking the right attitude toward work and becoming a citizen--That all thiscould easily be achieved in one course of study taken by any person for a limited time. This is of course tragically untrue.

There are differences and wide differences in value andpurpose between different lines of academic work. First of all, foremost and more fundamental than others must come this matter of knowing. If we were living in an ideal world where there was plenty of time to prepare a young person for life, wewould spend a alarger part of the high school and college curriculum in teaching that knowledge of the world which we call science, that which we know as history and social studies; that which we class as art and literature. We would do this because it is fundamental that before we attempt to play our part in the world, we should know what the world is. We know quite well that the greatest difficulty with human beings today is their ignorance. Their ignorance of thephysical facts ans laws of life, of the natural history of the earth and in addition to that, of knowledge of what the world is today, what kind of people are in it, and what the past has been.

The past, especially is of importance because the number of people who are now dead is infinitely greater than those who are living. There is not a single problem of those living which has not been faced in some way by people long dead who have left record of what their experience was and what their efforts at living resulted in. If we could teach all this then we would start the young man in his career of lining with a rounded knowledge of what life is and what the world means.

After that would come the problem as to what part ~~of~~ he is going to take in the world in order, on the one hand, to earn a living and on the other hand, to develop himself as a human being so as to satisfy his aspirations and wishes.

This is not a perfect world. We cannot know all or do all. We must choose some part of the vast treasure of knowledge and try to do well some part of the world's work. Thus education like life must be a compromise and in choosing what you will know and what you will do, you need advice of the highest quality. The number of people who can spare the time while in school for knowledge of life is comparatively small. Therefore at the very beginning of a high school course a student is faced with a choice of taking a course of general knowledge including science, history, mathematics and literature; or of taking some particular courses which will help him to earn a living. If he takes the first sort of course, it does not mean that later he will not have to earn a living, but it dees mean that he will start at earning that living as a better educated man; as a man who knows somethign about the world and its laws; about the thought and experience of the vast majority of people who have lived and died.

If, on the other hand, he devotes his time in high school and college largely to vocational courses; it means that most of his time is going to be taken in learning the techniques of industry. They are important, some of them must be learned sometime. But if they compose the bulk of his school course, it means that the student isgoing into life essentially as an ignorant man; that he will not know the world in which he is going to work as a farmer, a carpenter, a cook or a typist. Farming, building, and preparing food and writing are of first class importance but they are not in themselves knowledge, as I have said, he is going into the world as an ignorant worker. Of course it may happen that after high school and college; after he has learned his trade he may, if he can and will--read, ~~if will~~ if he will listen to the lectures andto some of the information that comes on the radio; if he will travel and observe human beings, he can eventually learn much of that knowledge which he did not have a chance to accumulate in college. But sooner or later in the school or out that knowledge must be learned, if we are not to have the world's work attempted by people who are ignorant.

On the other hand, even if the student takes the course which leads to a broader knowledge of theworld, he can only do a small part of this in school. He will make a great mistake if he thinks his education is finished with commemcement either the high school commencement or the junior college or thecollege commencement. He may be able to read and write; he may have some small knowledge of the world and its laws gotten from thin text books, but in general his real mastery of knowledge of this world will still be lamentably small.

At any rate there must be no slurring over of the real decision that the student must make. No student can, at one and the same time, learn to earn a living and learn knowledge of the world. He has gotto make decision as to which object he is going to devote the major part of his high school and college course. Usually today we do not divide these two kinds of high school curricula absolutely . The course wich teaches science, mathematics, languages and literature has some vocational studies, and the vocational course of study teaches some knowledge of the world.

It is a mistake however to think that there can be a complete marger of these two lines of study which have different objects. If you are goingto sutudy science and literature, you cannot learn at the same time to be a carpenter; if you are going to learn how to cook, you will not have time to learn enough ~~xxxxxxx~~ physics to understand the Atom Bomb.

Usually the student even in vocational courses devotes some part of his time to this world knowledge. But the major part of his time has to be given to that part of knowledge which will enable him to earn a living. And that brings further problems. Sometimes a person can learn to earn a living in certain ways in the high school; he may be able to take carpentry or study the building trades. She may be able to study sewing and cooking. However, for the most part these so-called vocational courses are not and cannot be well or thoroughly given in a high school. They are more or less tentative. They try to give you an idea of the work involved rather than real knowledge.

The real knowledge of how a living is earned through a trade or a vocation, must eventually be learned in the trade itself which the person enters as an assistant or an apprentice. There again, the Germans developed the apprentice idea to a high degree. Their system of apprenticing young men in the electircal idusutry and many similar lines of work was czrerully thought-out; so that boys of twleve after learning to read, write and cipher entered the factory directly, were paid regularly and continued their study as apprentices to the trade, doing the actual work of the trade, but doing it under careful supervision and guidance and earning as they worked. Devoting sometime to general knowledge, there is something of that sort of development in the United States, but not very much, and very little among American Negroes in their training for life.

Unless therefore much care is exercised, the knowledge of the world which the student gets ins school is limited by his attempts to learn how to earn a living and the study of vocational work is poorly done because of the absence of tooiss and machines and limitations of time. Moreover there is apt to be great contradiction in methods, in the way in which the studies are carried out betseen these two sorts of training. There is apt to be a certain difference of attitude. Sometimes the vocational student looks down upon those who are studying science and lieterature, with the more or less clearly conceived idea that they are not studying the real world in the way that counts; and more often on the other side there is the idea that those who are studying science; history, and art are a superior kind of person to those who are studying cooking and sewing and mechanics.

As a matter of fact as I have tried to point out, the things that these people are doing are quite different but both of them are of great importance. There is no logical reason, whoever, why men should seek to combine them in the same course. Each would be bettwr carried out if they were separately purusued and certainly it should be made clear to the students, and be clear in the teacher's mind the diffeertnt objects are which are in view. In one case the object is know ing what the world is in which we live; in the ot er case, knowing what a man can do in order to earn a w e in this world . In addition to this there comes at the very beginning of the student's life a mental confusion because of the lack of clearness as to the meaning of work and wage. People groe up assuming that work is for the wage earned and not for the service rendered. They think that the wages are an expression of the work.

In truth work and wage have nothing logically to do with each other. A person works because this is a world where a certain amount of work must be done by everyone, otherwise we will not have enough to eat and drink; we will not be clot ed and sheltered and protected. The full result of the work is divided among the people of the world, but it is not and cannot be divided according to what each person does. People do not work individually and separately and the results of work belong to no one man. It is not today as it might have been ten thousand years ago when the individual himself prepared and raised his own food and made his clothes and built his own house.

Even that situation is theoretical. Probably there never was a x time when any considerable number of prople worked in that way. They worked together for a common cause and received out of the result of the work, what they needed or what the group thought they ought to have. The object of work is production and service and this is accomplished if the work is well done, if it serves its ultimate object. On the other hand, what the man receives as a wage, is a social gift; it is what he himself the group and the world think he ought to enjoy for his own survival, to satisfy his own wants. Some connection, there must be, of course, between work and wage, but no absolute mechanical connection. The attitude toward work then is not simply an attitude toward income. It is or should be an attitude toward accomplishment; an attitude toward the spiritual return which one gets through exercise of his knowledge and ability; of his muscular strength and mental genius. On the other hand, it happens and too often, that although a man does excellent work, the income which he gets is small and inadequate for his support. But there again you have an ethical and social problem, which is not in itself a problem of work, but a problem of human attitudes; of people's regard for each other.

Then too in this knowledge of the world which we must have, whether we get it in school or afterwards, we have got to have more than simple knowledge; we have got to go further than that. Every human being by the time he is fifty, ought to be a scholar; not in all lines but in some line of knowledge he ought to have complete and far-reaching understanding: A knowledge of such kind that he becomes, in that particular field, an authority. And he is interested in it because of the attraction which it has for him and the satisfaction which knowledge gives him. This is the realm of scholarship and art.

Beyond this comes the duty of men and women as citizens. A citizen is more or less, a part of an intricate system of control which begins with the family, extands to various organizations like the c urch, the lodge, the club and then further into the government: the ward, the city, the county, the state, the United States.

As American Negroes we have been handicapped in our development for taking part in this system of social control. I have said that the family organization, not simply among us but among all the proples of the modern world, has been rapidly and disastrously changing in the last few generations,, so that the family today is not the closed group for education work, religion, and social guidance that it used to be. These functions have gone to other organizations. It does not mean that the functions have disappeared; it is still necessary that the child sho ld be taught that he must restrain his actions for the public good; that his independence must ve curtainled so that others may also act and not be hurt; that laws and rules must be made not only for guiding his pleasures and satisfactions but for guiding the state and making political life serve the people of the Nation.

Just because the things which the family used to do, have been dispersed among social agencies, it is not alwys clear as to just what agency is guiding and controlling the individual. The school is compelled bery often, to exercise functions which really ought to belong to parents and brothers and sisters. The police take over the guidance of recreation, when this should be done by persons trained for this end; and that state often actually discourages it citizens from learning methods of its own political life, instead of giving them the training and experience which they sorely need.

Particularly in the case of American Negroes, for generations since emancipation they have had it dinned in their ears that politics, that is, taking part in the governing of the nation, is not altogether a sensible or respectable vocation. Recently we are beginning to change our minds; we are beginning to see that a disfranc ised people is not simply a people deprived of something which they can enjoy but they are depriving the nation of forces which the nation needs and cannot function without.

It is impossible that fourteen million American citizens should be deprived of a voice in American government, and still have that government able and functioning by Democratic processes. So that toda the high school and college has to add to its many burdens, the duty of insisting on the fact that students are citizens and will be voters; and for this reason should know what a Governmental processes are control ed. They should especially have a clear conception of what democracy is. They sho ld know that democracy is not simply a privilege; a way of getting one's own ideas over; but on the contrary, it is a method of sharing in the experience and the opinions of others, so that out of this combined pool of knowledge, invaluable as it is, we can come to those conclusions which are for the best interests of the mass of men. This means something more than simply voting; it means voting with intelligence, with knowledge, with realization of what the country has been before; what mistakes the lawmakers and administrators have made; and what it is possible to do by intelligent use of the ballot.

All this, I am sure, emphasizes in your minds the peculiarly complicated and contradictory character of the high school and junior college curriculum today. It needs simplification, more careful arrangement of object and effort and in that rearrangement of emphasis, certain things must be clear: First: The student must be able to read and write and count. He should not be allowed to proceed on his course until that is clearly established. Entering the high school with this ability, and continuing in college, he should be certain that his first and fundamental duty is knowledge of the world, natural forces, science, history and social development.

Then afterwards, and as far afterward as possible there should be taken up the question of earning a living. This can if it must be begun in high school in courses running parallel to the knowledge curriculum probably it can be done most efficiently in a separate school; the school should keep this clearly in mind. It should not try to tell a student that he can be can be prepared sufficiently for earning a living in a school. In the long run, and usually, the best place to learn how to earn a living is by actual work in a factory, in a house, in the field.

But it is quite possible that the beginnng of this practical training can be made in school. Certainly the school can emphasize the attitude which the student should have toward: Thinking of work as a social accomplishment and as a measure not simply by the wages which it earns. There should always be emphasis on scholarship both in the courses which make for knowledge and in the knowledge which comes through technical accomplishment and professional training. Above all, no student of a high school or college should finish without having impressed upon him the importance and value of his citizenship in making him a part of a great modern state which in the long run insures to its citizens the kind of life which human beings ought to live.

THE PROBLEM OF A THIRD PARTY IN 1948

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

It seems to me that Henry Wallace, Fiorello La Guardia and Adolf Berle are all curiously unrealistic when they argue about the possibility of a third party in the next presidential election. They all omit to mention the influence of widespread and continued disfranchisement in the South, particularly the disfranchisement of American Negroes.

They do not seem to see the implications of this disfranchisement. There are six states in the United States: Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina, with ~~fifty~~ fifty-nine electoral votes, which have never once since Reconstruction voted anything but the straight Democratic ticket. With continued exclusion of Negroes, they will continue so to cast their vote.

In addition to this there are four states: Florida, North Carolina, Texas and Virginia, with fifty-six electoral votes which have never failed to vote the Democratic ticket, except under the influence of intense anti-Catholic hysteria in 1928. There are two other states, Oklahoma and Kentucky, with twenty-one electoral votes, which on a few occasions have voted Republican. Both went Republican in 1928 on the Catholic issue. Both went Republican in 1920 on economic issues and Kentucky in 1896 split its vote on the Free Silver issue. But for twenty years these ~~three~~ two states have not failed to vote democratic in presidential elections and can in all probability be counted in the democratic column as long as the present system of disfranchisement prevails.

This means that in 1948, of the five hundred and thirty-one electoral votes which will be cast for president, 136 can be almost certainly counted for the Democr tic ticket; and that in all probability, this will happen, no matter who is nominated, no matter what the foreign or domestic political questions in dispute are, or what the economic situation may be. ~~The 18 electoral votes of Tennessee are almost as~~

In addition to this, no Third Party advocating re-birth of the New Deal, socialization of economic power and friendship with Russia, can hope in 1948 to carry Missouri, Tenneessee and West Virginia, ~~who tipify~~ which typify not only manipulation of the Negro vote, but powerful monopoly of capitalistic power,. These 35 votes can, judging by recent elections, be added then to the handicap of 136, making 171 votes practicallly certain for reaction, or 32%. The Third Party must therefore to succeed carry two-thirds of the 531 electoral votes of the nation.

The number of persons of vating age who do not vote in the United States is large. This is due partly to indifference; women particularly are not used to exercising the right to vote in large numbers. In addition to this, there is a dangerously large number of American citizens who have lost faith in voting as a means of social reform. To these must be added the incompetent and those who for various reasons cannot reach the polls. This explains why only 43% of the population of voting age actually voted in I946. Notwithstanding all this, in New England, the Middle Atlantic States and the Middle and Far West about I00,000 voters usually go to the polls to elect a congres man; in the more sparsly settled mountain states, this falls to 90,000. But where the Negro lives in the Border states les than 50,000 vote to elect a congressman, while in the deep South men are sent to Congress by only 22,000 votes cast; and in South Carolina by an average of 4,000 total votes.

This record of the South shows something more than indifference, incompetence and discouragement. We see here the result of deliberate efforts not only to disfranchise the Negro but to discourage large numbers of whites from voting. In the South as a whole, eighty-two per cent of the persons of voting age did not vote in I946 and in the west south central states this percentage reached nearly eighty-six per Tables follow which show the respective votes in three pairs of states where the same number of members of Congress were elected but the difference in number of votes cast is enormous. In the second table the number of votes cast for a single Congressman is contrasted for a series of states, showing a hundred and thirty-eight thousand votes cast to elect a Congressman from Illinois and four thousand votes to elect a Congressman in South Carolina.

[Some or all of these figures may be omitted]

In other words while this nation is trying to carry on the government of the United States by democratic methods it is not succeeding because of the premium which we put on the disfranchisement of the voters of the South. The number of congressmen is determined by the total population of a state. The larger the number of that population which is disfranchised the greater the power for the few who cast the vote. Thus the political power of this disfranchised vote the rulers of this nation are chosen and policies of the country determined.

Not only this but who is interested in this disfranchisement and who gains power by it? It must be remembered that the South is the nation's number one "economic problem" as the late President Roosevelt declared. It has the largest percentage of ignorance, of poverty, of disease, in the nation. At the same time, and partly on account of this, it is the place where the labor movement has made the least progress; there are fewer unions and the unions are less effectively organized than in the North. Besides this, the fiercest and most successful fight against democracy in industry is centering in the South, in just that region where medieval caste conditions based mainly on color, and partly on poverty and ignorance, are more prevalent and most successful. And just because labor is so completely deprived of political and industrial power, investors and monopolists are today being attracted there in greater number and with more intensive organization than anywhere else in the United States. As one national Republican committeeman from Illinois declared "The Southern states can block any amendment to the United States Constitution and nullify the desires of double their total of northern and western states."

All this means that any third party in a presidential election must start out with a handicap of ~~149~~ 171 votes. They can make their appeal only to the balance of ~~382~~ 361 votes. It will not do to carry even a majority of these votes, they must carry ~~over~~ two thirds of these votes. ~~Indeed, if they win, they must poll seventy per cent.~~

This is the real reason why there is small chance for a third party in the United States, until the question of the disfranchisement of the Negro in the South is frankly faced. To be sure, with a Franklin Roosevelt, not only can a third party with a distinct socialistic program sweep the North, but even in the South all but the Bourbon die-hards could be forced to stand behind the program. But this was exceptional. Today we face the fact that the Solid South is about to fasten reaction on the nation.

To avoid facing this situation spells disaster. It means that if the free vote of the United States divides evenly or with a small majority for liberalism, Southern fascism with 149 certain votes will gain the presidency, control congressional committees and make our laws. Southerners like Cox of Georgia, Smith of Virginia, Ellender of Louisiana and the impossible Rankin of Mississippi, will dominate Congress. The only other result of a third party movement would be to put into power, Northern predatory industry led by men like Taft and Wherry. The National Association of Manufacturers and the Military will proceed to regiment youth, curtail the rights of labor and drive liberals under cover.

Most students of American politics know this, but they hesitate to take any steps, because of the alleged insolubility of the Negro problem. This is all nonsense. Solution to be sure cannot be found in one campaign or by one law; but the difficulties can be settled. The decision of the Supreme Court in the White Primary cases can be gradually enforced. The vague precedent in the Bilbo case can be carried into definite action, so as to exclude from Congress persons elected by intimidation, bribery or discrimination; and above all the people of the South can be educated out of their present stupidity and witchcraft, so as to set them on the path to eliminate poverty, disease and crime.

National aid for education as an emergency stands even above the need of aid for health and old age security. It can be given by the federal government with the distinct and unequivocal provision that the money is to be spent without discrimination as to race, creed or color. We can reduce the illiteracy of the South among both Negroes and whites to a neglible figure in a generation, if we want to, as Russia and Scandinavia have taught us.

When we have an intelligent voting population in the South and federal law and administration which stands back of the right to vote, then we can turn to our main problem of democracy in the United States and found and bring to triumph a Third Party to replace the two rotten organizations which today stand for the same sort of exploitation, profiteering and fascism.

A SERMON FOR THE CHURCHMAN

By W. E. B. Du Bois

Back of all our discussion of present problems, of war and communism; of wages, prices and housing; of political power and law and order, stands one pressing question which we fear to touch; and that is the ethics of property, wealth and income. How far it is right or wrong for us to receive the income which we are receiving or to support the methods by which wealth today is accumulated and distributed.

35-2-454

Most of the time most of the effort and thought of most human beings is given to earning a living. There for the facts surrounding this activity must be of primary importance in determining our culture, our religion and our life. No amount of refusal to face these problems of wealth and poverty is going to avail. We have got to face them. We have got to begin to ask: Can money be "tainted?" Are profits always right? Is income a matter of natural law or of human decision? Or to put the question that confronts us more in detail: Is property merely a question of Law, or is it primarily a question of Right and Wrong?

Is a man's income his personal secret or is it rightfully a matter of public knowledge?

Is the object of industry private profit or public welfare?

Should the production of goods be a matter of free enterprise or of public planning?

Should the State permit private ownership of natural resourses?

Should natural monopolies like transportation, communication, water power, electricity and atomic energy be under State control or in the hands of private companies?

Is it right for a man to spend what he does not earn?

If wealth and property have been gained by slavery, murder, cheating or fraud, is its legal owner free to use it as he will without inquiry or personal guilt?

Is the function of banking and credit a public or private matter?

Is poverty necessary and should anyone own more wealth or receive more income than he can use for his legitimate personal needs?

If democracy in political action is right and proper, why is not democracy right and proper in work and wage?

We started in early days with a suspicion of wealth; ~~Christianity~~ Sears have declared that the love of money was the root of all evil. Jesus Christ doubted if rich men could get into Heaven. We had during the days of early Christianity a glorification of poverty as such; a high and holy regard for those persons who measured themselves and the rightness of their action, not by the income which they received, but rather by the sort of people that they were.

Then with the spread of slave-grown products and the increase of our power over nature and technical machinery and trade with less powerful peoples we began to talk about Thrift as opposed to Laziness and Work as contrasted with Ease. We began to rationalize our treatment of laborers and heathen by declaring that men must work or starve. We glorified property, savings, and income and despised the poor, and before we knew it we had made Greed our God. We began to excuse cruelty and dishonesty. We celebrated the ruthlessness that built up great income on the basis of monopoly of natural resources.

We used physical force to get hold of wealth and sources of wealth. We honored those people who got and controlled wealth no matter by what methods. We emerged into another era where we sold opinions, screened truth, and manufactured lies. We hired men to write what they did not believe.

We gave lying a place among excusable methods of sociable progress and called it propaganda; and finally in our day we permit such a monopoly of news-gathering and news-interpretation in papers and magazines which makes it almost impossible for an honest person to know what is the truth and to guide his action and his thought thereby.

Under this widening ignorance and misinformation, we see wealth and monopoly taking increasing charge of government. We see the legislatures of states and the congress of the United States under wide control of great aggregations of capital.

This gradual persistent descent into hell is known to everybody and yet when it is questioned, there comes an avalanche of bitter accusation which makes the man who stands up for truth, social reform and peace look like a conspirator and a scoundrel. This is the kind of civilization which not only kills culture but kills the human soul. It is not simply a question as to whether we are going to do this or that about our present plight, the fact is we have got to to something or lose our religion, our democracy, and our own self-respect. The accumulation, monopoly and present use of wealth is about to destroy the world through total war, and for decent men to sit still and silent under such circumstances is increasing indication that this is a world not worth saving.

Of the facts, there can be absolutely no question. The profits that have been made through World War is a sacrifice of blood and decency which would appall any people who realized what was going on; and at the same time the persistent poverty, ignorance, disease and distress in this world lingers among us, not because they cannot be eradicated, but because we will not undertake to stop them. The atom bomb could stop preventable disease, if the billions that we are spending upon it were not spent principally for murder and destruction. The money which we have spent upon two World Wars could make the mass of the world's people intelligent and reasonable beings instead of stupid victims. With the magnificent technique which the world has at its disposal today, there is no reason that there should be in the world people hungry, ignorant, unclothed and unsheltered. We know this, and yet despite it all we seem determined to use wealth for individual and family power, for vulgar display and for mass murder. Just as soon as any person dares challenge this situation, dares question the methods of wealth and industry, dares suggest that war is for selfish aggrandisement and not for defense, he is not answered, he is not faced with truth, he is simply shut up or put in jail, or slandered and made to suffer, not only in himself but in the case of his family and relatives and friends. We have today in the United States, thousands of people still in jail because they would not go to war. We have democracy in the United States stifled, by the use of money in elections, by the deliberate buying of votes, by the way in which law makers are coerced and the judiciary frightened.

We have seen in recent years fifty millions of dollars spent in a presidential campaign and we know that the power to rule this country today rests in the hands of less than a thousand individuals. We are being pushed, bulldozed and lied into war today by greedy men who see millions for murder and not one cent for the ignorant, diseased poor.

There is no need of our trying further to evade the issue, the question before the people of the United States and of the World today is that curbing of the power of wealth, the compulsory distribution of income in accordance with need and social plan, the vesting of natural resources in the ownership of the people, the practice of democracy in industry as well as government.

RIGHTS FOR NEGROES

by W.E.B. Du Bois

The recent prominence of the question of civil rights for Negroes in general discussion, court action, and political platforms, has brought the attention of the nation back to one of its oldest social problems; the place of the Negroes in our national life. The shape of this problem today differs so strikingly from that of a generation ago, that interest increases both as to its history, and as a study in social processes.

At the beginning of this century, it was widely asserted that Negroes and whites were congenitally so different that the two races could never live together in peace except under caste conditions; that, therefore, a rigid segregation of the races must forever be maintained whereever practical; that amalgamation must be made illegal; that crime, especially rape, was characteristic of Negroes and could only be curbed by lynching, which was going on at the rate of one victim a month in 1900. The Negro physique was weak and the race would probably die out under white competition. Social discrimination went so far that even a prize fighter need not accept a challenge from a Negro.

Today the change in national attitude is so fundamental that it calls for study of what has taken place and how it has been brought about. Manifestly, it involved hard, concentrated, and purposeful effort and was not merely undirected evolution, nor did it depend wholly on philanthropic gift nor on enacted law.

There have been working in the last generation four types of effort to solve the Negro Problem. First, have come the foundations; corporate efforts of rich and influential folk for social betterment; second, the so-called "interracial" efforts of whites; third, the organized efforts of Negroes; and finally, the influence of science.

It was at the closing exercises of one of the most successful of the foundations, the Rosenwald Fund, which concluded thirty years work in 1947, that the writer made a survey which covered a generation, and I, myself, was astonished at the results. Today few Americans question that Negroes have brains and ability, and are capable in individual cases of high achievement. Negro crime is judged not unexpectedly high; Negro disease is yielding to sanitation, and unless race segregation and discrimination yield to common-sense, democracy in the United States is impossible, and American world leadership fatally handicapped.

This fundamental change in public opinion has been the result of continued and tireless effort, without revolution or violence, but through appeal to human reason. The work for Negroes of the foundation began with the Capon Springs conferences and there then evolved the Southern Education Board, and finally, the General Education Board. The first attitudes were conservative, but the educability of the Negro was admitted. The General Education Board espoused Negro industrial education, until under young Southern leadership, a plan for Negro college education completely covering the South emerged in 1937.

The Rosenwald Fund, starting from Mr. Rosenwald's colored Y.M.C.A. homes, began to build Negro schoolhouses in the South and aid health projects. It encouraged Negro and white students in graduate study, and emphasized race relations efforts.

Organized efforts toward bettering race relations have been widespread in the United States. In 1919, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation was formed in the South. It had national offices in Atlanta, Georgia, and several branch offices. It published pamphlets and held conferences. The Southern Regional Council, formed in 1944, has taken over the work of the Commission. The Commission on Race Relations, of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, was organized in 1921. The Southern Conference for Human Welfare was started in 1939, and it has become a strong organization for civil rights, political action, and equalization of educational opportunity. The American Council on Race Relations, formed in 1944, has sought to federate many of the race relations activities in the nation.

Rachel Davis DuBois started a movement for interracial education which was later known as intercultural education. A Bureau for Intercultural Education was started in 1939. Local interracial movements are illustrated by the Springfield Plan, started in 1939, with a committee to teach democratic citizenship by the practice of democracy on all levels of school and community life.

It was the organization of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1910, which began the organized effort of Negroes themselves to fight for civil rights, and effort which has increased and widened for thirty-eight years and has spearheaded the struggle in the nation. This organization started with the Niagara Movement in 1906, when a handful of Negroes declared for a fight, without evasion or compromise, for the full manhood rights of Negroes as American citizens. Four years later this movement merged with a group of whites, led by Mary Ovington, William English Walling, Oswald Garrison Villard and Charles Edward Russell, to "finish the work of Abraham Lincoln" and make the American Negro "physically free from peonage; mentally free from ignorance; politically free from disfranchisement; and socially free from insult". This was a radical program for 1910, and it was regarded widely as so dangerous that it could hope for little support from the rich, and little countenance from the respectable.

From the beginning, while open to all and with a considerable white membership, this organization was predominantly Negro in membership, and directed primarily by Negro officials, and supported up to ninety per cent of its funds by poor Negro workers. In this respect it is one of the most unique of mass movements in the world.

Working contemporaneously with the NAACP have been other organizations without which it would have been impotent-- the Negro Church with its 35,000 congregations owning $175,000,000 in real estate and spending $28,000,000 a year, helped publicize and support the Association. The Negro Press, with at present nearly 150 weekly papers, grew to a circulation that reached every literate Negro and achieved a news coverage of interracial happenings that made Negroes independent of the white press for knowledge of the facts of their situation in America. Other organizations not simply supplemented the main work of the NAACP, but provided an outlet for those who could not go the radical way but wanted to help in some practical effort.

What now has been accomplished in the last generation? First we must note a general improvement in public opinion, not perhaps measurable in figures, but clear and decisive. The nation is no longer pessimestic on the Negro problem. Far from believing that the peaceful living together of black and white in America is impossible, we have come to conceive of a "One World" where all people must live together in equality or die. Science has attacked the concept of race itself and of inborn and ineradicable race differences, with devastating success. Many of the old cliches have disappeared. The changing of "human nature" is admitted to be possible and it is accepted that few prejudices are ineradicable. Law can help and hasten human change and intermarriage of persons of different races may be good, bad, or indifferent, depending mainly on the circumstances, which have nothing to do with race.

Many facts show the basis of this change in public opinion. The first edition of "Who's Who in America" did not, so far as I can find, list a single person of Negro descent; the fiftieth edition in 1948 had the names of 91. In American Men of Science are today the names of 77 Negroes. Negro health has improved. The expectation of life of a Negro male at birth was 32 years in 1900; in 1947 it was 57.

Negroes for a long time have been decreasing in illiteracy. Nine-tenths of them were illiterate at the time of Emancipation. According to the Census of 1940 it is ten per cent today; but the experience of the draft shows that today probably a fourth of the adult Negro population is by any thorough standard illiterate. Figures show us that in 1910, forty-five per cent of all Negroes from six to twenty-five years of age were in school, and in 1940, sixty-four per cent, or in round number in 1910, there were 1,600,000, and in 1940, the number was 4,188,000.

In 1900, Charles Dudley Warner said Negroes could not assimilate higher education. In 1910, not more than 5,000 Negroes were enrolled in college. In 1948, over 88,000 were enrolled. In 1918, 324 bachelors of arts received their degrees; in 1948, 5,635 received degrees. No white college in the North today refuses a student because he is a Negro, and 1,274 Negro students are enrolled in such institutions. There have been 279 Negroes who have received the Ph. D. from the chief northern colleges.

Much of this change rested on fundamental social and economic development. The Negro population of the United States increased from 9,000,000 to 13,000,000 between 1900 and 1940. In the South this increase was twenty-five per cent, while in the North and West the increase was two hundred per cent. The rural Negro population has remained stationary, but the urban population has increased three hundred and fifty per cent.

The way in which the Negro population earns a living has changed fundamentally. Unable to achieve freedom and social advance on the plantation, a million Negroes have left them. They have changed from domestic and personal service on the plantation and in the South, to similar but higher paid service in cities, and in the North. The Negro has entered industry, increasing his workers from 7 to 12 per cent, and he is rising slowly from unskilled to skilled labor. He is entering trade and business, first as cooperative self-service to hiw own people, then into general business increasing from five to eight per cent. Another third of all Negro workers have made their way into the professions, the arts, and numbers of miscellaneous occupations.

During these thirty years the number of ministers has greatly decreased, but with the result of weeding out the casual and untrained, and replacing them with men with larger professional training. The physicians and surgeons have increased a little; the number of nurses has doubled. The lawyers have increased considerably, the dentists proportionately more than the physicians, and the teachers have greatly increased.

A further method of estimating the change in race relations is to refer to the number of Negroes holding office, especially elective offices. There were in 1947 six members of city councils throughout the United States. There Against this general background of change, the NAACP began its phenomenal campaign, attacking race prejudice not by violence nor attempted violence. The NAACP has appealed to reason by writing, talking, investigation, and recourse to the courts. Its programme of fighting race discrimination looked hopeless at first from the multiplicity of the calls. But wisely, as early as 1911, it concentrated on lynching, that most barbarous manifestation of race hate in America.

It began investigation and publicity in 1910, but in 1919 it started a real campaign. In that year it communicated with 25 governors and seven Chambers of Commerce. It sent 32 stories to the press, and paid for page advertisements in daily papers throughout the country. Members of the staff made personal investigations of 12 lynchings on the spot, and race riots and in May a national conference was held in New York which sent out an address to the nation signed by an ex-president, the Attorney-General, seven governors, and a score of heads of universities.

In its anti-lynching campaign the NAACP did not work alone, nor does it deserve exclusive credit for the final success attained. But without doubt, the NAACP spearheaded the attack, dramatized it, revealed the facts and hammered them home. Without its intelligent leadership the work would not have triumphed as soon nor as fully. Southern white women, at no little risk in a sex conscious South, publicly fought lynching and denied that white women were chiefly engaged in outrunning "big, black brutes". Southern liberals who did not believe in the NAACP, began to attack lynching, until even in Lousiana a man could repudiate lynching and stand for "white supremacy". The result of this work reduced lynching in the land from one a month in 1900 to one a year in 1947. Figures for selected periods show the decreasing trend in lynchings. 1900-1909, whites 94, and 791 Negroes; 1910-1919, whites 53, and 563 Negroes; 1920-1929, whites 34, and 281 Negroes; 1930-1939, whites 11, and 119 Negroes; 1940-1947, whites 1, and 26 Negroes. The total shows 193 whites and 1,780 Negroes, for a grand total of 1,973.

The most remarkable work of the NAACP was its establishment of the legal foundation of the Negro's rights. In 1915, the Negro had been, in plain defiance of law, reduced to an inferior caste. Redress was not easy with white lawyers, white juries, and white courts. Up until 1915, political campaigns in the South had been fought questioning the validity of the Civil War amendments, and in the case of the 14th, the clear letter of the law had been changed by the Supreme Court to defend wealth instead of human liberty. Negroes had lost faith in court action. The courts upheld disfranchisement on flimsy points, and when the colored folk of Augusta, Georgia brought suit to retain their right to a high school, the Supreme Court, to the astonishment of white Augusta, gave the school board the right, out of public funds, to train white children for college and Negroes for servants. Judge Emory Speer of Georgia warned the South in 1900, that one day Negroes would gather funds, "hire first class white lawyers," and attack and overthrow discriminatory legislation. It did not occur to Judge Speer that Negroes would not only get the services of lawyers like Clarence Darrow and Moorfield Storey, but with black counsel like Charles Houston and Thurgood Marshall wring favorable decisions from judges even in Texas.

The attitude toward the Negro voter has undergone great change. Reconstruction was justified in the minds of the North by the charges of ignorance and venality. The offer of the South to base suffrace on literacy and property was accepted by nullified by injustice in administration and court decision. From 1900 to the first World War American Negroes almost ceased the attempt to establish legal Negro ghettoes. Many were handled by the NAACP, some by other individuals and groups. The first case was in Baltimore, and attempted by city ordinance to restrict Negroes to reside in certain sections. It was invalidated by NAACP attorneys in 1913. Other cases followed in Louisville, New Orleans, and Richmond. All were nullified in the United States Supreme Court in 1917, 1927, and 1930. Then tactics were changed and the restrictive covenants came into use, limiting Negro occupancy of homes by private contract.

Another series of cases and demonstrations sought to attack mob violence and denial of due process of law. In 1917, on Fifth Avenue New York, 15,000 Negroes marched silently with banners to protest against race riots in Waco, Texas, Memphis, and East St. Louis. In 1923, after the riots in Elaine, Arkansas, the cases of twelve Negroes sentenced to death and 67 to prison terms were carried to the Supreme court and all the prisoners were finally released in 1925. Systematic exclusion of Negroes from jury duty, was brought to the Supreme Court in 1935, 1938 and 1942. All cases were won. The "Third Degree" against Negro prisoners to induce confession by torture was condemned by the Supreme Court in three cases, 1936 and 1940, 1944 and 1948.

The Scottsboro cases brought widespread effort on the part of the NAACP and other organizations and was partially successful. Other cases have been defended with more or less success down to the extraordinary outrage recently perpetrated in Georgia, in the case of half-grown sons defending their mother. Further cases come before the courts in the matter of extradition or alleged criminals who have escaped from the South into northern states. This has led to a number of investigations and refusal to extradite.

One small indication of change in the social structure is the number of Negro policemen. The presence of Negro police means that arrests are no longer purely a matter of race. To consider the South alone in 1917, there was not a single Negro acting as a policeman so far as I can ascertain. In 1947, at least twelve states employ Negro policemen in more than fifty cities. Of course, even in these cases Negroes in theory, if not in actual law, exercise no power of arrest over whites.

The fight for equal educational opportunities has been long, and discrimination in expenditure on Negro elementary training even today is disgraceful. In 1939-1940, nine Southern states spent on each white pupil 212 per cent more than on each Negro pupil, or $58.69 and $18.82 respectively. The NAACP centered its legal attack on this discrimination in the matter of salaries paid teachers. The average annual salaries of teachers were, for selected states in 1940, Louisiana: white, $1,193, Negro, $504; South Carolina: white, $953, Negro, $391; Mississippi: white, $821, Negro, $235. In 32 cases brought (1936 to 1945) to stop discrimination in salaries on account of race, six cases were won by court decision, 17 by consent decrees, 4 cases lost, one dropped, and 4 are pending. In 1935, a Negro won a suit to enter the law school of the University of Maryland.

The NAACP began in 1938 to fight for equal opportunities for Negroes in state schools for higher education. Loyd Gaines sued for admission to the University of Missouri Law School. The state offered to send him to school in another state. The Supreme Court ordered the State to furnish Gaines facilities to study law within the State. A similar case in Oklahoma confirmed this decision, with the addition that the law course demanded must be furnished immediately. Finally, in Texas, a similar case turned on the point as to whether segregation in school facilities could ever give equal facilities. The final disposition of the case is pending.

Probably no phase of discrimination has irked the American Negro more than the so-called Jim Crow cars for travel because of its publicly insulting character. These have been attacked, usually by individuals, in the matter of interstate travel and dining car service. The United States Supreme Court has decided that railroads must provide accommodations for Negroes equal to those for whites, and damages have been paid colored people in several cases for being refused service. In one case it was decided that segregation in interstate travel according to state law was permissible, but in 1946 the United States Supreme Court decided that the Virginia law segregating passengers in buses in interstate travel was unconstitutional.

These are but part of the legal cases brought to the United States Supreme Court in the last thirty years. They not only have resulted in a number of victories, but what is more important have given Negroes faith in law, and in the sense of justice among large numbers of white people. In addition, these cases have shown what Negroes themselves can do by pooling funds, supporting organizations, and persisting in the fight, year after year, and decade after decade.

This has brought also certain patterns of action. Personal violence against Negroes is common in the South and difficult to stop. For instance, in a small town in Tennessee, in 1945, a colored woman and her son were having a radio examined for repairs in a local store. The woman complained of the service she was receiving from the clerk and he slapped her. The son probably knocked him through a plate glass window. The two were arrested and released on bail. Policemen entered the Negro section and four of them were wounded. A mob of about 500 persons from the surrounding country gathered, wrecked and looted Negro homes and shops, and 100 Negroes were arrested. Eventually 31 Negroes were indicted, 28 for attempted murder. Thus far the oft-repeated Southern race pattern prevailed: an insult, a fight, a mob, and Negroes arrested and charged with felony.

But here the pattern changed. The NAACP moved in. Negroes from all over the nation sent in $15,000 in cash. Lawyers appeared who refused to be intimidated by lack of hotel accommodations or threats. The cases went to court. One defendant died; 23 of the accused were aquitted; five noll-prossed, and three cases are pending. One man was convicted and given five years in prison.

Occurrences like this have built the NAACP so deep into the consciousness of the American Negro and the Southern white as to make it an institution. It survives because it deserves to, and because it is a heartening example for white and black of what poor, disadvantaged persons can accomplish by faith, small contributions and union. It has never in its career misused the funds entrusted to it, but has handled for the purposes for which they were given. It has shown a kind of cooperation between white and black folk which is an example for the world. If the NAACP will serve the future as it has the past, it must naturally expand from an organization of protest to one of constructive guidance, with increased democratic method and broad leadership for creative ability in industry and art. But the past is secure; the NAACP has led the fight for civil rights and won.

Probably the most effective effort toward interracial understanding among the working masses has come about through the trade unions. The organization of the CIO in 1935 was an attempt to bring the mass of workers into the union movement, as contrasted with the AFL effort to unionize only the skilled workers of industry. As a result, numbers of men like those in the steel and automobile industries have been thrown together, black and white, as fellow workers striving for the same objectives. There has been on this account an astonishing spread of interracial tolerance and understanding. Probably no movement in the last thirty years has been so successful in softening race prejudice among the masses.

Leading up to this has been the work of the Urban League, an organization with white and colored members but a colored executive staff. Beginning in 1910 it voluntarily divided fields with the NAACP and undertook the task of securing work for Negroes. It appealed to employers and conferred with labor leaders and succeeded in placing thousands of Negro workers in jobs where Negroes had never been hired before. It facilitated the entrance of Negroes into public social work and gave scholarships for training; it emphasized vocational guidance. Resulting from these agencies and the success of A. Philip Randolph's Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters Union, membership of Negroes in trade unions has risen from 30,000 in 1900 to 100,000 in 1930 and an estimated total of over 1,000,000 at the height of war industry. The President's Fair Employment Practices Committee orders in 1941 and 1943 did much to open work opportunities, and five states have since passed fair employment statutes.

In science, there is a larger willingness to consider the scientific achievements of Negroes, as has been instanced in the universal acclaim of Carver and the election of E. Franklin Frazier as President of the American Sociological Society. And what is more fundamental, the admission, since 1941, of Negroes to fellowships as laboratory assistants and teaching positions in several universities and many northern public schools. The freedom of Negroes in fields of art and literature has grown decidedly, and now depends upon opportunity and ability more largely than ever before.

There has been increase in normal social intermingling between Negroes and whites, and today it is much more common to meet Negroes in social gatherings, at dinners, and celebrations than it used to be. There is some increase in intermarriage but no change in the intermarriage laws, which are clearly unconstitutional, and certainly silly.

In religion, the advance, while important, has not been great. The churches still form the most segregated part of our social organization. The efforts of the Methodists to bring all Methodism together has been so far as the Negroes are concerned only partly successful. There were three Negro Catholic priests in the United States in 1917, now there are twenty-two.

In many national organizations there has been notable cooperation between white and colored groups and a strong tendency of general organizations to pay attention to the Negro part of our community. It is striking to see today colored boy and girl scouts, photographed along with their fellows; and to have appeals for summer outings for children emphasize and include colored children. This was not the case thirty years ago.

In the larger efforts of social uplift, throughout the North, the color line has been pretty successfully attacked. In the South this, of course, is not so, though even here there is certainly greater awareness of the necessity for some action. It is indicative of the new attitude that a great many national organizations refuse to meet in parts of the country where hotel and other accommodations cannot be furnished to their Negro members.

CIVIL RIGHTS FOR NEGROES

by

W.E. Burghardt Du Bois

Sent to New York Times for Sunday Magazine - by request Jan 27, 1947 mailed August 2, 1948

On the ~~afternoon of October~~ 1947, a small committee visited the office of the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations, to present a petition setting forth the denial by the United States government of political and civil rights to its citizens of Negro descent. The Director ~~doubted~~ his authority to receive such a petition but finally consented to put it on file. ~~A year~~ later the Commission ~~consented~~ publicly to receive this petition and the committee asked that the subject be put on the agenda of the Assembly for public discussion. The situation was embarrassing until rather suddenly the Civil Rights committee, appointed by President Truman, published its report on civil rights and the President laid it before Congress.

In the Summer of 1948, at the conventions of the three political parties, strong planks favoring legislation to secure civil rights for Negroes and other minorities were adopted ~~and at the special session of Congress the matter was debated at length.~~

Why now has this question of the full emancipation of our Negro population become suddenly a burning political issue? There are two reasons: first the condition of Negroes after two world wars has changed so much, that it is difficult longer to ignore the caste conditions under which they live; second, an organization, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, has for 38 years spear-headed an intelligent, persistent mass drive against lynching, mob violence, disfranchisement and the wide denial of civil liberties to Negroes.

~~The Negro population has radically changed, growth, migration~~

pulation of the United States increased from 9,000,000 to 13,000, 1900 and 1940. In the South this increase was twenty-five per in the North and West the increase was two hundred per cent. The population has remained stationary, but the urban population has ree hundred and fifty per cent.

in which the Negro population earns a living has changed fundaenable to achieve freedom and social advance on the plantation. groes have left them. They have changed from domestic and vice on the plantation and in the South, to similar but higher paid ities, and in the North. The Negro has entered industry, increased ems from 7 to 12 per cent, and he is rising slowly from unskilled abor. He is entering trade and business, first as cooperative to hiw own people, then into general business, increasing from five cent. Another third of all Negro workers have made their way fessions, the arts, and numbers of miscellaneous occupations.

in 1900; in 1947 it was 57.

Negroes for a long time have been decreasing in illiteracy. Nine-tenths of them were illiterate at the time of Emancipation. According to the Census of 1940 it is ten per cent today; but the experience of the draft shows that this today probably a fourth of the adult Negro population is by any thorough standard illiterate. Figures show us that in 1910, forty-five per cent of all Negroes from six to twenty-five years of age were in school, and in 1940, sixty-four per cent, or in round number in 1910, there were 1,600,000, and in 1940, the number was 4,155,000.

In 1900, Charles Dudley Warner said Negroes could not assimilate higher education. In 1910, not more than 5,000 Negroes were enrolled in college. In 1948, over 88,000 were enrolled. In 1918, 324 bachelors of arts received their degrees; in 1948, 5,635 received degrees. No white college in the North today refuses a student because he is a Negro, and [illegible] Negro students are enrolled in such institutions. There have been 279 Negroes who have received the Ph. D. from the chief northern colleges.

Much of this change rested on fundamental social and economic development. were only two Negro members of state legislatures in 1917 but thirty-three in 1947, including at least two senators. In the Federal Congress there are two Negro members today as compared with none in 1917. Some thirteen judges and magistrates of Negro descent are presiding over courts as compared with none in 1917, and one American Negro is Governor of a territory. In both New York and Cleveland Negroes have for years been prominent members of the city civil service commission.

Many facts show the basis of this change in public opinion. The first edition of "Who's Who in America" did not, so far as I can find, list a single person of Negro descent; the fiftieth edition in 1948 had the names of 91. In American Men of Science are today the names of 77 Negroes.

The causes of these changes were many: individual initiative, war incentive; growth of tolerance, north and south. But the great moving force was organized purposive effort by Negroes themselves and by whites. Among whites came the foundations, the inter-racial [illegible] and the Labor Movement. But before all of these in influence, persistence and accomplishment stood the NAACP. For 38 years it has spear-headed the pressure for the rights of Negroes, until it became a mass movement built deeply into the consciousness of the nation and one of the most effective social efforts for reform in modern history. The movement began at the height of the Booker Washington appeasement campaign, with the meeting of seventeen Negroes in 1906 to form the Niagara Movement and demand full citizen rights for Negroes. Three years later a race riot in the home of Abraham Lincoln brought a group of whites together in New York to work toward finishing Lincoln's emancipation. At a conference in 1909 these groups merged and in 1910 formed the NAACP to make the Negro physically free from peonage; mentally free from ignorance; politically free from disfranchisement; and socially free from insult". This was a radical program for 1910, and it was regarded widely as so dangerous that it could hope for little support from the rich, and little countenance from the respectable.

From the beginning, while open to all, and with a considerable white membership, this organization was predominantly Negro in membership, and directed primarily by Negro officials, and supported up to ninety per cent of its funds by poor Negro workers. In this respect it is one of the most unique of mass movements in the world.

Working contemporaneously with the NAACP have been other organizations without which it would have been impotent: the Negro Church with its 35,000 congregations owning $175,000,000 in real estate and spending $28,000,000 a year, helped publicize and support the Association. The Negro Press, with at present nearly 150 weekly papers, grew to a circulation that reached every literate Negro and achieved a news coverage of interracial happenings that made Negroes independent of the white press for knowledge of the facts of their situation in America. Other organizations not simply supplemented the main work of the NAACP, but provided an outlet for those who could not go the radical way but wanted to help in some practical effort.

With keen understanding the NAACP centered its first attack on the most barbarous example of race friction, lynching.

It began investigation and publicity in 1910, but in 1919 it started a real campaign. In that year it communicated with 25 governors and seven Chambers of Commerce. It sent 32 stories to the press, and paid for page advertisements in daily papers throughout the country. Members of the staff made personal investigations of 12 lynchings on the spot, and race riots and in May a national conference was held in New York which sent out an address to the nation signed by an ex-president of the United States, the Attorney-General, seven governors, and a score of heads of universities.

In its anti-lynching campaign the NAACP did not work alone, nor does it deserve exclusive credit for the final success attained. But without doubt, the NAACP spearheaded the attack, dramatized it, revealed the facts and hammered them home. Without its intelligent leadership the work would not have triumphed as soon nor as fully. Southern white women, at no little risk in a sex conscious South, publicly fought lynching and denied that white women were chiefly engaged in outrunning "big, black brutes". Southern liberals who did not believe in the NAACP, began to attack lynching, until even in Lousiana a man could repudiate lynching and stand for "white supremacy". The result of this work reduced lynching in the land from ~~one a month~~ two a week in 1900 to one a year in 1947. Figures for selected periods show the decreasing trend in lynchings. 1900-1909, whites 94, and 791 Negroes; ~~1910-1919, whites 53, and 563 Negroes; 1920-1929, whites 34, and 281 Negroes; 1930-1939, whites 11, and 119 Negroes;~~ 1940-1947, whites 1, and 26 Negroes. ~~The total shows 193 whites and 1,780 Negroes, for a grand total of 1,973.~~

The most remarkable work of the NAACP was its establishment of the legal foundation of the Negro's rights. In 1915, the Negro had been, in plain defiance of law, reduced to an inferior caste. Redress was not easy with white lawyers, white juries, and white courts. Up until 1915, political campaigns in the South had been fought questioning the validity of the Civil but with black counsel like Charles Houston and Thurgood Marshall wring favorable decisions from judges even in Texas.

The attitude toward the Negro voter has undergone great change. Reconstruction was justified in the minds of the North by the charges of ignorance and venality. The offer of the South to base suffrage on literacy and property was accepted by nullified by injustice in administration and court decision. From 1900 to the first World War American Negroes almost ceased to vote in the South. Migration north for jobs threw them into Northern city politics, and Reaction ~~and race-hate~~ in the South made this Northern Negro vote grow in weight; but as late as the campaign of 1928, the treatment of the Negro voter and his demands brought a bitter protest from Negro leaders of all schools, North and South, ~~directed to both~~ major parties.

> "We are asking in this appeal for a public repudiation of this campaign of racial hatred. Silence and whispering in this case are worse than in matters of personal character and religion. Will white America make no protests? Will the candidates continue to remain silent? Will the Church say nothing? Is there any truth, any issue in this campaign, either religious tolerance, liquor, water power, tariff or farm relief, that touches in weight the transcendent and fundamental question of the open, loyal and unchallenged recognition of the essential humanity of twelve million Americans who happen to be dark-skinned?

Contrast this with the campaign of 1948. All three parties are asking for the votes of a Negro electorate, North and South, recognized as having sufficient intelligence to demand more than appointments and campaign contributions. They ask Civil Rights and no party dares refuse at least lip service to the demand.

From 1915 to 1948 the NAACP has brought 26 cases involving the legal rights of Negroes before the United States Supreme Court and won 24 of them. In 1915 the "Grandfather Clause" in Southern constitutions, giving illiterate whites an hereditary right to vote, was declared unconstitutional, ~~and in 1939 this was confirmed~~. In 1927 the first attack was made on the "White Primary" method of disfranchising Negroes. Exclusion of Negroes from the Democratic primary by state law in Texas was declared illegal. Immediately the state declared that the executive committee of the Democratic Party could fix its own rules for voting in its primary. But in 1932 the NAACP brought suit and overthrew that statute. The state of Texas then gave the right to exclude Negroes to the Democratic convention itself, and in 1935, a group of Texas Negroes carried this to the Supreme Court and by some extraordinary reasoning the court upheld Texas. But the NAACP bided its time and in 1941 found the court, in the case of white Louisiana litigants, contradicting this decision. The NAACP, therefore, brought suit again in 1944, and the court reversed its former decision and confirmed the right of Negroes to vote in the Texas Democratic primary. As a result of these decisions and other activities of local Negro groups, over 600,000 Negroes were qualified voters in 1947 in twelve Southern states, or twelve per cent of the Negroes of voting age. This is an increase of 450,000 since 1940. Five cases had to do with the attempt to establish legal Negro ghettoes. Many were handled by the NAACP, some by other individuals and groups. The first case was in Baltimore, and attempted by city ordinance to restrict Negroes to reside in certain sections. It was invalidated by NAACP attorneys in 1913. Other cases followed in Louisville, New Orleans, and Richmond. All were nullified in the United States Supreme Court in 1917, 1927, and 1930. public social work and ~~gave scholarships for training.~~ It emphasized vocational guidance. Resulting from its work and from the success of A. Philip Randolph's Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters Union, membership of Negroes in trade unions has risen from 30,000 in 1900 to 100,000 in 1930 and an estimated total of over 1,000,000 at the height of war industry. The President's Fair Employment Practices Committee orders in 1941 and 1943 did much to open work opportunities, and five states have since passed fair employment statutes.

The work for Negroes of the foundations began with the Capon Springs conferences and through them evolved the Southern Education Board, and finally, the General Education Board. The first attitudes were conservative, but the educability of the Negro was admitted. The General Education Board espoused Negro industrial education, until under young Southern leadership, a plan for Negro college education completely covering the South emerged in 1937.

The Rosenwald Fund, starting from Mr. Rosenwald's colored Y.M.C.A. homes, began to build Negro schoolhouses in the South and aid health projects. It encouraged Negro and white students in graduate study, and emphasized race relations efforts.

Organized efforts toward bettering race relations have been widespread in the United States. In 1919, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation was formed in the South. ~~It had national offices in Atlanta, Georgia, and several branch offices. It published pamphlets and held conferences. The~~ and helped in the anti-lynching effort.

~~Southern Regional Council, formed in 1944, has taken over the work of the Commission.~~ The Commission on Race Relations, of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America, was organized in 1921. The Southern Conference for Human Welfare was started in 1939, and it has become a strong organization for civil rights, political action, and equalization of educational opportunity. The American Council on Race Relations, formed in 1944, has sought to federate many of the race relations activities in the nation.

Rachel Davis DuBois started a movement for interracial education which was later known as intercultural education. A Bureau for Intercultural Education was started in 1939. Local interracial movements are illustrated by the Springfield Plan, started in 1939, with a committee to teach democratic citizenship by the practice of democracy on all levels of school and community life.

What now has been accomplished in the last generation? First we must note a general improvement in public opinion, not perhaps measurable in figures, but clear and decisive. The nation is no longer pessimistic on the Negro problem. Far from believing that the peaceful living together of black and white in America is impossible, we have come to conceive of a "One World" where all people must live together in equality or die. Science has attacked the concept of race itself and of inborn and ineradicable race differences, with devastating success. Many of the old clichés have disappeared. The changing of "human nature" is admitted to be possible and it is accepted that few prejudices are ineradicable. Law can help and hasten human change and intermarriage of persons of different races may be good, bad, or indifferent, depending mainly on the circumstances, which have nothing to do with "race".

today, the nation against the will of many, but with the increasing co-operation of others are facing the clear dilemma: either

CIVIL RIGHTS FOR NEGROES

By

W. E. B. DuBois

SPRINGFIELD-RIOTS

In the city where Abraham Lincoln began his political life and lies buried, there occurred in 1908, one of the most disgraceful of American lynchings. A white woman accused a Negro of rape. A mob gathered and when unable to find the accused, they looted and burned the Negro section, lynched two unaccused Negroes and were preparing to burn the body of one when halted by 5000 militia called by the governor. Four whites were killed and seventy persons injured. Finally the woman confessed that she had lied and the accused Negro was freed. The mob leaders were never punished.

In New York, a group of young white people met and said "We must finish the work of emancipation that Abraham Lincoln began." They called a conference in 1909, which resulted in the founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People a year later.

JULIUS-ROSENWALD

In Chicago, a Jew, Julius Rosenwald, read of this riot and was moved, because he had been born in Springfield, 46 years before and had been trained in its public schools. He knew of anti-Negro riots there and nearby in other years and he began to think of ways he might help the Negro people, especially when in 1896, he read Booker Washington's Atlanta speech. He had just become vice president of the mail-order house of Sears, Roebuck and Company, becoming president in 1910. The next year he began his far-sighted Negro philanthropies, by offering to donate $25,000 to any city in the United States which would raise $75,000 for erecting a YMCA building for colored men and boys, to cost not less than $100,000. As a result of this offer $5,964,564 was raised. Of this amount Mr. Rosenwald contributed $650,000; local whites, $1,701,299; local Negroes, $806,318; and $617,921 from other sources.

Between 1913 and 1932, Mr. Rosenwald, helped build over 5000 rural schools for Negroes in 15 Southern States. They cost $5,362,361 and of this approximately 64% came from public funds, 17% from Negroes, 15% from the Rosenwald Fund and 4% from whites.

The activities of this fund included more than $11,000,000 for building rural schools, for helping colleges and teacher education and library service. For health and medical service, over $3,000,000 was given away. Seventy fellowships a year were given for Negro students and Southern whites. A nation wide program in race relations was set on foot to which $3,000,000 was given. Other activities included general education and social study. The total expenditure amounted to $22,249,624.

Two considerations set the Rosenwald philanthropies apart: one, his limitation on the life of his Fund. In his view, even the most general purposes do not constitute a claim for perpetuity of endowment. "We may be certain that...the acute social need of tomorrow will be different from that of today and will doubtless call for a new kind of agency to meet it."

Most American foundations are under the control of self-perpetuating boards of trustees, this entails danger: "I think it is almost inevitable," writes Rosenwald, "that as trustees and officers "of perpetuities grow old they become more concerned to conserve the funds in their care than to wring from those funds the greatest possible usefulness." As a result of this thinking, the Rosenwald Fund was required to expend both income and principal within 25 years of Mr. Rosenwald's death. The ceremony of closing took place in Chicago in May, 1948.

PHILANTHROPY

At that time it was fitting to take into consideration the advancement made by American Negroes in securing their civil and political rights during the time of the activities of the Rosenwald Fund and its donor, and also during the activities of other philanthropic agencies, ~~like the Rosenwald Fund.~~ In 1902, the General Education Board was founded, preceded by the Capon Springs conferences, and the Southern Education Board. All these agencies approached the question of Negro Education hesitatingly; first, stressing industrial training, then elementary schools and finally in 1919, openly helping to endow Negro colleges. But the Rosenwald Fund, and t is is the second distinction, revealed what Negroes themselves could do even in their poverty. It was astonishing to have Negroes contribute 13% of the funds for Christian Association buildings, spurred by only 11% from the Fund; and even more astonishing to find Southern Negroes giving 17% for school houses which, ~~the school houses which,~~ the State was obligated to furnish free.

Of itself, philanthropy can never free or uplift a people. That they must do themselves. Philanthropy can help; it can at critical times give the indispensable push, the encouragement, the confidence. This, the Rosenwald Fund, the General Education Board and other organizations did in the years between the First and Second World Wars. But the main and essential work of raising the freedman toward full American citizenship, was done by the Negro himself.

This brings to notice the third element in the fight for civil rights, the determ ned unflagging effort of Negroes themselves. This fight has been led by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It has for thirty-eight years spearheaded an intelligent, persistent mass drive against lynching, mob violence, disfranchisement, and the wide denial of civil liberties to Negroes.

HUMAN-Rights

On the afternoon of January 27, 1947, a small committee asked the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations, to receive a petition setting forth the denial by the United States government of political and civil rights to its citizens of Negro descent. On October 23, the Commission publicly received this petition and the committee asked that the subject be put on the agenda of the General Assembly of the United Nations for public discussion. The situation was embarrassing, until rather suddenly the Civil Rights Committee, appointed by President Truman, published its report on civil rights and the President laid it before Congress. In the summer of 1948, at the conventions of the three political parties, strong planks favoring legislation to secure civil rights for Negroes and other minorities were adopted.

Why now, has this question of the full emancipation of our Negro population become suddenly a burning political issue? There are three reasons: first, the condition of Negroes after two world wars has changed so much that it is difficult to ignore any longer the caste conditions under which they live.

Between 1900 and 1940, the Negro population of the United States increased from 9,000,000 to 13,000,000. In the South this population increased only 25 per cent, while in the North and West the increase was 200 per cent. The rural Negro population has remained stationary, but the urban population has increased 350 per cent.

The way in which the Negro population earns a living is changing fundamentally. A million Negroes have left the plantations and others have changed from domestic and personal service on the plantation to similar but better paid service in cities, and in the North. Negro industrial workers have increased from 7 to 12 per cent, and are rising slowly from unskilled to skilled labor. The Negro is entering trade and business, first as cooperative self-service to his own people, then into general business, increasing from 5 to 8 per cent of his workers. Another third of all Negro workers have made their way into the professions, the arts, and numbers of miscellaneous occupations.

Negro health has improved. The expectation of life of a Negro male at birth was 32 years in 1900; in 1947 it was 57 years. Nine-tenths of the Negroes were illiterate in 1870. The census of 1940 sets the figure at ten per cent today; but the experience of the draft in World War II shows that this probably should be about 25 per cent. Figures show us that in 1910, 45 per cent of all Negroes from five to twenty years of age were in schools, and in 1940, 64 per cent, or in round numbers in 1910, there were 1,644,000, and in 1940, ~~the number was~~ 4,188,000.

In 1900, Charles Dudley Warner said Negroes could not assimilate higher education. In 1910, not more than 5,000 Negroes were enrolled in colleges. In 1948, over 88,000 were enrolled. In 1918, bachlors of arts degrees were granted to 324 Negroes; while 5,635 received such degrees in 1948. No white college in the North today refuses a student because he is a Negro, and over 1,500 Negro students are enrolled in such institutions. There have been 279 Negroes who have received the Ph.D. from the chief Northern colleges.

There were in 1947, 6 members of city councils throughout the United States. There were only two Negro members of state legislatures in 1917 but thirty-three in 1947, including at least two senators. In the Federal Congress there are two Negro members today as compared with none in 1917. Some thirteen judges and magistrates of Negro descent are presiding over courts as compared with none in 1917, and one American Negro is Governor of a territory. In both New York and Cleveland Negroes have for years been prominent members of the city civil service commission.

The first edition of Who's Who in America did not, so far as the writer can find, list a single person of Negro descent; the fiftieth edition in 1948 had the names of 91. In American Men of Science today are listed the names of 77 Negroes.

The N.A.A.C.P.

The causes of these changes were many; individual initiative, war incentive, growth of tolerance, north and south; the work of the foundations, the inter-racial movement in the South, the National Urban League, and the Federal Council of Churches. But the great moving force was organized purposive efforts among Negroes, and foremost among these in influence, persistence, and accomplishment stands the NAACP. For thirty-eight years it has spearheaded the pressure for the rights of Negroes, until it became a mass movement built deeply into the consciousness of the nation and one of the most effective social efforts for reform in modern history.

The movement began at the height of the Booker T. Washington appeasement campaign, with the meeting of 17 Negroes in 1906 to form the Niagara Movement and demand full citizenship rights for Negroes. Three years later the Springfield, Illinois race riot brought a group of whites together in New York. At a conference in 1909 these groups merged and in 1910 formed the NAACP "to make the Negro, physically free from peonage; mentally free from ignorance; politically free from disfranchisement; and socially free from insult." This was a radical program for 1910, and it was regarded widely as so dangerous that it could hope for little support from the rich, and little countenance from the respectable.

From the beginning, while open to all, this organization was predominantly Negro in membership, directed increasingly by Negro officials, and supported up to 90 per cent of its funds by poor Negro workers. In this respect it is one of the most unique mass movements in the world. Its membership exceeds 500,000 in 1948.

NEGRO-CHURCH AND PRESS

Working contemporaneously with the NAACP have been large Negro organizations whose objects were not specific but without the NAACP would have been impotent--the Negro Church with its 35,000 congregations owning $175,000,000 in real estate and spending $28,000,000 a year, helped publicize and support the Association. The Negro press, with at present nearly 150 weekly papers, grew to a circulation that reached every literate Negro and achieved a news coverage of interracial happenings that made Negroes independent of the white press for knowledge of the facts of their situation in America.

Lynching

The NAACP centered its first attack on the most barbarous example of race friction, lynching. It began investigation and publicity in 1910, but in 1919 it started a real campaign. In that year a national conference was held in New York which sent out an address to the nation signed by an ex-president of the United States, the Attorney-General, 7 Governors, and a score of heads of universities.

In its anti-lynching campaign the NAACP did not work alone, but without doubt the NAACP led the attack, dramatized it, revealed the facts and hammered them home. The result of this work reduced lynching in the land from two a week in 1900 to 1 a year in 1947.

Political-Rights

The most remarkable work of the NAACP was its establishment of the legal foundation of the Negro's rights. From 1900 to World War I, American Negroes almost ceased to vote in the South. Migration north for jobs threw them into Northern city politics, and reaction in the South made this Northern Negro vote grow in weight; but as late as the campaign of 1928, the treatment of the Negro voter and his demands brought a bitter protest from Negro leaders of all schools, North and South.

Contrast this with the campaign of 1948. All three parties are asking for the votes of a Negro electorate, North and South, recognized as having sufficient intelligence to demand more than appointments and campaign contributions. They asked Civil Rights and no party dares refuse at least lip service to the demand.

From 1915 to 1948 the NAACP has brought 26 cases involving the legal rights of Negroes before the United States Supreme Court and won 24 of them. In 1915 the "Grandfather Clause" in Southern constitutions, giving illiterate whites an hereditary right to vote, was declared unconstitutional. In 1927 the first attack was made on the "White Primary" method of disfranchising Negroes. Exclusion of Negroes from the Democratic primary by state law in Texas was declared illegal. But the state squirmed into other subterfuges, and in 1932 and 1935, the matter came to the Supreme Court until finally in 1944, a clear-cut decision was obtained.

As a result of these decisions and other activities of local Negro groups, over 600,000 Negroes were qualified voters in 1947 in twelve Southern states, or twelve per cent of the Negroes of voting age. This is an increase of 450,000 since 1940. The Negro Ghetto Many cases had to do with the attempt to establish legal Negro ghettoes. Some ~~They~~ were handled by the NAACP, others by individuals and groups. The first case was in Baltimore, and attempted by city ordinance to restrict Negroes to reside in certain sections. It was invalidated by NAACP attorneys in 1913.

Other cases followed in Louisville, New Orleans, and Richmond. All were nullified in the United States Supreme Court in 1917, 1927, and 1930. Then tactics were changed and the restrictive covenants came into use, limiting Negro occupancy of homes by private contract. The covenants began to increase in number until it was estimated in 1947, that five square miles of St. Louis and ten square miles of Chicago were restricted to settlement by white people. The Supreme Court of the United States decided against Negro complainants in 1944, and refused to review a decision of a lower court in 1945. Nevertheless, in 1948, came the epoch-making and clear-cut desicion outlawing the enforcement of such contracts by state or federal law.

Mob-Violence

Another series of cases and demonstrations sought to attack mob violence and denial of due process of law. In 1923, after the riots in Elane, Arkansas, the cases of twelve Negroes sentenced to death and 67 to prison terms were carried to the Supreme Court and the prisoners were finally released in 1925. Recently in Columbia, Tennessee 26 victims of mob violence obtained release. Systematic exclusion of Negroes from jury duty was attacked and cases won, before the Supreme Court in 1935, 1938, and 1942. The "Third Degree" against Negro prisoners to induce confession by torture was condemned by the Supreme Court in 1936, 1940, 1944, and 1948.

Discrimination-in-Education

The fight for equal educational opportunities has been long, and discrimination in expenditure on Negro elementary training even today is disgraceful. In 1939-1940, nine Southern states spent on each white pupil 212 per cent more than on each Negro pupil, or $58.69 and $18.82 respectively. The NAACP centered its legal attack on this discrimination in the matter of salaries paid teachers, since discrimination between teachers of equal training was easy to prove. In 32 cases brought (1936-1945) by the NAACP and by individuals and other agencies to stop discrimination in salaries on account of race, 6 cases were won by court decision, 17 by consent decrees, 4 were lost, 1 dropped, and 4 are pending.

In 1935, a Negro won a suit to enter the law school of the University of Maryland. The NAACP began in 1938 to fight for equal opportunities for Negroes in state schools for professional education. In Missouri, Oklohoma and Texas, cases have been won, ordering the state to furnish professional training to Negroes within the state. These are but part of the legal cases brought to the United States Supreme Court in the last thirty years. They not only have resulted in a number of victories, but what is more important have given Negroes faith in law, and in the sense of justice among large numbers of white people.

Occurrences like this have built the NAACP so deep into the consciousness of the American Negro and the Southern White as to make it a social institution. It survives because it is a heartening example to white and black, of what poor, disadvantaged persons can accomplish by faith, small contributions, and intelligent leadership. In forty years this organization has spent over $4,000,000, of w ich 90 per cent came from poor Negro workers, and not one penny of which has been misappropriated for purposes other than those for which the money was given.

UNION-LABOR

An effective effort toward interracial understanding among the working masses has come about through the trade unions. The organization of the CIO in 1935 was an attempt to bring the mass of workers into the union movement, as contrasted with the AFL effort to unionize only the skilled workers of industry.

Leading up to thishas been the work of the Urban League. Beginning in 1910, it voluntarily divided fields with the NAACP and undertook the task of securing work for Negroes. It appealed to employers and conferred with labor leaders and succeeded in placing thousands of Negro workers in jobs where Negroes had never been hired before. It facilitated the entrance of Negroes into public social work and emphasized vocational guidance. Resulting from its work, the success of Randolph's Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters and the membership of the CIO's Negroes in trade unions has risen from 30,000 in 1900 to 100,000 in 1930, and an estimated total of 1,000,000 at the height of war industry.

CIO Committee to Abolish Racial Discrimination

RACE-RELATIONS

Organized efforts toward bettering race relations have been widespread in the United States. In 1919, the Commission on Interracial Cooperation was formed in the South and helped in the anti-lynching effort, especially through the brave voices of Southern white women. The Commission on Race Relations of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America was organized in 1921. The Southern Conference for Human Welfare was started in 1939, and has become a strong organization for civil rights, political action, and equalization of educational opportunity.

THE FUTURE

What now have all these agencies accomplished in the last generation, and what can we look forward to in the next? First, we must note a general improvement in public opinion, not perhaps measurable in figures, but clear and decisive. The nation is no longer pessimistic on the Negro problem. Far from believing that the peaceful living together of black and white in America is impossible, we have come to conceive of a "One World" where all people must live together in equality or die. Science has attacked with devastating success the concept of race itself and of inborn and ineradicable race differences. Many of the old cliches have disappeared. The changing of "human nature" is admitted to be possible and it is accepted that few prejudices are ineradicable. Law can help and hasten human change and intermarriage of persons of different races may be good, bad, or indifferent, depending mainly on circumstances which have nothing to do with"race."

As a result, today the nation, against the will of many but with the increasing cooperation of others, is facing the clear dilemma: either color caste in America must go, or the leadership of world democracy which we profess will be increasingly impossible. Moreover, increasing numbers of Americans are coming to realize that American Negroes can and will share in national life on equal terms with their fellow American, if they are given a fair chance in education and work; in science and art.

THE AFRICAN ROOTS OF PEACE

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

THE NEW AFRICA

In England today, Africa is news. For a long time Africans have complained, "If there is an Iron Curtain in Eastern Europe, nevertheless, we hear more of events there than we do about African colonies." But today this is changing, and a British daily says: "African development has at last a news value. Even in the daily papers of the United Kingdom, the British West African colonies figure prominently from time to time. There are references to conferences with other powers who have colonies in Africa; and it goes on to say, "There are few people, however, who realize the urgent importance of Pan-African development; in particular, the cooperation of Great Britain with France, Belgium and Portugal. The fact is that Africa is the hinterland of Europe, both commercially and strategically, and in fulfilling our moral obligations to the native peoples it is essential to create a real defensive bastion against the Communist Eastern bloc."

Thus one of the great by-products of the Second World War is the growing importance of Africa. Here is the second greatest land area in the world, with at least one hundred and fifty million people and vast natural resources. England has lost control of India and Burma; France has lost Indo-China, and Holland is losing Indonesia. Still nearer the West comes the threat of the Arabs and Islan, with an independent Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Trans-Jordan, Iraq and Iran. Western European Imperialism must, to survive, center in Africa. Africa becomes increasingly the visible source of food, coal, diamonds, gold, copper and uranium for Europe. France, without food from Algeria, Tunis and Morocco, would starve, and she is holding frantically to Madagascar. Belgium is accumulating wealth and power from the Congo, and Britain is awakening to the possibilities of Africa as a source not only of food but of other materials to restore at least in part her power.

I wish to essay a picture of current Africa and its human problems in relation to present day Europe and America, in order to make clear, if possible, the effect which the stature of Africa will have on the greatest problem of the world today--peace. My collection of facts is uneven and inaccurate. Africa may be "news" today, but the news is delayed and distorted. A half dozen powerful nations with aims to achieve, many score of local colonial governments with actions to excuse; and native spokesmen of widely varying education, experience and reliability with causes to justify, make it exceedingly difficult to know all the truth with regard to the present condition of African peoples. Gathering of facts from all sorts of sources, with lack of documents, or documents deliberately propaganda, I have sought to come to conclusions which seem to me to be fair, and true in general, if not in every detail.

Mr. Bevin, in his review of Foreign Affairs, before the House of Commons, January 22, said: "The free nations of Western Europe must now draw closely together. I believe now the time is ripe for a consolidation of Western Europe, and this consolidation must be supported. And that involves the closest collaboration between the Commonwealth and the overseas territory of the French, Dutch, Belgians and Portuguese. Their raw materials, food and other resources could be of mutual advantage to these territories and to the world."

Last November, Sir Stafford Cripps said to the African Governor's conference, "The whole future of the sterling group and its ability to survive depends on a quick and vast development of colonial resources. It is to your contribution to the righting of the world unbalance that we must look; and in order to give you the chance of success, we must put behind you all that we can in the way of capital, goods, and supplies."

Angle-French consultations have been under way for creation of an economic grouping by which Western Europe would be linked with the African continent. This bloc would be an element of economic equilibrium between the United States and the Soviet Republic. Sir Oswald Moseley was flatly outspoken; he advocated a union of European people. He saw Europe as the leader, aiming to develop Africa as an estate of the Europeans to solve the economic problem by direct state action. "Africa never was developed by Negroes, who at present are exploited by finance capitalism under cover of Trusteeship hypocrisy."

"There are immense possibilities of development in the great continent of Africa," said Lord Addison, during the debate on Commonwealth and Empire Migration in the House of Lords. "We must realize a great many of these possibilities, or we shall be in even more distressing circumstances than we are now."

The Earl of Portsmouth said: "Our tropical Colonies demand a far greater administrative technical population than they have had up to date--namely, farmers, civil servants, engineers, business men and so forth. There is no question that our own population will thrive at the expense of the Native African, for instance. After all, Africa would starve if it were not for the white man's ability to check erosion as much as he has done...--

"As this would work out, I belive it should be treated as a sort of great co-partership, as it were, on the lines of a military operation. You would start on your development areas, on the analogy of the Tennessee Valley-,... where you would start on the great work necessary; here, it might be hydro-electric; there, it might be dams; and elsewhere, it might be afforestation. You would move to reclaim that land and develop its area. As the works were completed, so would more people come....

"...England..., struggling to keep its head above water, can give neither hope nor a lead to the nations of Western Europe. With Britain and those nations working to a common purpose, with everything going well, all their industrial resources will be needed. But Europe's Colonial Empire--and the colonial empires of the French, the Belgians, the Dutch and Portuguese--will equally be joining in such a scheme as this. Half the nations of the world can work to save themselves from immediate disaster and ultimate starvation."

MIGRATION AND PEANUTS

Out of this propaganda there have arisen two great developments, British migration to Africa, and the gigantic scheme of planting peanuts in East Africa. In January, 1948, it was said that ninety-five thousand British subjects were registered for passage to South Africa.

This migration was started by the attempt of South Africa and the Rhodesias to increase their white populations. South Africa discovered last Spring that her less than two and a half million whites are increasing at the rate of sixteen and one half per cent in ten years, while her black, colored and Asiatic populations are increasing over eighteen per cent, and amount to nine millions. The Union has been encouraging migration, and immigration centers have been opened in England, Holland, and Rome, with a quota of fifteen hundred a month. Southern Rhodesia has received twenty thousand white immigrants in the last two years, with one thousand arriving monthly now.

Meanwhile, the great scheme to develop Africa as a British food estate has been started. Britain's "Overseas Resources Act provides for two public corporations: the £ 100,000,000 "Colonial Development Corporation," under the Secretary of State for Colonies: and the £50,000,000 "Overseas Food Corporation," under the Minister of Food.

The Colonial Development Corporation is designed for work in colonies and is "Charged with the duty of securing the investigation, formulation and carrying out of projects for developing resources of colonial territories with a view to the expansion of production therein of foodstuffs and raw materials."

The Overseas Food Corporation may work within or outside colonies and is "charged with the duty of "investigating, formulating and carrying out "project for production or processing in places outside the United Kingdom of foodstuffs or agricultural products other than foodstuffs, and the marketing thereof; and as the first project is to be carried out by them, securing the large scale production of groundnuts, together with crops rotational therewith or ancillary thereto, in colonial territories in East and Central Africa."

This plan to raise peanuts in East Africa has been called "the most important action of Government in the history of British tropical Africa." The area involved includes parts of Tanganyika, Kenya and Northern Rhodesia, and calls for clearing, planting, and cultivating by mechanized methods over three million acres of land in one hundred and seven farming units of thirty thousand acres each.

The plan was conceived by the United African Company, a branch of the hugh Lever Brothers organization, which is already the largest organization engaged in exploiting Africa. The management of the project has been assigned to this company, because while the Government recognized that the management of such an undertaking should properly be a government-owned and financed corporation (and the establishment of such a corporation is to take place "in due course"), it was considered desirable, in order to get the project started quickly, to entrust the management to an existing commercial firm.

Supervision of the project, according to the government's report would pass first from this company to the government corporation and then to the local governments concerned "at a time and on terms to be agreed in the light of experience of the working of the project." Finally would come the accomplishment of "the more distant goal of transferring the control of the undertaking to the people themselves."

The East African Peanut Project carries further and makes immediate and specific development plans for the colonies which have been laid down for years. In 1947, a ten-year development plan was announced with a prospective expenditure of nearly $500,000,000. Only a small part of this--perhaps eight million dollars a year during the last few years--has actually been appropriated.

On the other hand, partly public and partly private, further plans are being proposed. The palm oil industry in Nigeria is to be expanded. The government has plans for improving the cocoa crop in West Africa and has taken control of its sale. Peanut culture is to be extended on mechanized plantations in West Africa. Cotton, rubber, and hardwoods are also mentioned for development. Mining and hydro-electric power are forecast. There is one plan in Uganda which is called "breathtaking" and which involves the raising of the level of Lake Victoria a yard and thus eventually revolutionalizing the valley of the Nile. There is a similar plan in Northern Rhodesia, designed to develop rich and extensive deposits of iron ore; while in Southern Rhodesia there is a plan for a dam, four times the size of Boulder Dam, to make Southern Rhodesia one of the four chief sources of high grade steel.

New Capital to Africa

Most of these are still in the planning and blue-print stage, but private capital in Africa has had long experience. In South Africa in the last sixty years $2,500,000,000 worth of gold has been produced out of which nearly $500,000,000 was paid in dividends. Diamonds and other minerals have brought further returns. It is natural, therefore, that when new discoveries were made recently in the Orange Free State, the greatest gold boom in forty years started. The new claims cover over one hundred square miles and call for a working capital of nearly $100,000,000, forcasting a capacity equal to one-third of the present output of the country.

South Africa especially has been prosperous during the war years with a state income rising nearly sicty per cent during the last eight years. Over three thousand new companies have been formed and British and Canadian capital is flowing in. French and Swiss bankers are said to be planning to transfer Italian factories bodily to South Africa.

But especially is American capital increasing. Our State Department has announced that British Colonies will be the primary source from which the United States can make good stock-piling for raw materials and deficiancies in o ther sources. American capital in South Africa has doubled since 1939.

Sir Arthur Salter points out that America must encourage productive foreign investments on a large scale; that countries like China, India, Russia cannot be good fields for investment because there is no assurance against confiscation. But the colonial empires of Great Britain, France, and Holland offer the best market for sale of capital equipment. From the Belgian Congo, the United States in 1946, bought three thousand six hundred and fifty tons of uranium for which it paid over five million dollars.

This is but a partial picture of the growing concentration of world capital investment in Africa, attracted by cheap labor and by government conditions which will encourage access to raw material with low taxation and with every advantage for exploitation.

Naturally, this condition brings up many questions. First, on the part of England itself, what is going to be the object and end of this concentration of capital in Africa?

Planning For Africa

The Fabian Society, planning for the Labor Government, puts the matter this way: In the period from 1950 to 1955, joint British, French, Belgian, South African and Egyptian planning should be agreed upon; and could in twenty years change the face of Africa and of its place in world economy as much as the Russians have changed the face of Soviet Asia. Such hoint action could reproduce TVA's in the valleys of the Nile, Congo, Niger, and Zambesi. This twenty year development program would create an enormous source of supply of primary products and a large new market for manufactued goods. For this, there must be provided, labor, power, transport, homes, and social services for the white workers who immigrate to direct this development. In this way capitalist exploitation of the colonies can be carried on by a planned development of their resources, based on sharply rising living standards for the native people and the effective participation of these people in the organization and administration of this development. "That participation is vital, if Africa is to be recreated; we must stop doing things for the Africans and start doing things with them."

This is a heartening and interesting forecast, but how far is it really inspiring the thought of the investing world? In the discussion and planning, contradiction and overtones appear. For instance, in June, 1948, a member of Parliament pointed out that possibly more good could be done for England by investing in marginal land and rough grazing land and bringing it into production. The Joint Parliament Secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture replied, that England depends on imports for about ninety-five per cent of its oils and fats, and that the peanut scheme is not being done to help the Africans or Australia, but to get much needed additionas supplies of these things for Britain.

When it comes to the matter of Migration of white paople to Africa for technical knowledge and direction of the new development, the schemes ran into difficulties and prejudices. Lord Tweedsmuir said in the House of Lords, "Upon the successful redistribution of the British race depends the whole future of the British Commonwealth." But what is to be the relation of these white Britishers to the dark people of Africa? We know the attitude of white Englishmen in the Union of South Africa, in Kenya and even in West Africa toward the natives. But even in England itself, there is the color bar. Black students and visitors have so much difficulty in finding accommodations that special hostels are being opened. Great Britain which followed South Africa and Rhodesia in favor of a policy of racial privilege and segregation and domination of the blacks by the whites, would not hope to retain any part of Asia in the British Commonwealth.

Poverty And The Past

Another difficulty has been pointed out. As one writer says, "we are trying to make our people believe that there are vast resources of food to come out of Africa to help this country, but if the natives of Africa are fed properly there will be no surplus to come out of Africa, and the sooner the Government lets the people of this country know the facts the better. The natives are increas ng to a tremendous extent, and they are unable to provide food for themselves at the present time. The colonies, to be sure, have been prosperous during the war because of the goods which they have furnished; but nevertheless, most of this production has gone to Europe and the taxable capacity of most colonials is low."

Mr. Rankin, a member of Parliament from Glasgow, said on January 20, 1948, that the government ought to be reminded "that for every £12 of wealth created in Africa in the past, we took out £11 and left £1. And England cannot forget what Lord Palmerston said to his Tiverston constituents just one hundred years ago: "The crimes committed in regard to African slavery and the African slave trade, if they could be put together, are, I am sure, greater in amount than all the crimes that every were committed by the human race from the beginning of the world to the present time."

Many difficulties are being pointed out. For instance, in 1946 the total revenue of British African colonies averaged $4.00 a hand.

The figure for the United Kingdom the same year showed an average of nearly $300.00 a head.. This illustrates the problem of poverty in Africa. The introduction of any substantial amount of mechanization or large scale production in African colonies would necessarily involve something like a social revolution. Suppose that a great saving of labor, up to ninety-three per cent, as has been mentioned in the case of extracting oil from the palm, to whom would this saving go? To the investor, the white manager, white technical skill or the native labor?

It was said in the House of Commond January 20, 1948, "Labor is one of the problems that has never been properly faced by the originators of this scheme, it is thought that the African native is a source of cheap labor... We have to give the native primary education, better food, and more incentives, if production is started before labor supply is in the right position the difficulties will be accentuated. They should have good villages with their own schools and hospitals, and they should be better fed, and given a higher standard of living so that they would be able to do the work. Before any steps to increase production are taken, these provisions must be made."

A member of parliament speaking in Amsterdam recently declared, "Those of us who have any experience in the administration ofoveresea territories must make it clear to our colleagues at home that any discussion of the place of the oversea territories in a Western Union must keep in the forefront the interest of the oversea peoples. If the idea is inadvertently spread that the decisions of the peoples for whom we are responsible in Africa and Asia can be settled in London or Paris or Brussels or The Hague without consulting them, We shall get trouble and we shall deserve it."

The determination of white leaders in Africa to dominate the balcks is continually expressed. In the Union of South Africa, two million white people are ruling ten million colored and Asiatics without giving them voice in government, and keeping them in economic dependence and poverty. In Kenya, the same policies are being pursued.

When the Rhodesia National Affairs Association met in Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, N. H. Wilson developed the idea of "Capricorn Africa", to include all those states between the Equator and the Tropic of Capricorn, that is Uganda, Kenya, Ganganyika, the Belgian Congo, Angola, the two Rhodesias, Nyasaland, Mozambique, and the Bechuanaland Protectorate, and a portionn of French Equatorial Africa. Capricorn Africa, with an area slightly larger than the United States and a population between 35,000,000 and 40,000,000, would have natural resources richer than those of the United States, except in the matter of petroleum. Wilson's credo was that it is the predestined role of Capricorn Africa to help the natoins of Western Europe to complete economic recovery; Capricorn Africa will embrace only colonial countries where white European politican control is to be premanent.

Even more significant is the situation in Kenya, which was settled originally by South Africans. In Kenya, orignated the idea of making Africa a center of defense of the West against the East. It was first broached in 1923, by a member of the legislative council in his pamphlet The Thermopylae of Africa. He developed the theme that Europe must withdraw from Asia, and that she should make Kenya Colony her center of defense and rule in Africa. He believed, that confronted by the fast approaching crisis in the relations of the primary races of mankind, the white race has no choice but to abondon its nineteenth century attitude of aggressive expansion and to collect and reorganize its diminished strength within defensible lines thereto await the shock of the Asiatic onslaught.

He was of the opinion that the first necessity will be to decide where to draw defensive lines. They, of course, will be first in white countries, and second, it should remember that Africa is the most important unit of the group of territories which whites d dominate outside of Asia. Africa's immense area, her fertility, her numerous population, her geographical position all are in her favor. So great are her potentialities that control of Africa may prove to be the decisive factor in the coming conflict of the primary races.

East Africa Empire Defense

It is a singular confirmation of this forecast that in January, 1948, it was announced that a huge military stores depot was under construction at McKennon Road, Kenya, sixty-five miles from the coast. Today there are thousands of white troops and engineers at this base; there are 2,000 Italian artisans flown in from Rome, and there are thousands of African laborers. Thirty-five miles of jungle are being cleared; water is being piped seventy miles. Here is being collected in stone and iron buildings, hundreds of thousands of tons of war material from North Africa and the Middle East.

We turn now to the really crucial point, what is Africa itself thinking? Or perhaps we should say , does Africa think? Negro opinion is beginning to make itself heard. In London the League of Colored People says in its chief organ: "Mere promises of benefits to come will not be convincing. Too often in the past the people of Africa have been beguiled by fair words and fine promises; these they complain, have done nothing to increase their standard of living, and when the fricans themselves have attempted to express an opinion on how improvement in their society might be achieved they have been prosecuted for sedition."

It goes on to say that when the Labor Government came to power in Great Britain, many Africans were prepared to welcome the change of administration in the hope that it would lead to radical changes in colonial policy and administration. In Africa generally, and more particularly in East Africa, these hopes have been sadly doomed. These circumstances are not in keeping with the avowed principles of the British Labor movement and their continued existance presumes the failure of the local governments to put into practical working the principles which prominent ministers in the labor government maintain they desire to see implemented in Africa. But it asks, "do the ministers really mean what they say?

George Padmore, a colored West Indian resident of London, details the present difficulties in colonial administration in British Colonies. He declares that the grievances in Africa are racial, economic and social. The economic problems rise from the land problem in East and South Africa where natives have been dispossessed of their land by Europeans and concentrated in special areas known as reserves. There they are subjected to direct hut and poll taxes in order to force them to seek employment on the plantation or in the mines.

The British colonial governor he says is a trinity: he represents the King; he is chief executive; he advises with a legislative council, but in most important decisions, by his veto and reserved powers, he is the real source of colonial legislation. Natives participate in government by the device of "indirect rule." This was introduced into West Africa by Lord Lugard, when he lacked enough white troops to conquer the region. He left local government in the hands of the chiefs; but by power of appointing and dismissing them, by paying them out of government moneys, and in general controlling their actions, he made the British Commissioner the real ruler of West Africa. A diffuse native bureaucracy was superimposed on the old feudal and tribal systems. The chiefs are not subject to the democratic control of their people but derive their powers direct from the government.

As Margery Pelham, a white Englishwoman, says: "Most educated Africans, especially in West Africa and the Sudan, critize and strongly condemn indirect rule. They say it gives power to uneducated chiefs and elders instead of the educated; that it strengthens tribal feeling and so continues the disunity of the country. It is, they say, part of the old policy of 'divide and rule' by which an imperial power keeps its subjects weak and prevents their advance toward self-government." Despite all this, the British administrator is usually honest and efficient. Under him West Africa has progressed; the native rulers have made great and notable advance. But the Africans complain, too much is done for them and not with them. The rulers reply, the natives want more than they are fit to provide.

Politics in all African colonies conform to a pattern which varies from territory to territory only as to the relative importance of the following factors: (1) White settlers who work for self-rule, with white supremacy both in economics and in politics; (2.) Big Business which works for monopolistic concerns and control over labor; (3.) Alien racial groups who demand equality in all ways with the whites; (4.) A handful of native intelligenstia frustrated and resentful who agitate for "Africa for the Africans," "down with the color bar" and, at the same time, demand increased social services; and (5.) Government with indirect rule trying to hold down the lid.

In addition to this, there must not be overlooked the great mass of people of Africa, the "ignorant man and his wife with a hoe." They are protected from their aggressive neighbors, and have some modern medical aid, a little education, sanitation and use of machinery. They can sell their crops more or less freely in the world market and they have perhaps doubled in number in thirty years. They pay comparatively little attention to either social leaders or agitatiors, but want to be left undisturbed; yet someday they may be touched off by a firebrand or inspired by a prophet.

A native of West Africa declares that West Africans have shown phenomenal advance in the direction of self-confidence and native consciousness. Even admitting the good faith of the British government, they demand to be treated as colleagues and consulted fairly and fully in all decisions that are taken about their country and people. This just the type of situation that makes for impatience and frayed nerves.

On the other hand, there is on the part of the white administrator resentment, that despite all the government is doing for the people they are not grateful, and their leaders continue to malign it. There is constant complaint that the people are not being consulted in the drawing up of plans and in their execution; a conflict of paternalism, "father knows best," versus nationalism, "we must be consulted." There is widespread feeling among many Africans and Europeans that if there is to be cooperation between Africans and British, there is need for responsible Africans to speak freely on all subjects respecting themselves and their country.

Violence and Strikes

In South Africa have occurred at least twenty riots and disturbances varying from the student strike at Lovedale to the burning of their passes by 7000 natives at Capetown, and culminating in the strike of 50,000 Negro miners in August, 1946, to obtain a wage of $2.00 a day, instead of the 45 cents they are receiving. Five strikers were killed by the police, 62 arrested by breach of contract and conspiracy, 46 of whom were heavily fined or jailed. Raids and arrests continued for a month, including arrest of some liberal whites. "Communism" was blamed for the outbreak.

In Kenya, in January, 1947, 7000 natives struck, affecting eleven business concerns. After failure to satisfy the strikers, the strike spread to Uganda with disturbances at four centers. It was finally settled by a raise in wages of more than twenty-five per cent.

In West Africa, there were serious disturbances in Nigeria and on the Gold Coast. In Nigeria, in 1944, increased government allowances were granted white employees but postponed for Negros. In 1945, a general strike of 150,000 non-clerical workers was declared and eventually brought a fifty per cent increase in wages. Later there were further strikes of electrical workers, metal workers, and employees of the United African Company. Miners struck in the Ashanti Gold mines and secured increased wages.

On the Gold Coast, strikes finally assumed the aspect of civil war. In 1946 a commission under the white Chief Justice found that the cost of living had gone up two hundred per cent and recommended increased wages to government employees. Another commission under an African judge advised a minimum wage for other employees of 32 cents to 40 cents in the country districts, and 60 cents a day in the towns. Teachers then complained, and a third commission gave them increases. Railway workers and miners then asked for raises, struck when they were refused, and gained their demands after several weeks.

Then came a colony-wide boycott against high prices charged by importing concerns, led by a progressive chief. A price control commission was set up to curb prices and reduced them by thirty-three and one third per cent. The demobilized soldiers thereupon started a march to the Governor to present a petition. There ensued a skirmish with the police, which led to rioting and looting. In additional fighting 25 Africans were killed and 277 injured including 15 whites. Many prominent black men were arrested. The black soldiers of the Gold Coast, Sierra Leone and Nigeria refused to bear arms against their fellow soldiers, and white units in Gibralter were alerted. Two battleships were ordered from South Africa.

Finally the Governor appealed to the chiefs and to London, and a London commission of inquiry was sent out.

In 1947, a railway strike of 12,000 workers crippled the whole transport system of French West Africa. The strikers demanded "equal pay for equal work."

Northeast Africa has had strikes. In March, 1947, five hundred dock workers struck at Port Sudan, in the Egyptian Sudan; in July, ten thousand railway workers at Atbara walked off the job; in Ethiopia, five thousand railway employees refused to work until the Emperor obtained a twenty-five per cent increase in wages.

Labor Unions

These strikes and many others that have taken place all over the continent of Africa, show that there is an increase in the activity of trade unions and union organization in Africa. In most of the territories there is legislation to permit trade unions, but some of it is antiquated and in many cases as in East Africa it is on paper rather than actually in force. No African in Northern Nigeria , for instance, is a member of a trade union; and although in the Union of South Africa there are one hundred and twenty native trade unions claiming one hundred and sixty thousand members, these unions are not officially recognized; however some effort was being made to that end before the last election.

The West African movement, on the other hand is growing in stature and power. In French West Africa the movement also has taken on strenth and force; and there was a federation of trade unions which met in Dakar, French West Africa, in April 1947. Eighteen delegations of Negro trade unions attended and recommendations were made to be considered at the world labor meeting at Prague in June.

The most significant occurrence in the African labor world was the representative character of the Africans at the World Trade Union Conference in February 1945. Colonial delegates came from Nigeria, The Gold Coast, Sierra Leone and Gambia in West Africa besides from many Negro communities in America.

Wallace Johnson of West Africa, who but a few weeks before his arrival had been released by the British Government after five and a half years' imprisonment in exile, for trade union activity, presented a "charter of labor" for the colonies, demanding: the abolition of racial discrimination in public and private employment, forced labor and chold labor, flogging and punishment for breach of labor contract, and caste law legislation; the right of free assembly, free speech, free press and free movement; and "equal pay for equal work irrespective of race, color, creed or sex."

The Intelligentsia

Turning now from the mass of African workers, may we not ask, is there a mass intelligentsia in Africa? If so, what does it want? The effort of people to raise themselves from one social position to a higher one always has something bizarre about it, as well as deep tragedy. We laugh at the effort. England used to laugh at American literature. The white South long laughed at the efforts of American Negroes to get an education. In the same way when Sir Allen Burns, former Governor of the Gold Coast, talking to American missionaries recently said tolerantly, that we must view the situation in Africa realistically, mindful of the possibility that "a small group of not too well-educated persons, clamoring for self-government" might confuse the issues and set the clock back."

This charge has been repeated by Englishmen and especially colonial officials very widely, so that one gets the idea that the leadership in Africa is poorly educated, not too moral, and very selfish. On the other hand, there has been coming to the world, especially since the First World War, a series of statements and arguments from the leaders of the African people so significant as to bear quotation:

On January 6, 1947, in East Africa a black man, the Hon. E. W. Mathu, African Representative on the Kenya Legislative Council, who studied at Oxford, told his people: that they "could not afford to be slaves in a free world; that is was their duty to work hard all the year round to prepare a better world for our children. No people in history has ever risen from the dust to the height of a respected nation without struggle. No people has ever achieved freedom without working, fighting, or dying for it." He told them they must not expect to be an exception, but to work hard and hold their own without submitting to indignities and subhuman treatment."

Continuing, he advised them that "to raise the standard of living thay must act together. Tribal boundaries must go; they must refuse to be separated or divided by anybody. All Africans must organize as members of one nation. If color bar, discrimination, and all the other evils are to be ended, African territories under European rule and the independent African States of Ethiopia and Liberia must organize on a continental scale."

In London, in the early part of 1947 a delegation representing the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons, a federation of 183 political parties, trade unions, professional associations, farmers and peasants organizations, tribal unions, and youth groups, laid before the Secretary of State for Colonies a Protest against the Constitution which had been forced upon Nigeria. Their statement said:

> "We are unwilling to continue the reactionary policy of making our legislative chamber a debating society for the amusement of British colonial administrators. We resent the idea of having your paid civil servants run our country as an untrammelled bureaucracy, enabling them to make, interpret, and administer our laws, without our knowledge and consent, and without out being effectively represented in such chamber by councillors or legislators of our own choice. We demand the right to assume responsibility for the government of our country. We demand the right to be free to make mistakes and profit form our experience."

Pan Africa, the Organ of blac folk resident in Great Britain, but most of whom were born in the colonies, publishes an editorial in September, 1947, which said that, "if there were amongst African people any optimistic dreamers who believed that colonial freedom could be achieved by Round Table Conferences and the benevolent coopetation of foreign rulers, the events in the Far East should have given them a rude awakening. To every African man and woman it should be crystal clear that the path to colonial freedom is the same in Whatever part of the world a subject people struggle towards their liberation. "The jungle law of twentieth century imperialism is still in force, and a man of sense knows what to expect if he attempts to bargain with a tiger."

Education

Paraphrasing Abraham Lincoln, Julian Huxley recently said that: "man cannot exist half illiterate and half literate." How much education or centers of modern culture are there in Africa? In certain parts, especially in Sierre Leone, the Gold Coast, and Nigeria, there exists an intellectual elite, a native bourgioisie which is a class consistituting the vanguard of progressive political movements. They and their sons have studied at American and European universities, and represent mainly several generation of culture and political consciousness.

In other areas, like the Protectorates, and in countries like Uganda, tribal or semi-feudal social institutions persist, even though these communities are not educated in modern ways. Here and elsewhere from the younger elements, there is emerging a class of natives dissatisfied with the status quo demanding wider and fuller education and better social conditions.

The overall facts are that even in the most advanced parts of Africa, only one African in twenty is able to read and write; most of the schooling is provided by the missionaries, with some government assistance. The former governor of Nigeria says frankly, "Out of a school population of over seven million, to have only four hundred thousand at school is a sta tling position." But again and again the official attitude is expressed, as, for instance, by Sir Wilfred Woods in a survey of conditions in East African colonis; "None of the territy possesses a taxable capacity which could provide sufficient funds anything approaching universal elementary education even up to the first three or four standards without drastic curtailment of what must, for the time being, be deemed the prior claims of economic development."

Here again one faces a paradox. As a Negro puts it, "the conscious policy of imperialism is to keep colonial economics backward and colonial peoples ignorant. So long as such countries remain merely agrarian appendages to the mother country--that is, sources of raw material and also markets for manufactured commodities--there is no need to educate the people."

Imperialism cultivates a small section of native intellectuals to man the lower offices and functions of the civil service and of commerce. If the countries were industrialized it would be essential to increase education since it is impossible to carry on modern mechanized production with uneducated workers.

Meantime a part of the problem of Negro education is being answered by the extraordinary influx of African students into England. The Welfare Department of the Colonial office reported, in February, 1948, that there were thirty-two hundred colonials studying in Great Britain and the number was increasing. In 1941, the total was only eighty. Of the present three thousand, probably a third are from West Africa, and three hundred from the Gold Coast alone.

An Inter-University Council for Higher Education in the British Colonies has made its first report after investigation, and plans universities in East and West Africa, when funds are available to extend present beginnings. Principals have been appointed for Makerere in Uganda and Ibadan in Nigeria, and Gordan College in the Sudan will be strengthened.

Thus the black intelligentsia has been built up on narrow foundations of a few higher schools in Africa, and migration to England and America for study. Small wonder its results are meagre and unfinished. The miracle is that so many intelligent black leaders are arising and building the great inert ignorant mass amid the opposition of investment and race hate.

What is Africa?

All this has been an imperfect survey of a vast continent, where reliable information is difficult to obtan. As a matter of fact, in a sense our very basis of inquiry is faulty, when we speak of "Africa." There is no one entity with such physical, historical and social unity as would permit it intelligently to be called by one name. Considering tribe, history and social condition, very many Africans might be distinguished. But for intelligent study under present conditions, there are six Africas--regions which show such general unity of development and condition as to give a unified designation real meaning.

West Africa

First there is West Africa, perhaps the best known generally. It is the gate of the continentfrom the West. Its tropical climate hot sunshine and lush vegetation on the low coastal belt, rising to the great inland plateau, fulfills our usual idea of Africa. It covers today for our purposes British West Africa and Liberia. The leadership of black Africa centers here and this growing group yet may well lead the continent to autonomy. It will be a firerce, long road, with Great Britain determined not for long years, if ever, to realease its hold on West African labor and products. Yet this region is securing more and more education, increased native wealth and clearer understanding of the white world and its methods.

Nigeria, the largest British colony, is one-third the size of Europe and has a population of approximately twenty-three millions. It has twenty-five publications and a total daily circulation of newspapers amounting to perhaps thirty-five thousand. It has twenty thousand miles of road and two thousand miles of railway.

West Africans are now within the orbit of world commerce and world crisis, but they are poor. Many of them are existing on five hundred to six hundred calories, compared with twelve hundred or eighteen hundred, which istoday described as too little for the people of Europe. The Africans know the reasons for this poverty. A nigerian woman recently said: "There is a constant drain of wealth from Nigeria, and it is because we know this that we cannot be expected to become enthusiastic over the Colonial Welfare and Development Fund. Considering the vast wealth that Nigeria has poured into the pockets of English trading houses and mining companies through the years, to say nothing of the incalculable contributions made to the Allied cause in two World Wars in manpower, ingoods, and services, it strikes us as ironical now to be offered the almost paltry amount of £23,000,000 as evidence of the genorosity of Great Britain to her family of Colonies. Were Nigeria an independent country there is not doubt that Britain would be very greatly in her debt, even as she is now in debt to Egypt."

Tosay a strong Nigerian movement under Aziwike is making England yield ground; he demands a ten year condominium, five years home-rule by one thousand trained Nigerians, then independence. Failing to get that he proposes to appeal to the United Nations, and after that, "direct action." A rival youth organization and a newer union of the powerful Yorubas may spell division, as the English hope; on the other hand, it may lead to wider union and irresistible strength.

Liberia has never been independent. She has had first to fight native tribes for a foothold; and then for a half century exercise all her skill toescape the imperialisms of Britain, France and Germany, only to be driven into the hands of American capital. She desperately needs today an intelligentsia to restore the remanants of her freedom in the face of militarism and corporations from America.

South Africa

Second in importance comes South Africa; rising in plateaus to the bastion of the Cape, the Union, the Rhodesias, the Protectorates and the mandate of South West Africa. Here, after a wild scramble which raised all of the worst of human passions and a few of the best, we have today, inland from the Cape once called Good Hope, the greatest center of human race hate in the world. In the Union of South Africa there are today, two million three hundred and thirty-five thousand four hundred and sixty white folk who have complete political domination over seven million seven hundred and thirty-five thousand eight hundred and nine blacks and one million one hundred and eighty-seven thousand five hundred and eighty-none colored folk and Asiatics. This dominion of eleven million persons extends the right to vote only to its two and a half million white citizens. The African, although a taxpayer, has no right of citizenship. He is barred largely from skilled industry; his trade unions are not recognized, and he is denied the right to strike. Legislation prohibits him from acquiring land in cities , forces him to carry a pass, and deprives him of the right to seek free employment. The arrests of natives, especially for the violation of the laws about carrying passes, coming to cities, and failure to pay poll tax, leads to two hundred thousand arrests in a single year; whereas in England, with four times the population, only thirty thousand are arrested. Urban Negroes are housed for the most part in noisome shanty towns with no decencies of civilized life. Taxation and economic compulsion drive the African from the reserves to the mines, where he is housed and segregated in barracks. His average wage while so employed is approximately $200. a year.

There are four urgent needs for the black population, and their representative councils have repeated these many times. Removal of the industrial color bar, more land, abolition of caste laws, and the extension of the franchise. The land situation by the law of 1938 gives the eighteen million natives twelve per cent of the total land area of the Union, leaving two hundred and fifty million acres for the less than two million five hundred thousand whites.

The native group is now split roughly into three parts; two million live in cities, three million live on the white farms in the country, and three million on the reserves. Two-thirds of the whites are in cities and one third on the land.

For a long time the gold mining industry, based on cheap black immigrant labor, has been looked upon as the backbone of South African economy. Now industry is outstripping the mines. With this new dependence upon industry, what is going to be the future of South Africa? If they look toward manufacturing for a white market it will be a long time before the white market of Africa reaches five million; and if they are going to manufacture for the native population, then they native population must receive larger income by far than it does now.

The total expenditure for Negro education, 1946-47 is ten million dollars, in addition to three and a half millions for school feeding. The Institute of Race Relations says that, "these funds are, of course, quite inadequate and cannot keep pace with the natural increase in the school age population, let alone overtake the existiong shortage." In 1941 out of 1,125,000 Africans of school age, 347,050 were in school. About eighty-five per cent leave school before standard third.

The last few years in South Africa have seen difficult race relations. Hostility among Negroes and Asiatics toward the whites has grown. There has been violence, culminating in the strike of the African mine workers in 1946, and the climax was reached when Africam members of the native representative council adjourned indefinitely in August. They alleged breach of faith on the part of the government in its dealings with the council, and called for immediate abolition of all discriminating legislation.

In the meantime, and more menacing than the race relations, is the fact that there is already slackening in economic activity in South Africa. After a long period of continuous expansion, the nation's rate of growth is beginning to decrease. Today there is more uncertainity and doubt about the immediate economic outlook than at any time since 1940. And it is at this time that the Smuts government has been overthrown on the issue of increased segregation and suppression of the darker races. A Negro leader, Z.K. Matthews comments: "I am convinced that the Nationalists will with the connivance of many non-Nationalist Europeans put into effect against non-Europeans all the things that they have wanted for so long." However, in their struggle for a better place in the South African sun, the African people remain undaunted and the retrogressive action, which they now expect, will only serve to make them more determined to close their ranks and organize themselves better for fight that lies ahead."

The Institute of Race Relation says: "We feel bound to issue a warning that if this situation in the field of race relations is allowed to deteriorate further, it will before long reach a stage in which the voice of reason will not be heeded."

Adjacent to South Africa lie the Negro Protectorates, Basuto-land, Bechuanaland, and Swazi-land, now administered by the British colonial office under treaty. On account of the stubborn resistence of the natives, especially the Basutos, these territories were annexed by treaty and given a considerable degree of autonomy. South Africa has long desired to annex them and Malan will probably make another attempt to do so. They are meanwhile slaowly but stubbornly dying of economic starvation and throttling of outlet and enterprise at the hands of both British and South Africans.

Nyasaland and the Rhodesias lie between South Africa and East Africa and are pushing for automony with the power in the hands of whites. Here will take place in the future some of the most severe cases of racial strife and antagonism. Here are vast arcres of land rich for farming and untold mineral wealth. A small but close-knit group of whites are set to carry out the South African pattern with a smaller ruling class and a less educated mass of serfs.

East Africa

East Africa is a physical sport of nature with snow-capped peaks on the equator and that vast rift in the earth, visible from the moon, if there are eyes there to see! With the deepest lakes in the world, sloping down to the coast that for centuries has knit Africa and Asia. Here are three lands, Tanganyika, Uganda and Kenya. Tanganyika has only fifteen personsto each of its 360,000 square miles, with five million natives and seventy thousand whites. Nobody votes, but the whites are assuming ownership of men and resources. Diamonds and other minerals are being exploited and here Britain is placing her peanut culture scheme. The land is being slowly seized and the natives get almost no education.

Elspeth Huxley says that from Tanganyika to Uganda one passes "from vastness and poverty to a compact tidy, closely administered, relatively wealthy country, favored by nature with highland and rainfall which has brought abundance andcomparative prosperity to most of its people."

Uganda is the still unconquered remnant of a series of African empires. It was long the victim of white religious strife and emerged as a British "protectorate" with some autonomy and wealth in its retention of wonership of its land. Ugands has 95,000 square miles andfour million people. The black ruling class consists of landholders and employers, who import labor from the Belgian Congo and the Nile valley. Uganda has started on an educational program. Here is Makerere College, which may yet become the black university of East Africa. Ten years ago there were 270,000 children in school, and presumabley there has been considerable advance since, although figures are not available. Information concerning Uganda is regularaly suppressed because this is a country which can easily folfow the lead of West Africa and become the center of a movement toward autonomy. It has long history of indigenous culture. Its economic problems are severe and the encroachment of investing capital is threatening.

In Kenya we go up toward the mountains of the moon, where on 225,000 square miles, there is a population of three and a half million. Here 25,000 whites have monopolized the most fertile eighty per cent of the land, and have tried to compel the Negroes to work for them. The blacks, densely crowded in lowland, desert and swamp, have made a fierce struggle for opportunity. They have forced their cause on the British and gained vacillating sympathy. Once their interests were declared "paramount" as compared with the immigranting South Africans and English; but little has been done to implement this declaration. Less than one-fifth of the school population is in mission and government schools, and the wealth accruing to the whites from monopoly of land (which cost them almost nothing), transport and investment have given the ruling clique vast power. The only fly in their ointment is a large contingent of Indian merchants who dispute the division of profits and lately have been joining the natives in their opposition to white control. Surrounded by the Sudan, Ethiopia and Uganda, white rule in Kenya will have no easy path to complete domination.

The Nile Valley

At the head of the valley of the Nile stands Ethiopia on the citadel of Africa; restored to independence. It has had a fierce struggle with Britain, who is not certain whether this country will prove a fortress against Asia or a threat to Europe. Both Italy and Britain are seeking colonial claims which would strip Ethiopia of her outlet to the sea, and both Europe and America are seeking to get control of the resources of this rich land. Meanwhile, Ethiopia is striving in poverty to educate her masses, is sending students abroad for higher education and technical skill and is using Russins, Scandinavians and American Negroes to build up industry and sanitation. The Emperor is a wise and brave man, but he is not getting from the United Nations or from European civilization the aid and encouragement he so sorely needs. If Ethiopia once reaches real economic independence, the end of the domination of Europe in Africa will be in sight.

Down the Nile valley from Etiopia lies the Sudan, the source of ancient Egyptian civilization, the last bastion which in the 19th century drove Britain out of its borders for thirteen years and nearly gave North Africa to Ethiopia and France. Kitchener and Egypt recaptured the Sudan, until in our day Egypt seeking independence from the British Empire finds itself losing the Sudan. The Sudan controls the Nile, the life-line ofEGypt. The Sudan is the broad path to British East Africa. Who controls the Sudan will, with an independent Ethiopia, control East and Central Africa. Consequently both Egypt and England are today wooing the seven million black people on the million acres of the Sudan. The Sudanese remember how Mehemet Ali of Egypt spoiled this land with rape and slave trade and how still Egypt draws the color line in politics and industry. But they also remember that the English desecrated the tomb of the Mahdi and have favored the Sudanese and educated them for the civil service only in order to supplant the Egyptians. A duel is going on today. One party led by a descendant of the Mahdi wants independence from Egypt. Another party wants to remain under the Egyptian domination. To clinch her claims, Britain is increasing Egyptian education. Gordon College is being enlarged and general education spread.

The fifth part of Africa, Algeria, Tunis and Morocco we will pass over for lack of space and concentrate on the last part.

Latin Africa

The sixth part of Africa we may call Latin Africa. It composes the vast African Empire of France, the great valley of the Congo, the remains of the Portuguese African Empire and the small enclaves owned by Spain,.

Here, so far as France and Portugal are concerned, we have a rather curious situation; a promise of justice and equality which amounts to the training of a small elite, separating them from the masses and turning them into Frenchmen and Portuguese with full rights; but leaving the mass of people in those territories without leadership or guidance and at the mercy of some of the worlst sorts of commercial exploitation. France has a complete educational system for her colonies. There are higher schools for medicine and engineering and, for those who can afford it, no difficulty in attending the great schools and univeristies in France. But this meand that education has not touched the mass of the French African people. A black African like Diagne may rise to cabinet position, but he married a French wife and his family became practically French. Eboue becomes a great governor of wide renown, but still the black mass is untouched.

Recently President Auriol greeted the new Union Francaise: "To you who come from all parts of the world, from all countries, from all religions, from all races, from all origins, from all conditions--to all of you, citizens of the Union Francaise, and to the people whom you represent, France extends with joy her fraternal greeting." But the exact form of this federation of colonies with France and the actual power that is going to be in the hands of the colonies is by no means certain.

In the meantime, one reads the memoirs of Emile Faure. Faure is the grandson of the great Samory, former Sultan of Nigeria, who fought back the French for eighteen years and finally, in 1898, was captured and exiled. His grandson has spent much time in Africa and is now living in Paris, working as an engineer. He says:

> "The lamentable condition of the Negroes in the French Colonies is a direct outgrowth of their political status, and this may be easily summed up in four words. They have no rights. Like the serfs of the Middle Ages they are 'taxable and workable at will' and the administration, like the seigneur, has the right of life and death over them."

In Portugal the official news is heartening. There is a five year plan in Angola and an appropriation for social work in Mozambique. Angola has a housing program, increased minimum wages and irrigation projects, together with a proposed large hydro-electric plant and new labor laws. There is a port development at Beira, which may become a center of exportationfor all of East Africa; and in 1945 Portuguese Guinea celebrated its four hundredth anniversary.

Yet reports from travellers are disconcerting. Susan Welty charges state slavery: a "planned economy" which steals the peasant's produce and deliberately stifles education. And here again, the elite, the mulatto, the rich, escape and can become equal citizens of Portugal, or better a part of the exploiting regime in Angola or Mozambique.

A secret report in 1946 on Angola says, "The conditions under which Africans live in Angola are now almost unendurable. In fact, many don't live; they die at an early age due to the hardships imposed upon them." Taxes are 100 to 120 angolares a year, while laborers earn one and a half angolares a day when employed. Every device is taken to make workers default on tax payments, in which case they are sold to private employers under contract with nominal wages and terms lastingfrom three to ten years. Villagers flee to the bush to escape this slavery, homes are broken up, and often scarcely a single able-bodied man can be found in some villages. There is no regular government educational system, no sanitation, nor social services."

We come now to the heart of Africa, the vast tropical bowl of the Belgian Congo, which lies between West and East Africa and borders on the Sudan and Rhodesia. The Congo river system is the second greatest in the world, encircling an area 750 miles wide and 530 miles long. Forest covers the northern half of the area; grasslands spread across the southeren part, and in the southeast is the healthful country in the Katanga district, which is one of the richest mineral regions in the world. In the Congo before the Belgians came, great native states flourished which were noted for their complex and interesting culture and their art.

In 1943, there were in the Congo 10,500,000 people of whom 35,000 were white. The annexation of the Congo began with Stanley's search for Livingston and ended at the Conference of Berlin in 1885 when Leopold of Belgium, backed by the United States, was given the Congo--which is 77 times the size of Belgium--as his personal estate. Financial difficulties and world criticism compelled him finally to turn over the Congo to the Belgian state. Belgium has never promised the Congo independence or even participation in government. It has developed this region as a commercial enterprise, chiefly controlled by four holding companies in which the government is a partner. The treatment of the natives under Leopold has been improved and the output of the colony especially during and since World War II has been phenomenal. Copper, zinc, palm oil, manganese, tin, uranium, diamonds, and rubber have been exported in constantly increasing quantities. Labor has been carefully conserved so as to make available over eighteen per cent of all the adult males. During the recent war, forced labor was used, but normally the compulsion is indirect through government control of crops to be raised.

Native labor is pursuing most of the semi-skilled and skilled work in the colony. Wages are low and there are no trade unions, unrest crops out now and than, as in three instances in 1945, when soldiers killed seven and wounded sixteen strikers.

Education is supplied mainly by the Catholic Church, with some Protestant missions. It is limited to low-grade primary instruction with emphasis on religion, hygine and respect for authority. About 800,000 pupils are thus taught, but only one per cent continue after this level and receive vocational training for work as artisans, or training as clerks or teachers. There is no opportunity for secondary, higher or professional training in the colony, and no Congolese are allowed in Belgium for study.

Every effort is made in the Congo to keep down agitation and avoid a native intelligent leadership. Plans for widespread social work have been formulated recently with a subvention from Belgium and a colony council for advice, ~~i~~ on which one or two natives will sit. Nevertheless, there are already signs of a native movement which Government reports not and give warning . The so-called "Evolues" publish the "Voix de Congolais" and count 65 circles with 2,829 members, represanting perhaps 10,000 persons. This periodical is "loyal", but progressive. There are, too, some 12,000 mulattoes whose status is still undetermined.

The Congo is ruled on the British "indirect rule" plan, with the chiefs functioning under Belgian officials. The land remains mostly as a government monopoly, with the mass of natives as tenants-will. There has been work in health, sanitation, and the fighting of sleeping sickness and leprosy. Here is a perfect examply of the regimentation of ten million black laborers for the industrial profit of a white nation, with care to make the exploitation a long-term project and not mere planless exploitation for quick and immediate returns. Nevertheless, the object is not, and never was the uplift of the Congo natives nor the giving to them enough education for any effective voice in government or self-expression. This plan is making Belgium rich and powerful; but it is giving black Congo increasing knowledge of modern technique. The question is: how long can t is scheme last, and how far will it go?

Assuming the essentila accuracy of this body of facts, what is its meaningfor world peace? In the early years of this century, I called the results of a similar survey, the "African Roots of War." I believe I was tragically right at that time. But the world has changed in a critical quarter of a century. The advance of the peoples of Africa, while great, has not been revolutionary; but it has been startling and prophetic. The change in the white world has been the greatest revolution in the history of modern man. Together these two sets of phenomena make either for peace or the end of civilization in its present form.

The white world today is facing suicide. Not, to be sure, complete physical annihilation, but a culturalcollapse and a moral breakdown which many centuries will be required to restor, if restoration will ever be possible. If still there can be found enough moral courage to resist a third world war, then one of the first results of that will be the recognition of the utter futility of the colonial system. With use of and cooperation with the emerging intelligentsia, in Africa itself, and in the Negroids of all America; with the help of renascent Asia; and particularly with the direct aid of the soicalist labor meovment in all the world, we may slowly but finallyerase from the minds of men and from political action, the attempt to build civilization on the domination of a few great powers over the mass of the world's workers, still widely spread in Asia, but gradually being concentrated more and more in Africa.

The world today is being led increasingly toward this conclusion by the determined and partially successful effort of the millions of Asia to govern themselves without the control of the white world That colonialism and European domination will disappear from Asia in a foreseeable future is as certain as any future event. This will concentrate colonialism in Africa, and if that continues, it will make the black race the footstool of the world; the one remaining mass of men ruled for other peoples good; worked for other races profit; and spiritually suppressed for the uplift of the rest of the world.

To accomplish this will call for the cooperation of Asia, the working people of Europe and America; and black folk themselves. If Asia, in fear of reconquest or in sympathy, refuses cooperation or even actively intervenes; if the white working classes see or think they see in the continued subjection of Africa, nothing less than remnant of the exploitation from which they themselves are escaping, and perhaps even a weapon to retard their progress in political power and industrial dominance; or finally, if the African refuses longer to submit and begins increasingly to fight with protest, appeal, strikes, and weapons even in the face of frightening white armament; in such case, white colonial imperialism cannot possibly succeed.

If, on the other hand, white civilization continues on the path of total war, it will not only destroy itself, but cannot slow down that process, in the future as in the past, by inducing colonial peoples to help fight for their own slavery. African soldiers have been used to defend, and even expand European colonial imperialism. They were used by both Germany and the Allies in the First World War. Black troops conquered German Africa for the Allies. Black shock troops met the rush of the Germans in France. Black labor supplied the white armies. After the First World War, it was agreed that such use of African military force was dangerous to European civilization and the League of Nations banned it.

But in the Second World War, African soldiers were again used. From British West Africa alone came over 150,000 black soldiers who fought in North African and in Asia. The French used the Senegalese soldiers in the North African campaign. Negroes from East Africa were used in the Ethiopian campaign, and black non-combatant contingents were in the South African Army. Altogether it is probable that between a quarter and a half million black soldiers were used to help Europe overthrow Hitler and Japan, and to these must be added the soldiers of Negro descent from the United States and West Indies.

It is doubtful if in the future, even the ignorance and inexperience of black folk can be counted on to help hold Africa in subjection to Europe and to American investors, and the stubborn, thoughtless determination of the United States to inherit, rule and expand a world industrial empire dying before its and of whose death, Russia is symptom and not cause. America may fight Russia but she cannot prevent the increasing socialization of world wealth without killing modern culture. Already between Asia and Africa the lines of alliance appear. Out of 8,404 pilgrims to Mecca in 1946, 6,886 camefrom black West Africa. The Moslem population of French West Africa has increased from three to eight millions in ten years. African delegates were invited to the Pan-Inter-Asian Conference in 1947. Indians and Africans are cooperating in South Africa and Kenya. An Indian woman defended Africa before the United Nations, and the Union of South Africa is facing a hostile world opinion in its frank race-hate program. Gandhi began his career in Africa in defense of natives. Negroes are pouring into the trade unions of America, and the Labor Government of England is having difficulty in steering a course between the great British industrial hierarchy in Africa and the demands of African labor. The powerful British trade unions have met and conferred with African and West Indian unionists.

These facts put on the Africans themselves, the onus of forcing the final overthrow of colonialism by continued and increased determination to be modern men. Their movement is spearheaded by their kin in America. They cannot fail. Their triumph is Peace, because colonialism and labor exploitation are the ultimate causes of war.

THE AFRICAN ROOTS OF PEACE

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

The New Africa

In England today, Africa is news. For a long time Africans have complained, "If there is an Iron Curtain in Eastern Europe, nevertheless, we hear more of events there than we do about African colonies." But today this is changing, and a British daily says: "African development has at last a news value. Even in the daily papers of the United Kingdom, the British West African colonies figure prominently from time to time. There are references to conferences with other powers who have colonies in Africa, and it goes on to say, "There are few people, however, who realize the urgent importance of Pan-African development; in particular, the cooperation of Great Britain with France, Belgium and Portugal. The fact is that Africa is the hinterland of Europe, both commercially and strategically, and in fulfilling our moral obligations to the native peoples it is essential to create a real defensive bastion against the Communist Eastern bloc."

35-2-216

Here, then, lie the reasons for the new interest in Africa. The greatest economic development in all history started not much more than a hundred years ago in Europe and in the United States; and then, much later, in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, it became revolution. It is now the core of the unrest in Asia, and its influence is beginning to be felt in Africa. This change is the advent of the machine, the application of power to supplement the work of men.

Thus one of the great by-products of the Second World War is the growing importance of Africa. Here is the second greatest land area in the world, with at least one hundred and fifty million people and vast natural resources. England has lost control of India and Burma; France has lost Indo-China, and Holland is losing Indonesia. Still nearer the West comes the threat of the Arabs and Islam, with an independent Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Trans-Jordan, Iraq and Iran. Western European Imperialism must, to survive, center in Africa. Africa becomes increasingly the visible source of food, coal, diamonds, gold, copper and uranium for Europe. France, without food from Algeria, Tunis and Morocco, would starve, and she is holding frantically to Madagascar. Belgium is accumulating wealth and power from the Congo, and Britain is awakening to the possibilities of Africa as a source not only of food but of other materials to restore at least in part here power.

I wish to essay

Here, then, ~~I have essayed~~ a picture of current Africa and its human problems in relation to present day Europe and America, in order to make clear, if possible, the effect which the ~~plight~~ status of Africa will have on the greatest problem of the world today -- peace. My collection of facts is uneven and inaccurate. Africa may be "news" today, but the news is delayed and distorted. A half dozen powerful nations with aims to achieve, many score of local colonial governments with actions to excuse; and native spokesmen of widely varying education, experience and reliability with causes to justify, make it exceedingly difficult to know all the truth with regard to the present condition of African peoples. Gathering of facts from all sorts of sources, with lack of documents, or documents deliberately propaganda, I have sought to come to conclusions which seem to me to be fair, and true in general, if not in every detail

Mr. Bevin, in his review of Foreign Affairs, before the House of Commons, January 22, said: "The free nations of Western Europe must now draw closely together. I believe now the time is ripe for a consolidation of Western Europe, and this consolidation must be supported. And that involves the closest collaboration between the Commonwealth and the overseas territory of the French, Dutch, Belgians and Portuguese. Their raw materials, food and other resources could be of mutual advantage to these territories [illegible] to the world."

Last November, Sir Stafford Cripps said to the African Governors' conference, "The whole future of the sterling group and its ability to survive depends on a quick and vast development of colonial resources. It is to your contribution to the righting of the world unbalance that we must look; and in order to give you the chance of success, we must put behind you all that we can in the way of capital, goods, and supplies." Lord Trefgarne, Chairman of the Colonial Development Corporation, sand in June that United States imports of coffee alone in 1947 were more than three time her total imports of British manufactures. He suggested then that an over-all increase of two hundred million pounds in colonial production should be made during the next ten years.

Angle-French consultations have been under way for creation of an economic grouping by which Western Europe would be linked with the African continent. This bloc would be an element of economic equilibrium between the United States and the Soviet Republic. Sir Oswald Moseley was flatly outspoken; he advocated a union of European people. He saw Europe as the leader, aiming to develop Africa as an estate of the Europeans to solve the economic problem by direct state action. "Africa never was developed by Negroes, who at present are exploited by finance capitalism under cover of Trusteeship hypocrisy."

Others stressed the fact that Africa is divided into territories, nearly all of which belonged to, or were allied to, the nations of Western Europe; and both Africa and America are affiliated with Europe and the Western company of nations. Africa can supply the resources needed to rebuild Europe, and the Union of South Africa in particular is rich in the things which Europe requires. Some expressed the belief that South Africa's special contribution to the pattern of peace would be to protect and develop her agricultural, mineral, and industrial wealth and, in collaboration with the territories to the North, to produce things which might help Europe to live again.

"There are immense possibilities of development in the great continent of Africa," said Lord Addison, during the debate on Commonwealth and Empire Migration in the House of Lords. "We must realize a great many of these possibilities, or we shall be in even more distressing circumstances than we are now."

The Earl of Portsmouth said: "Our tropical Colonies demand a far greater administrative technical population than they have had up to date-- namely, farmers, civil servants, engineers, business men and so forth. There is no question that our own population will thrive at the expense of the Native African, for instance. After all, Africa would starve if it were not for the white man's ability to check erosion as much as he has done ... --

"As this would work out, I believe it should be treated as a sort of great co-partnership, as it were, on the lines of a military operation. You would start on your development areas, on the analogy of the Tennessee Valley, ... where you would start on the great work necessary; here, it might be hydro-electric; there, it might be dams; and elsewhere, it might be afforestation. You would move to reclaim that land and develop its area. As the works were completed, so would more people come ....

"In the next two or three years, perhaps only a few hundred thousand can leave this country; but if an ordinary progressive development were to take place, it would mean a continued demand, not only in this country but throughout the Commonwealth, United States and Western Europe for plant and material. And that would keep field and factory, office and business and shipping, all going at full capacity. If we do not do something of this sort, how, when Marshall Aid comes to an end, are we likely to avoid the disaster of a world slump -- a slump which is already being banked upon by at least one division of the world for its own ends?"

"...England..., struggling to keep its head above water, can give neither hope nor a lead to the nations of Western Europe. With Britain and those nations working to a common purpose, with everything going well, all their industrial resources will be needed. But Europe's Colonial Empire -- and the colonial empires of the French, the Belgians, the Dutch and Purtuguese -- will equally be joining in such a scheme as this. Half the nations of the world can work to save themselves from immediate disaster and ultimate starvation."

Agriculture and Peanuts

Out of this propaganda there have arisen two great developments, British migration to Africa, and the gigantic scheme of planting peanuts in East Africa. In January, 1948, it was said that ninety-five thousand British subjects were registered for passage to South Africa.

This migration was started by the attempt of South Africa and the Rhodesias to increase their white populations. South Africa discovered last Spring that her less than two and a half million whites are increasing at the rate of sixteen and one half per cent in ten years, while her black, colored and Asiatic populations are increasing over eighteen per cent, and amount to nine millions. The Union has been encouraging migration, and immigration centers have been opened in England, Holland, and Rome, with a quota of fifteen hundred a month. Southern Rhodesia has received twenty thousand white immigrants in the last two years, with one thousand arriving monthly now.

Meanwhile, the great scheme to develop Africa as a British food estate has been started. Britain's "Overseas Resources Act provides for two public corporations: the £ 100,000,000 "Colonial Development Corporation," under the Secretary of State for Colonies; and the £50,000,000 "Overseas Food Corporation," under the Minister of Food.

The Colonial Development Corporation is designed for work in colonies and is "Charged with the duty of securing the investigation, formulation and carrying out of projects for developing resources of colonial territories with a view to the expansion of production therein of foodstuffs and raw materials."

The Overseas Food Corporation may work within or outside colonies and is "charged with the duty of" investigating, formulating and carrying out "project for production or processing in places outside the United Kingdom of foodstuffs or agricultural products other than foodstuffs, and the marketing thereof; and as the first project to be carried out by them, securing the large scale production of groundnuts, together with crops rotational therewith or ancillary thereto, in colonial territories in East and Central Africa."

This plan to raise peanuts in East Africa has been called "the most important action of Government in the history of British tropical Africa." The area involved includes parts of Tanganyika, Kenya and Northern Rhodesia, and calls for clearing, planting, and cultivating by mechanized methods over three million acres of land in one hundred and seven farming units of thirty thousand acres each.

The plan was conceived by the United Africa Company, a branch of the hugh Lever Brothers organization, which is already the largest organization engaged in exploiting Africa. The management of the project has been assigned to this company, because while the Government recognized that the management of such an undertaking should properly be a government-owned and financed corporation (and the establishment of such a corporation is to take place "in due course"), it was considered desirable, in order to get the project started quickly, to entrust the management to an existing commercial firm.

Supervision of the project, according to the government's report, would pass first from this company to the government corporation and then to the local governments concerned "at a time and on terms to be agreed in the light of experience of the working of the project." Finally would come the accomplishment of "the more distant goal of transferring the control of the undertaking to the people themselves."

The East African Peanut Project carries further and makes immediate and specific development plans for the colonies which have been laid down for years. In 1947, a ten-year development plan was announced with a prospective expenditure of nearly $500,000,000. Only a small part of this -- perhaps eight million dollars a year during the last few years -- has actually been appropriated. On the other hand, partly public and partly private further plans are being proposed. The palm oil industry in Nigeria is to be expanded. The government has plans for improving the cocoa crop in West Africa and has taken control of its sale. Peanut culture is to be extended on mechanized plantations in West Africa. Cotton, rubber, and hardwoods are also mentioned for development. Mining and hydro-electric power are forecast. There is one plan in Uganda which is called "breathtaking" and which involves the raising of the level of Lake Victoria a yard and thus eventually revolutionalizing the valley of the Nile. There is a similar plan in Northern Rhodesia, designed to develop rich and extensive deposits of iron ore; while in Southern Rhodesia there is a plan for a dam, four times the size of Boulder Dam, to make Southern Rhodesia one of the four chief sources of high grade steel.

New Capital to Africa

Most of these are still in the planning and blue-print stage, but private capital ~~is already at work~~ in Africa has had long experience. In South Africa in the last sixty years $2,500,000,000 worth of gold has been produced out of which nearly $500,000,000 was paid in dividends. Diamonds and other minerals have brought further returns. It is natural, therefore, that when new discoveries were made recently in the Orange Free State, the greatest gold boom in forty years started. The new claims cover over one hundred square miles and call for a working capital of nearly $100,000,000, forecasting a capacity equal to one-third of the present output of the country.

South Africa especially has been prosperous during the war years with a state income rising nearly sixty per cent during the last eight years. Over three thousand new companies have been formed and British and Canadian capital is flowing in. ~~Franch~~ and Swiss bankers are said to be planning to transfer Italian factories bodily to South Africa.

But especially is American capital increasing. Our State Department has announced that British Colonies will be the primary source from which the United States can make good stock.piling for raw materials and deficiencies in other sources. American capital in South Africa has doubled since 1939.

Sir Arthur Salter points out that America must encourage productive foreign investments on a large scale; that countries like China, India, Russia cannot be good fields for investment because there is no assurance against confiscation. But the colonial empires of Great Britain, France, and Holland offer the best market for sale of capital equipment. From the Belgian Congo, the United States in 1946, bought three thousand six hundred and fifty tons of uranium for which it paid over five million dollars.

This is but a partial picture of the growing concentration of world capital investment in Africa, attracted by cheap labor and by government conditions which will encourage access to raw material with low taxation and with every advantage for exploitation.

Naturally, this condition brings up many questions. First, on the part of England itself, what is going to be the object and end of this concentration of capital in Africa? The Times of London, said recently in a leading editorial that the principle governing colonial development in the nineteenth century was that in return for peace and justice, the native people should produce food and raw material for the European market. This meant that commercial enterprise, while slightly raising native standards of life distributed its profits to European shareholders.

The new plan of the Colonial Development and Welfare Act is designed to see that the pace of economic development in the colonies is increased, but this must be consistent with the general welfare of the native people.

The Fabian Society, planning for the Labor Government, puts the matter this way: In the period from 1950 to 1955, joint British, French, Belgian, South African and Egyptian planning should be agreed upon; and could in twenty years change the face of Africa and of its place in world economy as much as the Russians have changed the face of Soviet Asia. Such joint action could reproduce TVA's in the valleys of the Nile, Congo, Niger, and Zambesi. This twenty year development program would create an enormous source of supply of primary products and a large new market for manufactured goods. For this, there must be provided, labor, power, transport, homes, and social services for the white workers who immigrate to direct this development. In this way capitalist exploitation of the colonies can be carried on by a planned development of their resources, based on sharply rising living standards for the native people and the effective participation of these people in the organization and administration of this development.

"That participation is vital, if Africa is to be recreated; we must stop doing things for the Africans and start doing things with them."

This is a heartening and interesting forecast, but how far is it really inspiring the thought of England, and of the investing world? In the discussion and planning, contradiction and overtones appear. For instance, in June, 1948, a member of Parliament pointed out that possibly more good could be done for England by investing in marginal land and rough grazing land and bringing it into production. The Joint Parliament Secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture replied, that England depends on imports for about ninety-five per cent of its oils and fats, and that the peanut scheme is not being done to help Africa or Australia, but to get much needed additional supplies of these things for Britain.

When it comes to the matter of migration of white people to ~~India~~ Africa for technical knowledge and direction of the new development, the schemes run into difficulties and prejudices. Lord Tweedsmuir said in the House of Lords, "Upon the successful redistribution of the British race depends the whole future of the British Commonwealth." But what is to be the relation of these white Britishers to the dark people of Africa? We know the attitude of white Englishmen in the Union of South Africa, in Kenya and even in West Africa toward the natives. But even in England itself, there is the color bar. Black students and visitors have so much difficulty in finding accommodations, that special hostels are being opened.

A curious exemplification of this happened during the Second World War, when large contingents of Negro soldiers were quartered in England. MOTHER AND CHILD, a periodical published in England, called attention in November 1947 to the future of at least five hundred and fifty, perhaps a thousand, colored illegitimate children whose mothers are English and whose fathers are among the colored American service men, now back in their homes in the United States. The American Army would not permit its colored soldiers to marry white women. If this can happen in England and the redistribution of the British race is going to take place in Africa, what is going to be the relation of these immigrants to the millions of black folk there? A Great Britain which followed South Africa and Rhodesia in favor of a policy of racial privilege and segregation and domination of the blacks by the whites, would not hope to retain any part of Asia in the British Commonwealth.

and Poverty on the Past

Another difficulty has been pointed out. As one writer says, "We are trying to make our people believe that there are vast resources of food to come out of Africa to help this country, but if the natives of Africa are fed properly there will be no surplus to come out of Africa, and the sooner the Government lets the people of this country know the facts the better. The natives are increasing to a tremendous extent, and they are unable to provide food for themselves at the present time. The colonies, to be sure, have been prosperous during the war because of the goods which they have furnished; but nevertheless, most of this production has gone to Europe and the taxable capacity of most colonials is low."

Mr. Rankin, a member of Parliament from Glasgow, said on January 20, 1948, that the government ought to be reminded "that for every £12 of wealth created in Africa in the past, we took out £11 and left £1. And England cannot forget what Lord Palmerston said to his Tiverton constituents just one hundred years ago: "The crimes committed in regard to African slavery and the African slave trade, if they could be put together, are, I am sure, greater in amount than all of the crimes that every were committed by the human race from the beginning of the world to the present time."

Many difficulties are being pointed out. For instance, in 1946 the total revenue of British African colonies averaged $4.00 a head. The figure for the United Kingdom the same year showed an average of nearly $300.00 a head. This illustrates the problem of poverty in Africa. The introduction of any substantial amount of mechanization or large scale production in African colonies would necessarily involve something like a social revolution. Suppose that a great saving of labor, up to ninety-three per cent, as has been mentioned in the case of extracting oil from the palm, to whom would this saving go? To the investor, the white manager, white technical staff, or to native labor?

It was said in the House of Commons January 20, 1948, "Labor is one of the problems that has never been properly faced by the originators of this scheme, it is thought that the African native is a source of cheap labor... We have to give the native primary education, better food, and more incentives.

If production is started before labor supply is in the right position, the difficulties will be accentuated. They should have good villages with their own schools and hospitals, and they should be better fed, and given a higher standard of living so that they would be able to do the work. Before any steps to increase prodiction are taken, these provisions must be made."

A member of parliament speaking in Amsterdam recently declared, "Those of us who have any experience in the administration of oversea territories must make it clear to our colleagues at home that any discussion of the place of the oversea territories in a Western Union must keep in the forefront the interests of the oversea peoples. If the idea is inadvertently spread that the decisions of the peoples for whom we are responsible in Africa and Asia can be settled in London or Paris or Brussels or The Hague without consulting them, we shall get trouble, and we shall deserve it."

Color Caste

The determination of white leaders in Africa to dominate the blacks is continually expressed. In the Union of South Africa, two million white people are ruling ten million colored and Asiatics without giving them voice in government, and keeping them in economic dependence and poverty. In Kenya, the same policies are being pursued.

When the Rhodesia National Affairs Association met in Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, N. H. Wilson developed the idea of "Capricorn Africa", to include all those states between the Equator and the Tropic of Capricorn, that is Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika, the Belgian Congo, Angola, the two Rhodesias, Nyasaland, Mozambique, and the Bechuanaland Protectorate, and a portion of French Equatorial Africa. Capricorn Africa, with an area slightly larger than the United States and a population between 35,000,000 and 40,000,000, would have natural resources richer than those of the United States, except in the matter of petroleum. Wilson's credo was that it is the predestined role of Capricorn Africa to help the nations of Western Europe to complete economic recovery; ~~they cannot be helped otherwise~~. Capricorn Africa will embrace only colonial countries where white European political control is to be permanent.

Beyond this we must face the idea of the white population already in Africa. We know the attitude of the Union of South Africa towards Negroes as citizens and as workers. The blacks occupy a subordinate position, and recent political events indicate they may possibly be pushed down even further. Even more significant is the situation in Kenya, which was settled originally by South Africans.

In Kenya, originated the idea of making Africa a center of defense of the West against the East. It was first broached in 1923, by a member of the legislative council in his pamphlet The Thermopylae of Africa. He developed the theme that Europe must withdraw from Asia, and that she should make Kenya Colony her center of defense and rule in Africa. He believed, that confronted by the fast approaching crisis in the relations of the primary races of mankind, the white race has no choice but to abandon its nineteenth century attitude of aggressive expansion and to collect and reorganize its diminished strength within defensible lines there to await the shock of the Asiatic onslaught.

He was of the opinion that the first necessity will be to decide where to draw defensive lines. They, of course, will be first in white countries, and second, it should remember that Africa is the most important unit of the group of territories which whites dominate outside of Asia. Africa's immense area, her fertility, her numerous population, her geographical position all are in her favor. So great are her potentialities that control of Africa may prove to be the decisive factor in the coming conflict of the primary races.

It is a singular confirmation of this forecast that in January, 1948, it was announced that a huge military stores depot was under construction at McKennon road, Kenya, sixty-five miles from the coast. Today there are thousands of white troops and engineers at this base; there are 2,000 Italian artisans flown in from Rome, and there are thousands of African laborers. Thirty-five miles of jungle are being cleared; water is being piped seventy miles. Here is being collected in stone and iron buildings, hundreds of thousands of tons of war material from North Africa and the Middle East.

K.11 What Africa Thinks

We turn now to the really crucial point, what is Africa itself thinking? Or perhaps we should say, does Africa think? Negro opinion is beginning to make itself heard. In London the League of Colored People says in its chief organ: "Mere promises of benefits to come will not be convincing. Too often in the past the people of Africa have been beguiled by fair words and fine promises; these, they complain, have done nothing to increase their standard of living, and when the Africans themselves have attempted to express an opinion on how improvement in their society might be achieved they have been prosecuted for sedition."

It goes on to say that when the Labor Government came to power in Great Britain, many Africans were prepared to welcome the change of administration in the hope that it would lead to radical changes in colonial policy and administration. In Africa generally, and more particularly in East Africa, these hopes have been sadly doomed. These circumstances are not in keeping with the avowed principles of the British Labor movement and their continued existance presumes the failure of the local governments to put into practical working the principles which prominent ministers in the labor government maintain they desire to see implemented in Africa. But it asks, "do the ministers really mean what they say?"

people in the colonies a resented alien domination irrespective of what is in power at home.

George Padmore, a colored West Indian resident of London, details the present difficulties in colonial administration in British Colonies. He declares that the grievances in Africa are racial, economic and social. The economic problems rise from the land problem in East and South Africa where natives have been dispossessed of their land by Europeans and concentrated in special areas known as reserves. There they are subjected to direct hut and poll taxes in order to force them to seek employment on the plantation or in the mines. In most of the areas it is illegal for the natives to combine for collective bargaining. In East Africa, trade unions have been legalized since 1940, but this right remains largely on paper.

The British colonial governor is a trinity: he represents the King; he is chief executive; he advises with a legislative council, but in most important decisions, by his veto and reserved powers, he is the real source of colonial legislation. Natives participate in government by the device of "indirect rule". This was introduced into West Africa by Lord Lugard, when he lacked enough white troops to conquer the region. He left local government in the hands of the chiefs; but by power of appointing and dismissing them, by paying them out of government moneys, and in general controlling their actions, he made the British Commissioner the real ruler of West Africa. A diffuse native bureacracy was superimposed on the old feudal and tribal systems. The chiefs are not subject to the democratic control of their people but derive their powers direct from the government.

As Margery Pelham, a white Englishwoman, says: "Most educated Africans, especially in West Africa and the Sudan, critize and strongly condemn indirect rule. They say it gives power to uneducated chiefs and elders instead of to the educated; that it strengthens tribal feeling and so continues the disunity of the country. It is, they say, part of the old policy of 'divide and rule' by which an imperial power keeps its subjects weak and prevents their advance toward self-government." Despite all this, the British administrator is usually honest and efficient. Under him West Africa has progressed; the native rulers have made great and notable advance. But the Africans complain, too much is done for them and not with them. The rulers reply, the natives want more than they are fit to provide.

Politics in all African colonies conform to a pattern which varies from territory to territory only as to the relative importance of the following factors: (1.) White settlers who work for self-rule, with white supremacy both in economics and in politics; (2.) Big Business which works for monopolistic concerns and control over labor; (3.) Alien racial groups who demand equality in all ways with the whites; (4.) A handful of native intelligenstia frustrated and resentful who agitate for "Africa for the Africans", "down with the color bar" and, at the same time, demand increased social services; and (5.) Government with indirect rule trying to hold down the lid.

In addition to this, there must not be overlooked the great mass of people of Africa, the "ignorant man and his wife with a hoe". They are protected from their aggressive neighbors, and have some modern medical aid, a little education, sanitation and use of machinery. They can sell their crops more or less freely in the world market and they have perhaps doubled in number in thirty years. They pay comparatively little attention to either social leaders or agitators, but want to be left undisturbed; yet someday they may be touched off by a firebrand or inspired by a prophet.

A native of West Africa declares that West Africans have shown phenomenal advance in the direction of self-confidence and native consciousness. Even admitting the good faith of the British government, they demand to be treated as colleagues and consulted fairly and fully in all decisions that are taken about their country and people. This is just the type of situation that makes for impatience and frayed nerves.

On the other hand, there is on the part of the white administrator resentment, that despite all the government is doing for the people they are not grateful, and their leaders continue to malign it. There is constant complaint that the people are not being consulted in the drawing up of plans and in their execution; a conflict of paternalism, "father knows best", versus nationalism, "we must be consulted." There is widespread feeling among many Africans and Europeans that if there is to be cooperation between Africans and British, there is need for responsible Africans to speak freely on all subjects respecting themselves and their country.

Violence + Strike

In South Africa have occurred at least twenty riots and disturbances varying from the student strike at Lovedale [redacted] to the burning of their passes by 7000 natives at Capetown, and culminating in the strike of 50,000 Negro miners in August, 1946, to obtain a wage of $2.00 a day, instead of the 45 cents they are receiving. Five strikers were killed by the police, 62 arrested by breach of contract and conspiracy, 46 of whom were heavily fined or jailed. Raids and arrests continued for a month, including arrest of some liberal whites. "Communism" was blamed for the outbreak.

In Kenya, in January, 1947, 7,000 natives struck, affecting eleven business concerns. After failure to satisfy the strikers, the strike spread to Uganda with disturbances at four centers. It was finally settled by a raise in wages of more than twenty-five per cent.

In West Africa, there were serious disturbances in Nigeria and on the Gold Coast. In Nigeria, increased government allowances were granted white employees but postponed for Negroes ~~in 1944~~ in 1944. In 1945, a general strike of 150,000 non-clerical workers was declared and eventually brought a fifty per cent increase in wages. Later there were further strikes of electrical workers, metal workers, and employees of the United African Company. Miners struck in the Ashanti gold mines and secured increased wages.

On the Gold Coast, strikes finally assumed the aspect of civil war. In 1946 a commission under the white Chief Justice found that the cost of living had gone up two hundred per cent and recommended increased wages to government employees. Another commission under an African judge advised a minimum wage for other employees of 32 cents to 40 cents in the country districts, and 60 cents a day in the towns. Teachers then complained, and a third commission gave them increases. Railway workers and miners then asked for raises, struck when they were refused, and gained their demands after several weeks.

Then came a colony-wide boycott against high prices charged by importing concerns, led by a progressive chief. A price control commission was set up to curb prices and reduced them by thirty-three and one third per cent. The demobilized soldiers thereupon started a march to the Governor to present a petition. There ensued a skirmish with the police, which led to rioting and looting. In the fighting 26 Africans were killed and 277 injured including 15 whites. The black soldiers of the Gold Coast, Sierra Leone and Nigeria refused to bear arms against their fellow soldiers, and white units in Gibraltar were alerted. Two battleships were ordered from South Africa. The Governor appealed to the chiefs and to London, and a London commission of inquiry was sent out.

In 1947, a railway strike of 12,000 workers crippled the whole transport system of French West Africa. The strikers demanded "equal pay for equal work." Northeast Africa has had strikes. In March, 1947, five hundred dock workers struck at Port Sudan, in the Egyptian Sudan; in July, ten thousand railway workers at Atbara walked off the job; in Ethiopia, five thousand railway employees refused to work until the Emperor obtained a twenty-five per cent increase in wages. These strikes and many others that have taken place all over the continent of Africa, show that there is an increase in the activity of trade unions and union organization in Africa. In most of the territories there is legislation to permit trade unions, but some of it is antiquated and in many cases as in East Africa it is on paper rather than actually in force. No African in Northern Nigeria, for instance, is a member of a trade union; and although in the Union of South Africa there are one hundred and twenty native trade unions claiming one hundred and sixty thousand members, these unions are not officially recognized; however some effort was being made to that end before the last election.

The West African labor movement, on the other hand is growing in stature and power. In French West Africa the movement also has taken on strength and force; and there was a federation of trade unions which met in Dakar, French West Africa, in April 1947. Eighteen delegations of Negro trade unions attended and recommendations were made to be considered at the World Labor meeting at Prague in June. ~~In Nigeria the labor movement dates from the general strike in 1945 and is growing.~~

The most significant occurrence in the African labor world was the representative character of the Africans at the World Trade Union Conference in February 1945. Colonial delegates came from Nigeria, The Gold Coast, Sierre Leone and Gambia in West Africa besides from many Negro communities in America.

Wallace Johnson of West Africa, who but a few weeks before his arrival had been released by the British Government after five and a half years' imprisonment in exile, for trade union activity, presented a "charter of labor" for the colonies, demanding: the abolition of racial discrimination in public and private employment, forced labor and child labor, flogging and punishment for breach of labor contract, and caste law legislation; the right of free assembly, free speech, free press and free movement; and "equal pay for equal work irrespective of race, color, creed or sex."

In a telegram to the Big Three concerning the Atlantic Charter, colored delegates insisted that it be made clear that they supported the demand of the colonial people for the right to choose the form of government under which they would live. They asked that special note should be taken of conditions in colonies and dependencies so that appropriate measures to secure for these people of Asia and Africa the elementary rights to civilized, democratic processes.

They put into the final resulutions a paragraph asking for the end of colonies and dependencies, and they tried to get the conference to put a time limit to the freeing of colonies, but this attempt failed.

The Intelligentsia

Turning now from the mass of African workers, may we not ask, is there a mass intelligentsia in Africa? If so, what does it want? The effort of people to raise themselves from one social position to a higher one always has something bizarre about it, as well as deep tragedy. We laugh at the effort. England used to laugh at American literature. The white South long laughed at the efforts of American Negroes to get an education. In the same way when Sir Allen Burns, former Governor of the Gold Coast, talking recently to American missionaries, said tolerantly that we must view the situation in Africa realistically, mindful of the possibility that "a small group of not too well-educated persons, clamoring for self-government" might confuse the issues and set the clock back.[19]

This charge has been repeated by Englishmen and especially colonial officials very widely, so that one gets the idea that the leadership in Africa is poorly educated, not too moral, and very selfish. On the other hand, there has been coming to the world, especially since the First World War, a series of statements and arguments from the leaders of the African people so significant as to fear repetition a few are quoted here:

After the First World War, when a delegation of West African leaders came to London to meet with the League of Nations Union, Dr. Bankole Bright of Serre Leone said:

"...it is because we do not want to encourage ... unrest; it is because we want to live under a peaceful government that we who represent the intelligentsia and the heterogeneous mass of the populace, have come to this country with the object of educating public opinion to our condition by placing our grievances before you and at the same time seeking for the necessary reforms. We ask you as an important unit of this Empire to march along ... on these progressive lines; in doing so you will be only taking the first step towards the accomplishment of the resolution of a Select Committee of the House of Commons on West Africa ... passed ... on the 3rd of March, 1865:

" 'That the object of our policy should be to encourage in the natives the exercise of those qualities which may render it possible for us more and more to transfer to them the administration of all the Governments with a view of our ultimate withdrawal, etc.'

"We are not asking for a withdrawal from the home government, we are requesting to have a say in the administration of our colonies--; we are asking for the franchise and other reforms as embodied in those resolutions.

Twenty-five years later a black cocoa farmer from West Africa speaking in regard to the economic situation against which the people of the Gold Coast were complaining, said that the scheme that his group suggested was the only action that would restore the confidence of the producers in the intentions of the Imperial Government and allay the growing apprehensions of all Africans generally. His delegation of Gold Coast and Nigerian farmers were of the opinion that there were enough men and women with good will in the present Imperial Government of Britain, who might bring economic justice to bear on the many pressing problems, and thus prevent the occurrence of a tragic economic upheaval, the consequences of which unfortunately might affect the peaceful life of innocent people in all parts of the world, and not only in West Africa and in Britain.

On January 6, 1947, in East Africa a black man, the Hon. E. W. Mathu, African Representative on the Kenya Legislative Council, who studied at Oxford, told his people: that they could not afford to be slaves in a free world; that it was their duty to work hard all the year round to prepare a better world for our children. "No people in history has ever risen from the dust to the height of a respected nation without struggle. No people has ever achieved freedom without working, fighting or dying for it." He told them they must not expect to be an exception, but to work hard and hold their own without submitting to indignities and subhuman treatment.

Continuing, he advised them that to raise the standard of living they must act together. Tribal boundaries must go; they must refuse to be separated or divided by anybody. All Africans must organize as members of one nation. If color bar, discrimination, and all the other evils are to be ended, African territories under European rule and the independent African States of Ethiopia and Liberia must organize on a continental scale.

In London, in the early part of 1947 a delegation representing the National Council of Nigeria and the Cameroons, a federation of 183 political parties, trade unions, professional associations, farmers and peasants organizations, tribal unions, and youth groups, laid before the Secretary of State for Colonies a Protest against the Constitution which had been forced upon Nigeria. Their statement said:

> "We are unwilling to continue the reactionary policy of making our legislative chamber a debating society for the amusement of British colonial administrators. We resent the idea of having your paid civil servants run our country as an unrammelled bureaucracy, enabling them to make, interpret, and administer our laws, without our knowledge and consent, and without our being effectively represented in such chamber by councillors or legislators of our own choice. We demand the right to assume responsibility for the government of our country. We demand the right to be free to make mistakes and profit from our experience."

PAN AFRICA, the organ of black folk resident in Great Britain, but most of whom were born in the colonies, published an editorial in September, 1947, which said that, "if there were amongst African people, any optimistic dreamers who believed that colonial freedom could be achieved by Round Table Conferences and the benevolent co-operation of foreign rulers, the events in the Far East should have given them a rude awakening. To every African man and woman it should be crystal clear that the path to colonial freedom is the same in whatever part of the world a subject people struggle towards their liberation. "The jungle law of twentieth century imperialism is still in force, and a man of sense knows what to expect if he attempts to bargain with a tiger."

These are a few examples of an articulate, growing opinion from well-educated and thoughtful people. Where did they get their education, and what is education doing in Africa? Paraphrasing Abraham Lincoln, Julian Huxley recently said that: "man cannot exist half illiterate and half literate." How much education or centers of modern culture are there in Africa? In certain parts, especially in Sierre Leone, the Gold Coast, and Nigeria, there exists an intellectual elite, a native bourgeoisie which is a class constituting the vanguard of progressive political movements. They and their sons have studied at American and European universities, and represent mainly several generations of culture and political consciousness.

In other areas, like the Protectorates, and in countries like Uganda, tribal or semi-feudal social institutions persist, even though these communities are not educated in modern ways. Here and elsewhere from the younger elements, there is emerging a class of natives dissatisfied with the status quo demanding wider and fuller education and better social conditions.

The overall facts are that even in the most advanced parts of Africa, only one African in twenty is able to read and write; most of the schooling is provided by the missionaries, with some government assistance. The former governor of Nigeria says frankly, "Out of a school population of over seven million, to have only four hundred thousand at school is a startling position." But again and again the official attitude is expressed, as, for instance, by Sir wilfred Woods in a survey of conditions in East African colonies: "None of the territory possesses a taxable capacity which could provide sufficient funds anything approaching universal elementary education even up to the first three or four standards without drastic curtailment of what must, for the time being, be deemed the prior claims of economic development." Here again one faces a paradox. As a Negro puts it, "the conscious policy of imperialism is to keep colonial economies backward and colonial peoples ignorant. So long as such countries remain merely agrarian appendages to the mother country -- that is, sources of raw material and also markest for manufactured commodities -- there is no need to educate the people."

Imperialism cultivates a small section of native intellectuals to man the lower offices and functions of the civil service and of commerce. If the countries were industrialized it would be essential to increase education since it is impossible to carry on modern mechanized production with uneducated workers.

Meantime a part of the problem of Negro education is being answered by the extraordinary influx of African students into England. The Welfare Department of the Colonial office reported, in February, 1948, that there were thirty-two hundred colonials in Great Britain and the number was increasing. In 1941, the total was only eighty. Of the present three thousand, probably a third are from West Africa, and three hundred from the Gold Coast alone.

The colonial secretary boasted of this record, but the former secretary, Mr. Stanley, saw a very great danger in having the increasing call for higher education in the colonies met solely from the universities of this country: "I cannot believe there is healthy development in colonial territory so long as they are forced to seek their higher education outside their regions."

An Inter-University Council for Higher Education in the Colonies has made its first report after investigation, and plans universities in East and West Africa, when funds are available to extend present beginnings. Principals have been appointed for Makerere in Uganda and Ibadan in Nigeria, and Gordan College in the Sudan will be strengthened.

Thus the black intelligencia has been built up on narrow foundations of a few higher schools in Africa, and migration to England and America for study. Small wonder its results are meagre and unfinished. The miracle is that so many intelligent black leaders are arising and buiding the great inert ignorant mass amid the opposition of investment and race hate.

All this has been an imperfect survey of a vast continent, where reliable information is difficult to obtain. As a matter of fact, in a sense our very basis of inquiry is faulty, when we speak of "Africa." There is no one entity with such physical, historical and social unity as would permit it intelligently to be called by one name. Considering tribe, history and social condition, very many Africas might be distinguished. But for intelligent study under present conditions, there are six Africas -- regions which show such general unity of development and condition as to give a unified designation real meaning.

West Africa

First there is West Africa, perhaps the best known generally. It is the gate of the continent from the West. Its tropical climate, hot sunshine and lush vegetation on the low coastal belt, rising to the great inland plateau, fulfills our usual idea of Africa. It covers today for our purposes British West Africa and Liberia. The leadership of black Africa centers here and this growing group yet may well lead the continent to autonomy. It will be a fierce, long road, with Great Britain determined not for long years, if ever, to release its hold on West African labor and products. Yet this region is securing more and more education, increased native wealth and clearer understanding of the white world and its methods.

Nigeria, the largest British colony, is one-third the size of Europe and has a population of approximately twenty-three millions. It has twenty-five publications and a total daily circulation of newspapers amounting to perhaps thirty-five thousand. It has twenty thousand miles of road and two thousand miles of railway.

West Africans are now within the orbit of world commerce and world crisis, but they are poor. Many of them are existing on five hundred to six hundred calories, compared with twelve hundred or eighteen hundred, which is today described as too little for the people of Europe. The Africans know the reasons for this poverty. A Nigerian recently said: "There is a constant drain of wealth from Nigeria, and it is because we know this that we cannot be expected to become enthusiastic over the Colonial Welfare and Development Fund. Considering the vast wealth that Nigeria has poured into the pockets of British trading houses and mining companies through the years, to say nothing of the incalculable contribution made to the Allied cause in two World Wars in manpower, in goods, and in services, it strikes us as ironical now to be offered the almost paltry amount of £23,000,000 as evidence of the generosity of Great Britain to her family of Colonies. Were Nigeria an independent country there is no doubt that Britain would be very greatly in her debt, even as she is now in debt to Egypt."

Today a strong Nigerian movement under Aziwike is making England yield ground; he demands a ten year condominium, five years home-rule by one thousand trained Nigerians, then independence. Failing to get that he proposes to appeal to the United Nations, and after that, "direct action." A rival youth organization and a newer union of the powerful Yorubas may spell division, as the English hope; on the other hand, it may lead to wider union and irresistible strength.

Liberia has never been independent. She has had first to fight native tribes for a foothold; and then for a half century exercise all her skill to escape the imperialisms of Britain, France and Germany, only to be driven into the hands of American capital. She desperately needs today an intelligentsia to restore the remnants of her freedom in the face of ~~airforce~~ militarism, navy and corporations from America.

South Africa start

Second in importance comes South Africa; the Union, the Rhodesias, the Protectorates and the mandate of South West Africa. Here, after a wild scramble which raised all the worst of human passions and a few of the best, we have today, inland from the Cape once called Good Hope, the greatest center of human race hate in the world. In the Union of South Africa there are today, two million three hundred and thirty-five thousand four hundred and sixty white folk who have complete political domination over seven million seven hundred and thirty-five thousand eight hundred and nine blacks and one million one hundred and eighty-seven thousand five hundred and eighty-nine colored folk and Asiatics. This dominion of eleven million persons extends the right to vote only to its two and a half million white citizens.

The African, although a taxpayer, has no right of citizenship. He is barred largely from skilled industry; his trade unions are not recognized, and he is denied the right to strike. Legislature prohibits him from acquiring land in cities ~~and makes it a crime for him to possess or purchase liquor~~, forces him to carry a pass, and ~~therefore~~ deprives him of the right to seek free employment. The arrests of natives, especially for the violation of the laws about carrying passes, coming to cities, and failure to pay poll tax, lead to two hundred thousand arrests in a single year; whereas in England, with four times the population, only thirty thousand are arrested. Urban Negroes are housed for the most part in noisome shanty towns with no decencies of civilized life.

Taxation and economic compulsion drive the African from the reserves to the mines, where he is housed and segregated in barracks. His average wage while so employed is approximately $200. a year. There are four urgent needs for the black population, and their representative counsel have repeated these many times. Removal of the industrial color bar, more land, abolition of caste laws, and the extension of the franchise. The land situation by the law of 1936 gives the eighteen million natives twelve per cent of the total land area of the Union, leaving two hundred and fifty million acres for the less than two million five hundred thousand whites.

For years the limited wealth of South Africa has been the privilege of its white population, whose higher standard of living is at the expense of the economic and social welfare of the blacks. The Second World War made South Africa prosperous. The national income, which was $500,000,000 in 1911, reached in 1945 -46 $2,800,000,000. The result is that South Africa has been booming, there has been a vast increase in economic activity, and secondary industry has outstripped mining and agriculture. But already difficulties are ahead.

The native group is now split roughly into three parts; two million live in cities, three million live on the white farms in the country, and three million on the reserves. Two-thirds of the whites are in cities and one third on the land.

For a long time the gold mining industry, based on cheap black immigrant labor, has been looked upon as the backbone of South African economy. Now industry is outstripping the mines. With this new dependence upon industry, what is going to be the future of South Africa? If they look toward manufacturing for a white market it will be a long time before the white market of Africa reaches five million; and if they are going to manufacture for the native population, then the native population must receive larger income by far than it does now.

If the native population should become organized and antagonistic to the white population, there would be four natives to threaten every European, and the difficulties would be tremendous. This is the reason that communism will not thrive in South Africa, because even liberal Europeans fear the communists' doctrines of race equality and communal property.

The total expenditure for Negro education, 1946 -47 is ten million dollars, in addition to three and a half million dollars for school feeding. The Institute of Race Relations says that, "these funds are, of course, quite inadequate and cannot keep pace with the natural increase in the school age population, let alone overtake the existing shortage." So far as figures are concerned, in 1941 out of 1,125,000 Africans of school age, 347,050 were in school. About eighty-five per cent leave school before standard third. Approximately three fourths of the colored and Asiatic children are in school.

The last few years in South Africa have seen difficult race relations.

Hostility among Negroes and Asiatics toward the whites has grown. There has been violence, culminating in the strike of the African mine workers in 1946, and the climax was reached when African members of the native representative council adjourned indefinitely in August, because of their inability to secure a statement from the government giving the facts in regard to the riot and the strike. They alleged breach of faith on the part of the government in its dealings with the council, and called for immediate abolition of all discriminating legislation.

In the meantime, and more menacing than the race relations, is the fact that there is already slackening in economic activity in South Africa. After a long period of continuous expansion, the nation's rate of growth is beginning to decrease. Today there is more uncertainity and doubt about the immediate economic outlook than at any time since 1940. And it is at this time that the Smuts government has been overthrown on the issue of increased segregation and suppression of the darker races. It has been charged that the native has been receiving too much education, too much housing and too much well-paid employment. A Negro leader, Z.K. Matthews comments: "I am convinced that the Nationalists will with the connivance of many non-Nationalist Europeans put into effect against non-Europeans all the things that they have wanted for so long." However, in their struggle for a better place in the South African sun, the African people remain undaunted and the retrogressive action, which they now expect, will only serve to make them more determined to close their ranks and organize themselves better for the fight that lies ahead."

The Institute of Race Relations says: "We feel bound to issue a warning that if this situation in the field of race relations is allowed to deteriorate further, it will before long reach a stage in which the voice of reason will not be heeded. The recent experience of the British in India, of the Dutch in Java, and of the French in Indo-China shows that the Non-European peoples of the world will not remain amenable to rational argument if we Europeans fail to make amble concessions to social justice while there is still the time and the temper to do so. In South Africa the period is drawing to a close in which honourable compromise is possible between the claims of various races that compose our community. ..."

35-2-51

Adjacent to South Africa lie the Negro Protectorates, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, and Swazi-land, now administered by the British colonial office under treaty. On account of the stubborn resistence of the natives, especially the Basutos, these territories were annexed by treaty and given a considerable degree of autonomy. South Africa has long desired to annex them and Malan will probably make another attempt to do so. They are meanwhile slowly but stubbornly dying of economic starvation and throttling of outlet and enterprise at the hands of both British and South Africans.

Nyasaland and the Rhodesias lie between South Africa and East Africa and are pushing for autonomy with the power in the hands of the whites. Here will take place in the future some of the most severe cases of racial strife and antagonism. Here are vast acres of land rich for farming and [illegible] untold mineral wealth. A small but close-knit group of whites are set here to carry out the South African pattern with a smaller ruling class and a less educated mass of serfs. They are avoiding the more crass and open race program, but proceeding in land monopoly, segregation, restricted education, low wages and a minimum of political power.

East Africa

East Africa is a physical sport of nature with snow-capped peaks on the equator and that vast rift in the earth, visible from the moon, if there are

eyes there to see, with the deepest lakes in the world, sloping down to the coast that for centuries has knit Africa and Asia. Here are three lands, Tanganyika, Uganda and Kenya. Tanganyika has only fifteen persons to each of its 360,000 square miles, with five million natives and seventy thousand whites. Nobody votes, but the whites are assuming ownership of men and resources. Diamonds and other minerals are being exploited and here Britain is placing her peanut culture scheme. The land is being slowly seized, and the natives get almost no education and are nearly voiceless.

Elspeth Huxley says that from Tanganyika to Uganda one passes "from vastness and poverty to a compact tidy, closely administered, relatively wealthy country, favored by nature with highland and rainfall which has brought abundance and comparative prosperity to most of its people."

Uganda is the still unconquered remnant of a series of African empires. It was long the victim of white religious strife and emerged as a British "protectorate" with some autonomy and wealth in its retention of ownership of its land. Uganda has 95,000 square miles and four million people. The black ruling class consists of land-holders and employers, who import labor from the Belgian Congo and the Nile valley. Uganda has started on an educational program. Here is Makerere College, which may yet become the black University of East Africa. Ten years ago there were 270,000 children in school, and presumably there has been considerable advance since, although figures are not available. Information concerning Uganda is regularly suppressed because this is a country which can easily follow the lead of West Africa and become the center of an toward autonomy movement. It has a long history of indigenous culture. Its economic problems are severe and the encroachment of investing capital is threatening.

In Kenya we go up toward the mountains of the moon, where on 225,000 square miles, there is a population of three and a half million. Here 25,000 whites have monopolized the most fertile eighty per cent of the land, and have tried to compel the Negroes to work for them. The blacks, densely crowed in lowland, desert and swamp, have made a fierce struggle for opportunity. They have forced their cause on the British and gained vacillating sympathy. Once their interests were declared "paramount" as compared with the immigranting South Africans and English, but little has been done to implement this declaration. Less than one-fifth of the school population is in mission and government schools, and the wealth accruing to the whites from monopoly of land (which cost them almost nothing), transport and investment have given the ruling clique a vast power. The only fly in their ointment is a large contingent of Indian merchants who dispute the division of profits and lately have been joining the natives in their opposition to white control. Surrounded by the Sudan, Ethiopia and Uganda, white rule in Kenya will have no easy path to complete domination.

The Nile Valley

At the head of the valley of the Nile stands Ethiopia on the citadel of Africa; restored to independence a fierce struggle with Britain, who is not certain whether this country will prove a fortress against Asia or a threat to Europe. Both Italy and Britain are seeking colonial claims which would strip Ethiopia of her outlet to the sea, and both Europe and America are seeking to get control of the resources of this rich land. Meanwhile, Ethiopia is striving in poverty to educate her masses, send students abroad for higher education and technical skill and is using Russians, Scandinavians and American Negroes to build up industry and sanitation. The Emperor is a wise and brave man, but he is not getting from the United Nations or from European civilization the aid and encouragement he so sorely needs. If Ethiopia once reaches real economic independence, the end of the domination of Europe in Africa will be in sight.

Down the Nile valley from Ethiopia lies the Sudan, the source of ancient Egyptian civilization, the last bastion which in the 19th century drove Britain out of its borders for thirteen years and nearly gave North Africa to Ethiopia and France. Kitchener and Egypt recaptured the Sudan, ~~where Mehemet Ali plied the slave trade for decades,~~ until in our day Egypt seeking independence from the British Empire finds the Sudan ~~in its path~~. The Sudan controls the Nile, the life-line of Egypt. The Sudan is the broad path to British East Africa. Who controls the Sudan will, with an independent Ethiopia, control East and central Africa. Consequently both Egypt and England are today wooing the seven million black people on the million acres of the Sudan. The Sudanese remember how Mehemet Ali of Egypt spoiled this land with rape and slave trade and how still Egypt draws the color line in politics and industry. But they also remember that the English desecrated the tomb of the Mahdi and have ~~only lately~~ favored the Sudanese and educated them for the civil service in order to supplant the Egyptians. A duel is going on today. One party led by a descendant of the Mahdi wants independence from Egypt. Another party wants to ~~be part of~~ the Egyptian domination. To clinch her claims, Britain is increasing Egyptian education. Gordon College is being enlarged and general education spread. ~~It is a singular battle.~~

North Africa -- Algiers Tunis and Morocco -- form a region where an Arab world with ~~a large~~ infiltration of Negro blood is being developed theoretically as a part of France and formerly, so far as Tunis was concerned, as a part of Italy. As a matter of fact, this area is still in semi-colonial status and demanding larger autonomy.

The sixth part of Africa we may call Latin Africa. It composes the vast African Empire of France, the great Valley of the Congo, the remains of the Portuguese African Empire and the small enclaves owned by Spain, together

Here, so far as France and Portugal are concerned, we have a rather curious situation: a promise of justice and equality which amounts to the training of a small élite, separating them from the masses and turning them into Frenchmen and Portuguese with full rights, but leaving the mass of people in those territories without leadership or guidance and at the mercy of some of the worst sorts of commercial exploitation. France has a complete educational system for her colonies. There are higher schools for medicine and engineering and, for those who can afford it, no difficulty in attending the great schools and universities in France. But this means that education has not touched the mass of the French African people. A black African like Diagne may rise to cabinet position, but he married a French wife and his family became practically French ~~and quite separated from Africa.~~ Eboué becomes a great governor of wide renown, but still the black mass is untouched. Recently President Auriol greeted the new Union Francaise: "To you who come from all parts of the world, from all countries, from all religions, from all races, from all origins, from all conditions— to all of you, citizens of the Union Française, and to the people whom you represent, France extends with joy her fraternal greeting." But the exact form of this federation of colonies with France and the actual power that is going to be in the hands of the colonies is by no means certain.

In the meantime, one reads the memoirs of Emile Faure. Faure is the grandson of the great Samory, former Sultan of Nigeria, who fought back the French for eighteen years and finally, in 1898, was captured and exiled. His grandson has spent much time in Africa and is now living in Paris, working as an engineer. He says:

> "This lamentable condition of the Negroes in the French Colonies is a direct outgrowth of their political status, and this may be easily summed up in four words. They have no rights. Like the serfs of the Middle Ages they are 'taxable and workable at will.'

and the administration, like the seigneur, has the right of life and death over them".

In Portugal the official news is heartening. There is a five-year plan in Angola and an appropriation for social work in Mozambique. Angola has a housing program, increased minimum wages and irrigation projects, together with a proposed large hydro-electric plant and new labor laws.

There is a port development at Beira, which may become a center of exportation for all of East Africa; and in 1945 Portuguese Guinea celebrated its four hundredth anniversary. Yet reports from travellers are disconcerting. Susan Welty charges state slavery: a "planned economy" which steals the peasants' produce and deliberately stifles education. And here again, the elite, the mulatto, the rich, escape and can become equal citizens of Portugal, or better a part of the exploiting regime in Angola or Mozambique.

A secret report in 1946 on Angola says, "The conditions under which Africans live in Angola are now almost unendurable. In fact, many don't live; they die at an early age due to the hardships imposed upon them." Taxes are 100 to 120 angolares a year, while laborers earn one and a half angolares a day when employed. Every device is taken to make workers default on tax payments, in which case they are sold to private employers under contract with nominal wages and terms lasting from three to ten years. Villagers flee to the bush to escape this slavery, homes are broken up, and often scarcely a single able-bodied man can be found in some villages. There is no regular government educational system, no sanitation, nor social services.

The Belgian Congo

We come now to the heart of Africa, the vast tropical bowl of the Belgian Congo, which lies between West and East Africa and borders on the Sudan and Rhodesia. The Congo river system is the second greatest in the world, encircling an area 750 miles wide and 530 miles long. Forest covers the northern half of the area; grasslands spread across the southern part, and in the southeast is the healthful country in the Katanga district, which is one of the richest mineral regions in the world. In the Congo before the Belgians came, great native states flourished which were noted for their complex and interesting culture and their art.

In 1943, there were in the Congo 10,500,000 people of whom 35,000 were white. The annexation of the Congo began with Stanley's search for Livingston and ended at the Conference of Berlin in 1885 when Leopold of Belgium, backed by the United States, was given the Congo -- which is 77 times the size of Belgium -- as his personal estate. Financial difficulties and world criticism compelled him finally to turn over the Congo to the Belgian state. Belgium has never promised the Congo independence or even participation in government. It has developed this region as a commercial enterprise, chiefly controlled by four holding companies in which the government is a partner. The treatment of the natives under Leopold has been improved and the output of the colony especially during and since World War II has been phenomenal. Copper, zinc, palm oil, manganese, tin, uranium, diamonds, and rubber have been exported in constantly increasing quantities. Labor has been carefully conserved so as to make available over eighteen per cent of all the adult males. During the recent war, forced labor was used, but normally the compulsion is indirect through government control of crops to be raised.

Native labor is pursuing most of the semi-skilled and skilled work in the colony. Wages are low and there are no trade unions. Unrest crops out now and then, as in three instances in 1945, when soldiers killed seven and wounded sixteen strikers.

Education is supplied mainly by the Catholic Church, with some Protestant missions. It is limited to low-grade primary instruction with emphasis on religion, hygiene and respect for authority. About 800,000 pupils are thus taught, but only one per cent continue after this level and receive vocational training for work as artisans, or training as clerks or teachers. There is no opportunity for secondary, higher, or professional training in the colony, and no Congolese are allowed in Belgium for study.

Every effort is made in the Congo to keep down agitation and avoid a native intelligent leadership. Plans for widespread social work have been formulated recently with a subvention from Belgium and a colony council for advice, on which one or two natives will sit. Nevertheless, there are already signs of a native movement which Government reports note and give warning. The so-called "Evolues" publish the "Voix de Congolais" and count 65 circles with 2,829 members, representing perhaps 10,000 persons. This periodical is "loyal", but progressive. There are, too, some 12,000 mulattoes whose status is still undetermined.

The Congo is ruled on the British "indirect rule" plan, with the chiefs functioning under Belgian officials. The land remains mostly as a government monopoly, with the mass of natives as tenants-will. There has been work in health, sanitation, and the fighting of sleeping sickness and leprosy. Here is a perfect example of the regimentation of ten million black laborers for the industrial profit of a white nation, with care to make the exploitation a long-term project and not mere planless exploitation for quick and immediate returns. Nevertheless, the object is not, and never was the uplift of the Congo natives nor the giving to them enough education for any effective voice in government or self-expression. This plan is making Belgium rich and powerful; but it is giving black Congo increasing knowledge of modern technique. The question is: how long can this scheme last, and how far will it go?

Assuming the essential accuracy of this body of facts, what is its meaning for world Peace? In the early years of this century, I called the results of a similar survey , the "African Roots of War." I believe I was tragically right at that time. But the world has changed in a critical quarter of a century . The advance of the peoples of Africa, while great, has not been revolutionary; but it has been startling and prophetic. The change in the white world has been the greatest revolution in the history of modern man. Together these two sets of phenomena make either for Peace or the end of civilization in its present form.

The white world today is facing suicide. Not, to be sure, complete physical annihilation, but a cultural collapse and a moral breakdown which many centuries will be required to restore, if restoration will ever be possible. If still there can be found enough moral courage to resist a third world war, then one of the first results of that will be the recognition of the utter futility of the colonial system. With use of and cooperation with the emerging African intelligentia, in Africa itself, and in the Negroids of all America; with the help of renascent Asia; and particularly with the direct aid of the socialist labor movement in all the world, we may slowly but finally erase from the minds of men and from political action, the attempt to build civilization on the domination of a few great powers over the mass of the world's workers, still widely spread in Asia, but gradually being concentrated more and more in Africa.

The world today is being led increasingly toward this conclusion by the determined and partially successful effort of the millions of Asia to govern themselves without the control of the white world. That colonialism and European domination will disappear from Asia in a foreseeable future is as certain as any future event. This will concentrate colonialism in Africa, and if that continues, it will make the black race the foot-stool of the world; the one remaining mass of men ruled for other peoples good; worked for other races profit; and spiritually suppressed for the uplift of the rest of the world.

To accomplish this will call for the cooperation of Asia, the working people of Europe and America; and black folk themselves. If Asia, in fear of reconquest or in sympathy, refuses cooperation, or even actively intervenes; if the white working classes see or think they see in the continued subjection of Africa, nothing less than a remnant of the exploitation from which they themselves are escaping, and perhaps even a weapon to retard their progress in political power and industrial dominance; or finally, if the African refuses longer to submit and begins increasingly to fight with protest, appeal, strikes, and weapons even in the face of frightening white armament; in such case, white colonial imperialism cannot possibly succeed.

If, on the other hand, white civilization continues on the path of total war, it will not only distroy itself, but cannot slow down that process, in the future as in the past, by inducing colonial peoples to help fight for their own slavery. African soldiers have been used to defend, and even expand European colonial imperialism. They were used by both Germany and the Allies in the First World War. Black troops conquered German Africa for the Allies. Black shock troops met the rush of the Germans in France. Black labor supplied the white armies. After the First World War, it was agreed that such use of African military force was dangerous to European civilization and the League of Nations banned it.

But in the Second World War, frican soldiers were again used. From British West Africa alone came over 150,000 black soldiers who fought in North Africa and in Asia. The French used the Senegalese soldiers in the North African and Syrian campaign. Negroes from East Africa were used in the Ethiopian campaign, and black non-combatant contingents were in the South African Army. All together it is probable that between a quarter and a half million black soldiers were used to help Europe overthrow Hitler and Japan, and to these must be added the soldiers of Negro descent from the United States and West Indies.

It is doubtful if in the future, even the ignorance and inexperience of black folk can be counted on to help hold Africa in subjection to Europe and to American investors. Already between Asia and Africa the lines of alliance appear. Out of 8,404 pilgrims to Mecca in 1946, 6,886 came from black West Africa. The Moslem population of French West Africa has increased from three to eight millions in ten years. African delegations were invited to the Pan-Inter-Asian Conference in 1947. Indians and Africans are cooperating in South Africa and Kenya. An Indian woman defended Africa before the United Nations, and the Union of South Africa is facing a hostile world opinion in its frank race-hate program. Gandhi began his career in Africa and the stubborn, thoughtless determination of the United States to inherit, rule and expand a world industrial empire dying before its and of whose death, Russia is symptom and not cause.

America may fight Ru[illegible] she cannot prevent the increasig so[illegible] in defense of natives. Negroes are pouring into the trade unions of America, and the Labor government of England is having difficulty in steering a course between the great British industrial hierarchy in Africa and the demands of African labor. The powerful British trade unions have met and conferred with African and West Indian unionists. These facts put on the Africans themselves, the onus of forcing the final overthrow of colonialism by continued and increased determination to be modern men. Their movement is spearheaded by their kin in America. They cannot fail. Their triumph is Peace, because colonialism and labor exploitation are the ultimate causes of war.

35-2-263

THE NEW AFRICA

The Romans said: "Semper nuvi quid ex Africa" always something something new out of Africa. Thàs has been true from the founding of the New Empire in Egypt to the bonds between Greece an Ethiopia, the Punic Wars, the Catholic Church, the Crusades , down to Kitchenor at Khartum and Cape to Cairo. During the I(th century we tried to defend slavery by pretending tha t Africa was nothing and never had been; on on this fable, we builtthe New Capitalism on the Af ican slave trade. Today after the second World War, Africa suddenly looms as news. It is the second greatest land area in the world, with a hundred and fifty million people and endless natural resources. Britain has lost India and Burma; France has lost Indo-China; Holland is losing Indonesia. In the Near East looms the threat of Arabs and Islam; in the Far-East, the Communist flood is engulfing China. In Europe itself, Russia and the Balkans are lost to the imperialist bloc. If Western Imperialism is to survive -- and it is determined to survive -- its colonial rule must center in Africa.

And what is Africa? It is certainly nothing that c rresponds to one unified term There are today at least six Africas which can be distinguished. Americans will think first of West Africa, whence most American Negroes came and where American enterprises of various kinds have centered. Here in that great bulge of the continent above the Gulf of Guinea, lie British and French West Africa and Liberia. Characteristic is the hot moist climate and the lush vegetation on the low , narrow coastal belt, rising to the forests of the inland plateau. Here known African culture runs back a thousand years, and the land and local rule is still dominated by tribal organization. But over this the British have established "indirect rule", which makes them political overlords and economic monopolists over black labor and its products. But black west Africa has been learning. It has an intelligentia, educated in Europe and America, and although only one in twenty can read and write, the native movement for autonomy and self-rule is growing to large proportions. Nigeria, the largest British colony has some twenty-three million people; the Gold Coast lea ds the world in cocoa producti tion on peasant farms. It is here that agitation for African emancipation centers today. Liberia dose not yet represent that freedom; it has fought a hundred years, first against the natives for land; then against the British for independence; then to ward off the agressions first of France, then of Germany; until today it is in the grasp of American capital invested in rubber, general "development" by the Stettinius Asso iat s and by the United States Navy and Aurforce.

The inland plateau of Africa dips into the bowl of the Congo Valley and then rises to the great bastion of the Cape of Good Hope. Here at lands end, has been played in the last three centuries a frightful drama of human history between the most warlike of the blacks descending from the interior where Negro-Arabian imperialism drove them south. Here they met Dutch and English and fought for extermination. The result was the Union of South Africa, the worst center of race hate in the world, where two and a third million whites are holding nine million blacks, mulattoes and Asiatics in subjection. Here a Negro has rights which a white man is bound to respect and here and in the Rhodesias comes the world's store of gold, diamonds and copper.

Up the East Coast, we pass Northern and Southern Rhodesia, Nyassaland and three native protectorates, never conquered but ruled by Britain and starved by South Africa. This is the region where the dream of a black Africa, ruled by a handful of white investors and technicians, is spreading the South African idea with modern industrial efficiency. This East Coast, which slopes down to the Indian Ocean, once bound Africa and Asia together and remains of ancient cultures dot the land with vast monuments. Inland we see sports of nature: great mountains with eternal snow, and that vast gap in the earth so great that men say that it is the only earthly feature that living eyes could descry from the moon.

Here we come on three lands: empty Tanganyika with only 15 persons to the square mile, and 70,000 white investers and technicians owning the 5 million natives who have neither votes nor education. Here England proposes to begin her new exploitation of Africa. Out of this vastness and poverty, we climb to Uganda. Here flourished a sucession of Negro kingdoms, devastated by the slave trade and then by missionaries of the Catholics, Protestants and Moslems fighting each other until England annexed the land. There remains a compact native culture and local home rule, held in the grip of incoming European capital. But the great threat to Uganda is Kenya. Here 25,000 whites, originally from South Africa, rule and half enslave three and a half million blacks, after seizing 80% of their best land. But the flies in the white ointment are Makerere College in Uganda which may become a university of East Africa; a group of Indian merchants in Kenya who join with the natives; and the surrounding black lands of the Egyptian Sudan and Ethiopia.

On the citadel of Africa, with its frowning mountains covering the great eastern Horn of the continent perches Ethiopia, with a history going back to the earliest legends of Greek history. It has miantained its independence against all the world's civilizations for five thousand years, until the United Nations betrayed it to Italy. Britain, France and Italy had shorn it from access to the sea and every effort of cheating lying and force was used to subdue this land. But it arose from the dead after the ~~fi~~ second World War and is the center of the African puxzzle: for Ethiopia dominates the Nile valley and the water w which Egypt must have. Ethiopia is rich in undeveloped rssources. That is why capitalistic countries like England and America want to deprive this Land Of thr Blacks of a saeport for world trade, by taking away Eretria and giving to the blood-stained hands of Italy.

Down the Nile from Ethiopia lies the Sudan to the westward, bithland of ancient Egypt, with seven million blacks, who are today pawns between the British empire which i is being driven out of Egypt and is building new military bases in Kenya. The Sudanese remember the slave trade and murder of Egyptian rule and are being bribed by Gordan Co College and education for their youth to carry ~~for xxxxxxxxxxxx~~xon British rule. They do not forget that once they wrecked British imperialism in the Sudan for I3 years when the Black Mahdi drove the English out of the Sudan

To the north lie Arab Africa: independent Egypt; French Algeria and Morroco and Tunis, French with Italian inhabitants as well as natives. France is trying to incorporate her colonies into metropolitan France and yet preserve the rule of French capital. This brings us to Latin Africa: the vast realm of French Africa, from the Sahara to the Gulf of Guinea; Portuguese Africa in the south and bits of the Spanish a colonial empire on the West Coast. Her has long been dominant a method of colonialialism, different from the Anglo-Saxon. Exploitation of native labor and land was the object, but natives themselves, if they rose to power by wealth or education were welcomed as co-exploiters. Thus French black colonials and especially Portuguese mullattoes have arisen to power, but they have usually shar d in and extended the same type of native oppression as the whites. This is true today in French West Africa, French guinea, Madegascar and the French West Indies. This is the problem which the new French Union must face. Portugal has never been able to make her professions square with her actions in Mozambique and Angola. The masses of her colonia l natives are pitifully oppressed even today.

We now turn back to the Heart of Africa, the Congo Valley

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

23.39-3

Mr. Bevin, in his review of Foreign Affairs, before the House of Commons, January 22, said: "The free nations of Western Europe must now draw closely together. I believe now the time is ripe for a consolidation of Western Europe, and this co nsolidation must be supported. And that involves the closest collaboration between the Commonwealth and the overseas territory of the French, Dutch, Belgians and Portuguese. Their raw materials, food and other resources could be of mutual advantage to these territories and to the world."

Last November, Sir Stafford Cripps said to the African Governors' conference, "The whole future of the sterling group and its ability to survive depends on a quick and vast development of colonial resources. It is to your contribution to the righting of the world unbalance that we must look; and in order to give you the chance of success, we must put behind you all that we can in the way of capital, goods, and supplies."

Lord Trefgarne, Chairman of the Colonial Development Corporation, said in June that United States imports of coffee alone in 1947 were more than three time her total imports of British manufactures. He suggested then that an over-all increase of two hundred million pounds in colonial production should be made during the next ten years.

Angle-French consultations have been under way for creation of an economic grouping by which Western Europe would be linked with the African continent. This bloc would be an element of economic equilibrium between the United States and the Soviet Republic. Sir Oswald Moseley was flatly outspoken; he advocated a union of European people. He saw Europe as the leader, aiming to develop Africa as an estate of the Europeans to solve the economic problem by direct state action. "Africa never was developed by Negroes, who at present are exploited by finance capitalism under cover of Trusteeship hypocrisy."

Others stressed the fact that Africa is divided into territories, nearly all of which belonged to, or were allied to, the nations of Western Europe; and both Africa and America are affiliated with Europe and the Western company of nations. Africa can supply the resources needed to rebuild Europe, and the Union of South Africa in particular is rich in the things which Europe requires. Some expressed the belief that South Africa's special contribution to the pattern of peace would be to protect and develop her agricultural, mineral, and industrial wealth and, in collaboration with the territories to the North, to produce things which might help Europe to live again.

"There are immense possibilities of development in the great continent of Africa," said Lord Addison, during the debate on Commonwealth and Empire Migration in the House of Lords. "We must realize a great many of these possibilities, or we shall be in even more distressing circumstances than we are now."

The Earl of Portsmouth said: "Our tropical Colonies demand a far greater administrative technical population than they have had up to date-- namely, farmers, civil servants, engineers, business men and so forth. There is no question that our own population will thrive at the expense of the Native African, for instance. After all, Africa would starve if it were not for the white man's ability to check erosion as much as he has done ... --

"As this would work out, I believe it should be treated as a sort of great co-partnership, as it were, on the lines of a military operation. You would start on your development areas, on the analogy of the Tennessee Valley, ... where you would start on the great work necessary; here, it might be hydro-electric; there, it might be dams; and elsewhere, it might be afforestation. You would move to reclaim that land and develop its area. As the works were completed, so would more people come ....

"In the next two or three years, perhaps only a few hundred thousand can leave this country; but if an ordinary progressive development were to take place, it would mean a continued demand, not only in this country but throughout the Commonwealth, United States and Western Europe for plant and

This is but a partial picture of the growing concentration of world capital investment in Africa, attracted by cheap labor and by government conditions which will encourage access to raw material with low taxation and with every advantage for exploitation.

Naturally, this condition brings up many questions. First, on the part of England itself, what is going to be the object and end of this concentration of capital in Africa? The Times of London, said recently in a leading editorial that the principle governing colonial development in the nineteenth century was that in return for peace and justice, the native people should produce food and raw material for the European market. This meant that commercial enterprise, while slightly raising native standards of life distributed its profits to European shareholders.

The new plan of the Colonial Development and Welfare Act is designed to see that the pace of economic development in the colonies is increased, consistent with the general welfare of the native people.

Planning for Africa

The Fabian Society, planning for the Labor Government, puts the matter this way: In the period from 1950 to 1955, joint British, French, Belgian, South African and Egyptian planning should be agreed upon; and could in twenty years change the face of Africa and of its place in world economy as much as the Russians have changed the face of Soviet Asia. Such joint action could reproduce TVA's in the valleys of the Nile, Congo, Niger, and Zambesi. This twenty year development program would create an enormous source of supply of primary products and a large new market for manufactured goods. For this, there must be provided, labor, power, transport, homes, and social services for the white workers who immigrate to direct this development. In this way capitalist exploitation of the colonies can be carried on by a planned development of their resources, based on sharply rising living standards for the native people and the effective participation of these people in the organization and administration of this development.

"That participation is vital, if Africa is to be recreated; we must stop doing things for the Africans and start doing things with them."

This is a heartening and interesting forecast, but how far is it really inspiring the thought [redacted] of the investing world? In the discussion and planning, contradiction and overtones appear. For instance, in June, 1948, a member of Parliament pointed out that possibly more good could be done for England by investing in marginal land and rough grazing land and bringing it into production. The Joint Parliament Secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture replied, that England depends on imports for about ninety-five per cent of its oils and fats, and that the peanut scheme is not being done to help Africa or Australia, but to get much needed additional supplies of these things for Britain.

When it comes to the matter of migration of white people to Africafor technical knowledge and direction of the new development, the schemes run into difficulties and prejudices. Lord Tweedsmuir said in the House of Lords, "Upon the successful redistribution of the British race depends the whole future of the British Commonwealth." But what is to be the relation of these white Britishers to the dark people of Africa? We know the attitude of white Englishmen in the Union of South Africa, in Kenya and even in West Africa toward the natives. But even in England itself, there is the color bar. Black students and visitors have so much difficulty in finding accommodations, that special hostels are being opened.

are among the colored American service men, now back in their homes in the United States. The American Army would not permit its colored soldiers to marry white women. If this can happen in England and the redistribution of the British race is going to take place in Africa, what is going to be the relation of these immigrants to the millions of black folk there? A Great Britain which followed South Africa and Rhodesia in favor of a policy of racial privilege and segregation and domination of the blacks by the whites, would not hope to retain any part of Asia in the British Commonwealth.

Poverty and the Past

Another difficulty has been pointed out. As one writer says, "We are trying to make our people believe that there are vast resources of food to come out of Africa to help this country, but if the natives of Africa are fed properly there will be no surplus to come out of Africa, and the sooner the Government lets the people of this country know the facts the better. The natives are increasing to a tremendous extent, and they are unable to provide food for themselves at the present time. The colonies, to be sure, have been prosperous during the war because of the goods which they have furnished; but nevertheless, most of this production has gone to Europe and the taxable capacity of most colonials is low."

Mr. Rankin, a member of Parliament from Glasgow, said on January 20, 1948, that the government ought to be reminded "that for every £12 of wealth created in Africa in the past, we took out £11 and left £1. And England cannot forget what Lord Palmerston said to his Tiverton constituents just one hundred years ago: "The crimes committed in regard to African slavery and the African slave trade, if they could be put together, are, I am sure, greater in amount than all of the crimes that ever were committed by the human race from the beginning of the world to the present time."

We turn now to the really crucial point, what is Africa itself thinking? Or perhaps we should say, does Africa think? Negro opinion is beginning to make itself heard. In London the League of Colored People says in its chief organ: "Mere promises of benefits to come will not be convincing. Too often in the past the people of Africa have been beguiled by fair words and fine promises; these, they complain, have done nothing to increase their standard of living, and when the Africans themselves have attempted to express an opinion on how improvement in their society might be achieved they have been prosecuted for sedition."

It goes on to say that when the Labor Government came to power in Great Britain, many Africans were prepared to welcome the change of administration in the hope that it would lead to radical changes in colonial policy and administration. In Africa generally, and more particularly in East Africa, these hopes have been sadly dooмed. These circumstances are not in keeping with the avowed principles of the British Labor movement and their continued existance presupes the failure of the local governments to put into practical working the principles which prominent ministers in the labor government maintain they desire to see implemented in Africa. But it asks, "do the ministers really mean what they say?"

Many difficulties are being pointed out. For instance, in 1946 the total revenue of British African colonies averaged $4.00 a head. The figure for the United Kingdom the same year showed an average of nearly $300.00 a head. This illustrates the problem of poverty in Africa. The introduction of any substantial amount of mechanization or large scale production in African colonies would necessarily involve something like a social revolution. Suppose that a great saving of labor, up to ninety-three per cent, as has been mentioned in the case of extracting oil from the palm, to whom would this saving go? To the investor, (white manager, white technical skill,) or to native labor?

It was said in the House of Commons January 20, 1948, "Labor is one of the problems that has never been properly faced by the originators of this scheme, it is thought that the African native is a source of cheap labor... We have to give the native primary education, better food, and more incentives.

If production is started before labor supply is in the right position, the difficulties will be accentuated. They should have good villages with their own schools and hospitals, and they should be better fed, and given a higher standard of living so that they would be able to do the work. Before any steps to increase production are taken, these provisions must be made."

A member of parliament speaking in Amsterdam recently declared, "Those of us who have any experience in the administration of oversea territories must make it clear to our colleagues at home that any discussion of the place of the oversea territories in a Western Union must keep in the forefront the interests of the oversea peoples. If the idea is inadvertently spread that the decisions of the peoples for whom we are responsible in Africa and Asia can be settled in London or Paris or Brussels or The Hague without consulting them, we shall get trouble, and we shall deserve it."

Beyond this we must face the idea of the white population already in Africa. We know the attitude of the Union of South Africa towards Negroes as citizens and as workers. The blacks occupy a subordinate position, and recent political events indicate they may possibly be pushed down even further. Even more significant is the situation in Kenya, which was settled originally by South Africans.

In Kenya, originated the idea of making Africa a center of defense of the West against the East. It was first broached in 1923, by a member of the legislative council in his pamphlet The Thermopylae of Africa. He developed the theme that Europe must withdraw from Asia, and that she should make Kenya Colony her center of defense and rule in Africa. He believed, that confronted by the fast approaching crisis in the relations of the primary races of mankind, the white race has no choice but to abandon its nineteenth century attitude of aggressive expansion and to collect and reorganize its diminished strength within defensible lines there to await the shock of the Asiatic onslaught.

He was of the opinion that the first necessity will be to decide where to draw defensive lines. They, of course, will be first in white countries, and second, it should remember that Africa is the most important unit of the group of territories which whites dominate outside of Asia. Africa's immense area, her fertility, her numerous population, her geographical position all are in her favor. So great are her potentialities that control of Africa may prove to be the decisive factor in the coming conflict of the primary races.

It is a singular confirmation of this forecast that in January, 1943, it was announced that a huge military stores depot was under construction at McKenzen road, Kenya, sixty-five miles from the coast. Today there are thousands of white troops and engineers at this base; there are 2,000 Italian artisans flown in from Rome, and there are thousands of African laborers. Thirty-five miles of jungle are being cleared; water is being piped seventy miles. Here is being collected in stone and iron buildings, hundreds of tons of war material from North Africa and the Middle East.

Color Caste

The determination of white leaders in Africa to dominate the blacks is continually expressed. In the Union of South Africa, two and a half million white people are ruling nine million native colored without giving them voice in government, and keeping them in economic dependence and poverty.

When the Rhodesia National Affairs Association met in Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, N. H. Wilson developed the idea of "Capricorn Africa", to include all those states between the Equator and the Tropic of Capricorn, that is Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika, the Belgian Congo, Angola, the two Rhodesias, people in the colonies a resented alien domination irrespective of what is in power at home.

George Padmore, a colored West Indian resident of London, details the present difficulties in colonial administration in British Colonies. He declares that the grievances in Africa are racial, economic and social. The economic problems rise from the land problem in East and South Africa where natives have been dispossessed of their land by Europeans and concentrated in special areas known as reserves. There they are subjected to direct hut and poll taxes in order to force them to seek employment on the plantation or in the mines. In most of the areas it is illegal for the natives to combine for collective bargaining. In East Africa, trade unions have been legalized since 1940, but this right remains largely on paper.

The British colonial governor is a trinity: he represents the King; he is chief executive; he advises with a legislative council, but in most important decisions, by his veto and reserved powers, he is the real source of colonial legislation. Natives participate in government by the device of "indirect rule". This was introduced into West Africa by Lord Lugard, when he lacked enough white troops to conquer the region. He left local government in the hands of the chiefs; but by power of appointing and dismissing them, by paying them out of government moneys, and in general controlling their actions, he made the British Commissioner the real ruler of West Africa. A diffuse native bureacracy was superimposed on the old feudal and tribal systems. The chiefs are not subject to the democratic control of their people but derive their powers direct from the government.

As Margery Pelham, a white Englishwoman, says: "Most educated Africans, especially in West Africa and the Sudan, critize and strongly condemn indirect rule. They say it gives power to uneducated chiefs and elders instead of to the educated; that it strengthens tribal feeling and so continues the disunity of the country. It is, they say, part of the old policy of "divide and rule" by which "an imperial power keeps its subjects weak and prevents their advance toward self-government." Despite all this, the British administrator is usually honest and efficient. Under him West Africa has progressed; the native rulers have made great and notable advance. But the Africans complain, too much is done for them and not with them. The rulers reply, the natives want more than they are fit to provide.

Politics in all African colonies conform to a pattern which varies from territory to territory only as to the relative importance of the following factors: (1.) White settlers who work for self-rule, with white supremacy both in economics and in politics; (2.) Big Business which works for monopolistic concerns and control over labor; (3.) Alien racial groups who demand equality in all ways with the whites; (4.) A handful of native intelligenstia frustrated and resentful who agitate for "Africa for the Africans", "down with the color bar" and, at the same time, demand increased social services; and (5.) Government with indirect rule trying to hold down the lid.

In addition to this, there must not be overlooked the great mass of people of Africa, the "ignorant man and his wife with a hoe". They are protected from their aggressive neighbors, and have some modern medical aid, a little education, sanitation and use of machinery. They can sell their crops more or less freely in the world market and they have perhaps doubled in number in thirty years. They pay comparatively little attention to either social leaders or agitators, but want to be left undisturbed; yet someday they may be touched off by a firebrand or inspired by a prophet.

A native of West Africa declares that West Africans have shown phenomenal advance in the direction of self-confidence and native consciousness. Even designation real meaning.

West Africa

First there is West Africa, perhaps the best known generally. It is the gate of the continent from the West. Its tropical climate, hot sunshine and lush vegetation on the low coastal belt, rising to the great inland plateau, fulfills our usual idea of Africa. It covers today, for our purposes, British West Africa and Liberia. The leadership of black Africa centers here and this growing group yet may well lead the continent to autonomy. It will be a fierce, long road, with Great Britain determined not for long years, if ever, to release its hold on West African labor and products. Yet this region is securing more and more education, increased native wealth and clearer understanding of the white world and its methods.

Nigeria, the largest British colony, is one-third the size of Europe and has a population of approximately twenty-three millions. It has twenty-five publications and a total daily circulation of newspapers amounting to perhaps thirty-five thousand. It has twenty thousand miles of road and two thousand miles of railway.

West Africans are now within the orbit of world commerce and world crisis, but they are poor. Many of them are existing on five hundred to six hundred calories, compared with twelve hundred or eighteen hundred, which is today described as too little for the people of Europe. The Africans know the reasons for this poverty. A Nigerian woman recently said: "There is a constant drain of wealth from Nigeria, and it is because we know this that we cannot be expected to become enthusiastic over the Colonial Welfare and Development Fund. Considering the vast wealth that Nigeria has poured into the pockets of British trading houses and mining companies through the years, to say nothing of the incalculable contribution made to the Allied cause in two World Wars in manpower, in goods, and in services, it strikes us as ironical now to be offered the almost paltry amount of £23,000,000 as evidence of the generosity of Great Britain to her family of Colonies. Were Nigeria an independent country there is no doubt that Britain would be very greatly in her debt, even as she is now in debt to Egypt."

Today a strong Nigerian movement under Aziwike is making England yield ground; he demands a ten year condominium, five years home-rule by one thousand trained Nigerians, then independence. Failing to get that he proposes to appeal to the United Nations, and after that, "direct action." A rival youth organization and a newer union of the powerful Yorubas may spell division as the English hope; on the other hand, it may lead to wider union and irresistible strength.

Liberia has never been independent. She has had first to fight native tribes for a foothold; and then for a half century exercize all her skill to escape the imperialisms of Britain, France and Germany, only to be driven into the hands of American capital. She desperately needs today an intelligentsia to restore the remnants of her freedom in the face of militarism. navy and corporations from America.

South Africa

Second in importance comes South Africa / the Union, the Rhodesias, the Protectorates and the mandate of South West Africa. Here, after a wild scramble which raised all of the worst of human passions and a few of the best, we have today, inland from the Cape once called Good Hope, the greatest center of human race hate in the world. In the Union of South Africa there are today, two million three hundred and thirty-five thousand four hundred and sixty white folk who have complete political domination over seven million seven hundred and thirty-five thousand eight hundred and nine blacks and one million one hundred and eighty-seven thousand five hundred and eighty-nine colored folk and Asiatics. This dominion of eleven million persons extends the right to vote only to its two and a half million white citizens.

The African, although a taxpayer, has no right of citizenship. He is barred largely from skilled industry; his trade unions are not recognized, and he is denied the right to strike. Legislation prohibits him from acquiring land in cities, [redacted], forces him to carry a pass, and therefore deprives him of the right to seek free employment. The arrests of natives, especially for the violation of the laws about carrying passes, coming to cities, and failure to pay poll tax, lead to two hundred thousand arrests in a single year; whereas in England, with four times the population, only thirty thousand are arrested. Urban Negroes are housed for the most part in noisome shanty towns with no decencies of civilized life.

Taxation and economic compulsion drive the African from the reserves to the mines, where he is housed and segregated in barracks. His average wage while so employed is approximately $200. a year. There are four urgent needs for the black population, and their representative councils have repeated these many times. Removal of the industrial color bar, more land, abolition of caste laws, and the extension of the franchise. The land situation by the law of 1938 gives the eighteen million natives twelve per cent of the total land area of the Union, leaving two hundred and fifty million acres for the less than two million five hundred thousand whites.

For years the limited wealth of South Africa has been the privilege of its white population, whose higher standard of living is at the expense of the economic and social welfare of the blacks. The Second World War made South Africa prosperous. The national income, which was $500,000,000 in 1911, reached in 1945 -46 $2,800,000,000. The result is that South Africa has been booming, there has been a vast increase in economic activity, and secondary industry has outstripped mining and agriculture. But already

The native group is now split roughly into three parts; two million live in cities, three million live on the white farms in the country, and three million on the reserves. Two-thirds of the whites are in cities and one third on the land.

For a long time the gold mining industry, based on cheap black immigrant labor, has been looked upon as the backbone of South African economy. Now industry is outstripping the mines. With this new dependence upon industry, what is going to be the future of South Africa? If they look toward manufacturing for a white market it will be a long time before the white market of Africa reaches five million; and if they are going to manufacture for the native population, then the native population must receive larger income by far than it does now.

If the native population should become organized and antagonistic to the white population, there would be four natives to threaten every European, and the difficulties would be tremendous. This is the reason that communism will not thrive in South Africa, because even liberal Europeans fear the communists' doctrines of race equality and communal property.

The total expenditure for Negro education, 1946 -47 is ten million dollars, in addition to three and a half million dollars for school feeding. The Institute of Race Relations says that, "these funds are, of course, quite inadequate and cannot keep pace with the natural increase in the school age population, let alone overtake the existing shortage." [redacted] In 1941 out of 1,125,000 Africans of school age, 347,050 were in school. About eighty-five per cent leave school before standard third.

The last few years in Wouth Africa have seen difficult race relations.

Hostility among Negroes and Asiatics toward the whites has grown. There has been violence, culminating in the strike of the African mine workers in 1946, and the climax was reached when African members of the native representative council adjourned indefinitely in August, because of their inability to secure a statement from the government giving the facts in regard to the riot and the strike. They alleged breach of faith on the part of the government in its dealings with the council, and called for immediate abolition of all discriminating legislation.

In the meantime, and more menacing than the race relations, is the fact that there is already slackening in economic activity in South Africa. After a long period of continuous expansion, the nation's rate of growth is beginning to decrease. Today there is more uncertainity and doubt about the immediate economic outlook than at any time since 1940. And it is at this time that the Smuts government has been overthrown on the issue of increased segregation and suppression of the darker races. [redacted]. A Negro leader, Z.K. Matthews comments: "I am convinced that the Nationalists will with the connivance of many non-Nationalist Europeans put into effect against non-Europeans all the things that they have wanted for so long. However, in their struggle for a better place in the South African sun, the African people remain undaunted and the retrogressive action, which they now expect, will only serve to make them more determined to close their ranks and organize themselves better for the fight that lies ahead."

The Institute of Race Relations says: "We feel bound to issue a warning that if this situation in the field of race relations is allowed to deteriorate

further, it will before long reach a stage in which the voice of reason will not be heeded." The recent experience of the British in India, of the Dutch in Java, and of the French in Indo-China shows that the Non-European peoples of the world will not remain amenable to rational argument if we Europeans fail to make amble concessions to social justice while there is still the time and the temper to do so. In South Africa the period is drawing to a close in which honourable compromise is possible between the claims of various races that compose our community. ..."

Adjacent to South Africa lie the Negro Protectorates, Basutoland, Bechuana-land, and Swazi-land, now administered by the British colonial office under treaty. On account of the stubborn resistence of the natives, especially the Basutos, these territories were annexed by treaty and given a considerable degree of autonomy. South Africa has long desired to annex them and Malan will probably make another attempt to do so. They are meanwhile slowly but stubbornly dying of economic starvation and throttling of outlet and enter-prise at the hands of both British and South Africans.

Nyasaland and the Rhodesias lie between South Africa and East Africa and are pushing for autonomy with the power in the hands of the whites. Here will take place in the future some of the most severe cases of racial strife and antagonism. Here are vast acres of land rich for farming and in untold mineral wealth. A small but close-knit group of whites are set here to carry out the South African pattern with a smaller ruling class and a less educated mass of serfs. They are avoiding the more crass and open race program, but proceeding in land monopoly, segregation, restricted education, low wages and a minimum of political power.

East Africa

East Africa is a physical sport of nature with snow-capped peaks on the equator and that vast rift in the earth, visible from the moon, if there are

eyes there to see, with the deepest lakes in the world, sloping down to the coast that for centuries has knit Africa and Asia. Here are three lands, Tanganyika, Uganda and Kenya. Tanganyika has only fifteen persons to each of its 360,000 square miles, ~~m~~with five million natives and seventy thousand whites. Nobody votes, but the whites are assuming ownership of men and resources. Diamonds and other minerals are being exploited and here Britain is placing her peanut culture scheme. The land is being slowly seized, and the natives get almost no education and are nearly voiceless.

Elspeth Huxley says that from Tanganyika to Uganda one passes "from vastness and poverty to a compact tidy, closely administered, relatively wealthy country, favored by nature with highland and rainfall which has brought abundance and comparative prosperity to most of its people."

Uganda is the still unconquered remnant of a series of African empires. It was long the victim of white religious strife and emerged as a British "protectorate" with some autonomy and wealth in its retention of ownership of its land. Uganda has 95,000 square miles and four million people. The black ruling class consists of land holders and employers, who import labor from the Belgian Congo and the Nile valley. Uganda has started on an educational program. Here is Makerere College, which may yet become the black University of East Africa. Ten years ago there were 270,000 children in school, and presumably there has been considerable advance since, although figures are not available. Information concerning Uganda is regularly suppressed because this is a country which can easily follow the lead of West Africa and become the center of [illegible] movement toward autonomy. It has a long history of indigenous culture. Its economic problems are severe and the encroachment of investing capital is threatening.

square miles, there is a population of three and a half million. Here 25,000 whites have monopolized the most fertile eighty per cent of the land, and have tried to compel the Negroes to work for them. The blacks, densely crowed in lowland, desert and swamp, have made a fierce struggle for opportunity. They have forced their cause on the British and gained vacillating sympathy. Once their interests were declared "paramount" as compared with the immigranting South Africans and English; but little has been done to implement this declaration. Less than one-fifth of the school population is in mission and government schools, and the wealth accruing to the whites from monopoly of land (which cost them almost nothing), transport and investment have given the ruling clique a vast power. The only fly in their ointment is a large contingent of Indian merchants who dispute the division of profits and lately have been joining the natives in their opposition to white control. Surrounded by the Sudan, Ethiopia and Uganda, white rule in Kenya will have no easy path to complete domination.

The Nile Valley

At the head of the valley of the Nile stands Ethiopia on the citadel of Africa; it has had restored to independence a struggle with Britain, who is not certain whether this country will prove a fortress against Asia or a threat to Europe. Both Italy and Britain are seeking colonial claims which would strip Ethiopia of her outlet to the sea, and both Europe and America are seeking to get control of the resources of this rich land. Meanwhile, Ethiopia is striving in poverty to educate her masses, sending students abroad for higher education and technical skill and is using Russians, Scandinavians and American Negroes to build up industry and sanitation. The Emperor is a wise and brave man, but he is not getting from the United Nations or from European civilization the aid and encouragement he so sorely needs. If Ethiopia once reaches real economic independence, the end of the domination of Europe in Africa will be in sight.

23-39-22

The fifth part of Africa---Algeria, Tunis, and Morocco---we will pass over for lack of space and concentrate on the last part.

Latin Africa

Down the Nile valley from Ethiopia lies the Sudan, the source of ancient Egyptian civilization, the last bastion which in the 19th century drove Britain out of its borders for thirteen years and nearly gave North Africa to Ethiopia and France. Kitchener and Egypt recaptured the Sudan, [redacted] until in our day Egypt seeking independence from the British Empire finds itself losing the Sudan [redacted]. The Sudan controls the Nile, the life-line of Egypt, and [redacted] is the broad path to British East Africa. Who controls the Sudan will, with an independent Ethiopia, control East and central Africa. Consequently both Egypt and England are today wooing the seven million black people on the million acres of the Sudan. The Sudanese remember how Mehemet Ali of Egypt spoiled this land with rape and slave trade and how still Egypt draws the color line in politics and industry. But they also remember that the English desecrated the tomb of the Mahdi and have only lately favored the Sudanese and educated them for the civil service only in order to supplant the Egyptians. A duel is going on today. One party led by a descendant of the Mahdi wants independence from Egypt. Another party wants to remain under the Egyptian domination. To clinch her claims, Britain is increasing Sudanese education. [redacted] general education spread. [redacted]

23-39-23

North Africa

North Africa -- Algiers Tunis and Morocco -- form a region where an Arab world with a large infiltration of Negro blood is being developed theoretically as a part of France and formerly, so far as Tunis was concerned, as a part of Italy. As a matter of fact, this area is still in semi-colonial status and demanding larger autonomy.

Latin Africa

The sixth part of Africa we may call Latan Africa. It composes the vast African Empire of France, the great Valley of the Congo, the remains of the Portuguese African Empire and the small enclaves owned by Spain, [redacted]

[redacted]

Here, so far as France and Portugal are concerned, we have a rather curious situation: a promise of justice and equality which amounts to the training of a small élite, separating them from the masses and turning them into Frenchmen and Portuguese with full rights, but leaving the mass of people in those territories without leadership or guidance and at the mercy of some of the worst sorts of commercial exploitation. France has a complete educational system for her colonies. There are higher schools for medicine and engineering and, for those who can afford it, no difficulty in attending the great schools and universities in France. But this means that education has not touched the mass of the French African people. A black African like Diagne may rise to cabinet position, but he married a French wife and his family became practically French. [redacted]. Eboué, becomes a great governor of wide renown, but still the black mass is untouched.

23-39-24

Recently President Auriol greeted the new Union Francaise: [redacted] "From all parts of the world, from all countries, from all religions, from all races, from all origins, from all conditions-- to all of you citizens of the Union Française" [redacted] But the exact form of this federation of colonies with France and the actual power that is going to be in the hands of the colonies is by no means certain.

In the meantime, one reads the memoirs of Emile Faure. Faure is the grandson of the great Samory, former Sultan of Nigeria, who fought back the French for eighteen years and finally, in 1898, was captured and exiled. His grandson has spent much time in Africa and is now living in Paris, working as an engineer. He says:

> "This lamentable condition of the Negroes in the French Colonies is a direct outgrowth of their political status, and this may be easily summed up in four words. They have no rights. Like the serfs of the Middle Ages they are 'taxable and workable at will,'

and the administration, like the seigneur, has the right of life and death over them".

In Portugal the official news is heartening. There is a five-year plan in Angola and an appropriation for social work in Mozambique. Angola has a housing program, increased minimum wages and irrigation projects, together with a proposed large hydro-electric plant and new labor laws. There is a port development at Beira, which may become a center of exportation for all of East Africa; and in 1945 Portuguese Guinea celebrated its four hundredth anniversary. Yet reports from travellers are disconcerting. Susan Welty charges state slavery: a "planned economy" which steals the peasants' produce and deliberately stifles education. And here again, the elite, the mulatto, the rich, escape and can become equal citizens of Portugal, or better a part of the exploiting regime in Angola or Mozambique.

A secret report in 1946 on Angola says, "The conditions under which Africans live in Angola are now almost unendurable. In fact, many don't live; they die at an early age due to the hardships imposed upon them." Taxes are 100 to 120 angolares a year, while laborers earn one and a half angolares a day when employed. Every device is taken to make workers default on tax payments, in which case they are sold to private employers under contract with nominal wages and terms lasting from three to ten years. Villagers flee to the bush to escape this slavery, homes are broken up, and often scarcely a single able-bodied man can be found in some villages. There is no regular government educational system, no sanitation, nor social services."

The Belgian Congo

We come now to the heart of Africa, the vast tropical bowl of the Belgian Congo, which lies between West and East Africa and border on the Sudan and Rhodesia. The Congo river system is the second greatest in the world, encircling an area 750 miles wide and 530 miles long. Forest covers the northern half of the area; grasslands spread across the southern part, and in the southeast is the healthful country in the Katanga district, which is one of the richest mineral regions in the world. In the Congo before the Belgians came, great native states flourished which were noted for their complex and interesting culture and their art.

In 1943, there were in the Congo 10,500,000 people of whom 35,000 were white. The annexation of the Congo began with Stanley's search for Livingston and ended at the Conference of Berlin in 1885 when Leopold of Belgium, backed by the United States, was given the Congo -- which is 77 times the size of Belgium -- as his personal estate. Financial difficulties and world criticism compelled him finally to turn over the Congo to the Belgian state. Belgium has never promised the Congo independence or even participation in government. It has developed this region as a commercial enterprise, chiefly controlled by four holding companies in which the government is a partner. The treatment of the natives under Leopold has been improved and the output of the colony especially during and since World War 11 has been phenomenal. Copper, zinc, palm oil, manganese, tin, uranium, diamonds, and rubber have been exported in constantly increasing quantities. Labor has been carefully conserved so as to make available over eighteen per cent of all the adult males. During the recent war, forced labor was used, but normally the compulsion is indirect through government control of crops to be raised.

Native labor is pursuing most of the semi-skilled and skilled work in the colony. Wages are low and there are no trade unions. Unrest crops out now and then, as in three instances in 1945, when soldiers killed seven and wounded sixteen strikers.

Education is supplied mainly by the Catholic Church, with some Protestant missions. It is limited to low-grade primary instruction with emphasis on religion, hygiene and respect for authority. About 800,000 pupils are thus taught, but only one per cent continue after this level and receive vocational training for work as artisans, or training as clerks or teachers. There is no opportunity for secondary, higher, or professional training in the colony, and no Congolese are allowed in Belgium for study.

Every effort is made in the Congo to keep down agitation and avoid a native intelligent leadership. Plans for widespread social work have been formulated recently with a subvention from Belgium and a colony council for advice, on which one or two natives will sit. Nevertheless, there are already signs of a native movement which Government reports note and give warning. The so-called "Evolués" publish the "Voix de Congolais" and count 65 circles with 2,829 members, representing perhaps 10,000 persons. This periodical is "loyal", but progressive. There are, too, some 12,000 mulattoes whose status is still undetermined.

The Congo is ruled on the British "indirect rule" plan, with the chiefs functioning under Belgian officials. The land remains mostly as a government monopoly, with the mass of natives as tenants-will. There has been work in health, sanitation, and the fighting of sleeping sickness and leprosy. Here is a perfect example of the regimentation of ten million black laborers for the industrial profit of a white nation, with care to make the exploitation a long-term project and not mere planless exploitation for quick and immediate returns. Nevertheless, the object is not, and never was the uplift of the Congo natives nor the giving to them enough education for any effective voice in government or self-expression. This plan is making Belgium rich and powerful; but it is giving black Congo increasing knowledge of modern technique. The question is: how long can this scheme last, and how far will it go?

and in the Negroids of all America; with the help of renascent Asia; and particularly with the direct aid of the socialist labor movement in all the world, we may slowly but finally erase from the minds of men and from political action, the attempt to build civilization on the domination of a few great powers over the mass of the world's workers; [redacted].

The world today is being led increasingly toward this conclusion by the determined and partially successful effort of the millions of Asia to govern themselves without the control of the white world. That colonialism and European domination will dissappear from Asia in a foreseeable future is as certain as any future event. This will concentrate colonialism in Africa, and if that continues, it will make the black race the footstool of the world; the one remaining mass of men ruled for other peoples' good; worked for other races' profit; and spiritually suppressed for the uplift of the rest of the world.

To accomplish this will call for the cooperation of Asia, the working people of Europe and America; and black folk themselves. If Asia, in fear of reconquest or in sympathy, refuses cooperation, or even actively intervenes; if the white working classes see or think they see in the continued subjection of Africa, nothing less than a remnant of the exploitation from which they themselves are escaping, and perhaps even a weapon to retard their progress in political power and industrial dominance; or finally, if the African refuses longer to submit and begins increasingly to fight with protest, appeal, strikes, and weapons even in the face of frightening white armament; in such case, white colonial imperialism cannot possibly succeed.

If, on the other hand, white civilization continues on the path of total war, it will not only distroy itself, but cannot slow down that

Obstacles to these schemes of expansion in Africa have been pointed out by a variety of British observers. One writer says: "We are trying to make our people believe that there are vast resources of food to come out of Africa to help this country, but if the natives of Africa are fed properly there will be no surplus to come out of Africa. . . . The natives are increasing to a tremendous extent, and they are unable to provide food for themselves at the present time."

23-39-34

Others emphasize the poverty of Africa, which is illustrated by the fact that in 1946 the total revenue of British African colonies averaged $4 a head, while the figure for the United Kingdom for the same year showed an average of nearly $300 a head. A Member of Parliament declares "that for every £12 of wealth created in Africa in the past, we took out £11 and left £1."

Another argues that "cheap labor" in Africa is a fiction, since the native must get "primary education, better food, and more incentives," including good villages with their own schools and hospitals and a higher standard of living, before they would be able to do the work."

Still others emphasize the dangers inherent in spreading the colonial system of South Africa where 2,500,000 whites rule 9,000,000 natives and colored without giving them a voice in government, and keeping them in economic dependence and poverty. "If the idea is inadvertently spread," warns an MP, "that the decisions of the peoples for whom we are responsible in Africa and Asia can be settled in London or Paris or Brussels or The Hague without consulting them, we shall get trouble, and we shall deserve it."

23-39-35

Such warnings, however, are lost upon bodies like the Rhodesia National Affairs Association which, at a recent meeting, launched the idea of "Capricorn Africa" to include all states between the Equator and the Tropic of Capricorn: Uganda, Kenya, Tanganyika, Belgian Congo, Angola, the two Rhodesias, Nyasaland, Mozambique, the Bechuanaland Protectorate and part of French Equatorial Africa. This comprises an area slightly larger than the United States, with a population between 35,000,000 and 40,000,000, and possessing resources richer than those of the United States in everything but oil. Purpose of this union would be to help the nations of Western Europe to complete economic recovery, and it would embrace "only colonial countries where white European political control is to be permanent."

more

Behind all such schemes lurks a theory broached 25 years ago by a member of the Legislative Council of Kenya in a pamphlet which he titled, "The Thermopylae of Africa." He forecoast that Europe must eventually withdraw from Asia and, forced to abandon its aggressive expansion, would have to collect and reorganize its diminished strength within defensible limits and there await an Asiatic onslaught in a contest between the primary races of mankind. He saw Kenya Colony as the center of defense and rule in Africa, and Africa itself as the most important unit of the group of territories which whites dominate outside of Asia. Africa's immense area, her fertility, her numerous population, her resources and her geographical position he saw as making that continent decisive in the final conflict of the primary races, and Kenya was to be the core.

23-39-36

How close this theory is to the thinking of current last-ditch imperialism is suggested by the fact that in January of this year it was announced that a huge military stores depot was under construction at McKennon Road, Kenya, 65 miles from the coast. Today thousands of white troops and engineers are stationed at this base. There are 2,000 Italian artisans there who were flown in from Rome. There are more

[redacted] thousands of African laborers at work. Thirty-five miles of jungle are being cleared and water is being piped in from 70 miles away. Here is being collected, in stone buildings and huge iron structures, hundreds of thousands of tons of war materials from North Africa and the Middle East.

One of the great by-products of the Second World War is the growing importance of Africa, second [redacted] greatest land area in the world with one hundred and fifty million people and limitless natural resources. England has lost control of India and Burma; France has lost Indo-China, and Holland is losing Indonesia. In the Near East is the threat of the Arabs and Islam, with an independent Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Trans-Jordan, Iraq and Iran. Western European imperialism must, to survive, center in Africa.

An English daily says: "There are few people . . . who realize the urgent importance of Pan-African development; in particular, the cooperation of Great Britain with France, Belgium and Portugal.

Sir Arthur Salter has pointed out that the United States must encourage productive foreign investments on a large scale, and that the colonial empires of Great Britain, France and Holland offer the best fields. American capital investment in South Africa has doubled since 1939, and our State Department has announced that British colonies will be the primary source from which the United States can make good stock piling for raw materials. In 1946 the United States bought from the Belgian Congo 3,650 tons of uranium for $5,000,000.

AFRICAN ROOTS OF PEACE

First draft sent to

The African Roots of Peace

The growing feeling of the importance of Africa:

1. As a source of food supply
2. As a source of minerals and other materials
3. As a center where cheap labor will furnish continued profit for investment
4. As the center of military defense of the West against the East
5. As the continuing center of colonial government

Two developments emphasize these thoughts and plans:

1. Current plans for African production in England, France and Belgium, and investment from the United States

2. The new self-conscious African laborer, shown by protests, strikes, organization and educational movements

3. The growing connection between African laborers and

   - Negro labor in America
   - White labor in Europe and America
   - Asiatic labor.

4. The increasing contradictiction in Africa between the concepts of color caste with untrained serf labor without political power and educated labor with political power, in a planned and mechanized economy

5. The differing degrees of influence which these ideas are having on the six sections of Africa (West Africa; South Africa; East Africa; Ethiopia and the Valley of the Nile; North Africa the Africas of France, Belgium and Portugal)

The resultant prospects for Peace in the 20th Century

THE AMERICAN NEGRO WOMAN

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

In 1924, after the First World War, I wrote a book The Gift of Black Folk in which I tried to portray the role which Negroes have played in the making of America. One chapter in that book was on "the freedom of woman hood" and there I sought to tell "how the Black Woman from her low estate, not only united the two great human races, but helped lift herself and all women to economic independence and self-expression."

In the quarter century that has elapsed since the writing of this chapter it is difficult to realize the changes that have swept over the world: the Depression and the Second World War, the Rise of Russia and the Freeing of India. The influence of all this upon American women of Negro descent has been vast; and I write this word to emphasize their meaning to American culture, their difficulties and their accomplishments.

There can be no doubt but what the kernel of the problem of women today is their economic independence, and the career of Negro women as workers, as heads of families, as leaders in cultural development has been one of the strongest influences in America toward solution. We must not forget in this connection that epoch-making speech which Sojourner Truth made at the second National Woman's Suffrage Convention in 1852. She was an Amazon, six feet tall, black and erect. She was entirely unschooled, a hard-bitten working woman who came to this meeting of white women and crouched in the corner against the wall. Repeatedly messages went to the presiding officer "Don't let her speak, don't get our cause mixed up with abolition and Negroes."

There was warm discussion on the status of women, and matters were getting pretty well snarled. At last the black woman arose from the corner and the audience held its breath. Her words translated into plain English said this:

"That man over there says that women need to be helped into carriages and lifted over ditches and to have the best places given them. Nobody ever helped me into carriages or over a mudpuddle or gave me any place; and ain't I a woman? Look at me, look at my arms: I have plowed and planted and gathered into barns and no man could head me. Ain't I a woman? I can work as much and eat as much as a man and bear the lash as well. I have born thirteen children and seen most of them sold off into slavery and ain't I a woman?

"If the first woman God ever made was strong enough to turn the world upside down, all of these together ought to be able to turn it back and head it right again."

The freeing of women in America and in the world has made rapid strides since that speech, but today the place of woman in the world is still not clear nor satisfactory. The breaking-up of the American and European classic type of home and family is a symptom of this continued striving of women for emancipation; and on the forefront of this fight, both consciously and unconsciously are American Negro Women.

The first problem and perhaps the most ancient, as has been said is that of economic independence: of the right of a woman to do remunerative work and receive for it pay sufficient to support herself; and not because of this to be deprived of the right to have children and enjoy such male companionship as she chooses. Negro women have been forced into the front of this fight because of the economic difficulties of Negro men in earning sufficient to support a wife and children. The unmarried woman had economic independence forced upon her and is now striving to rationalize this and to make it compatible with husband and children. She has to bear in this fight the ancient punishment put on womankind; she has been accused of widespread prostitition and incontinence; she has been blamed for refusing to bear countless children, whom her husband could not support; and she has achieved only partial economic independence because of the refusal of most white women to recognize her plight and to strive with her even for their own advantage.

A picture of woman's work according to the census of 1940 shows that of those 14 years of age and over, 25% of the white women and 38% of the colored women were in the labor force while 57% of the white and 42% of the colored women were working in their own homes. The employment of colored women showes 4% in professions 16% working on the farm, 1.3% clerical service, 6½% operatives in factories, 60% servants and 10% in social service. Contrasting this with the whites we find it among white women nearly 15% are among the professional women, 33% in clerical work, 21% in factories and 11% in domestic service.

The problem of the colored woman worker centers in the occupation of domestic service , an occupation practically unorganized, almost unprotected in law and subject to hangover from medieval conditions. The practical problem for Negro women is the reduction of those engaged in domestic service by escape into better paid, better organized and better recognized employment. With these domestic servants may be put the great mass of the women workers on farms. This leaves a working class among colored women approaching economic emancipation, outside the home, of something like 22% as compared with nearly 80% among white women.

Nevertheless the advance among colored women has been spectacular. Of course the attention of the public has been concentrated upon the professional class and in our day it comprehends great singers like Marian Anderson and Dorothy Maynor, young writers like Shirley Graham and Ann Petry, leaders in social service like Eslanda Robeson and Grace Hamilton, dancers like Pearl Primus, and a host of distinguished teachers and librarians and leaders inYWCA work and in professional nursing. There have been pioneer women physicians from early days down to the public health work of Virginia Alexander; and lawyers like Jane Bolin. But beyond this spectacular and better known accomplishment is the work of Negro women in industry. The hair culture industry established by Madam C. J. Walker gave employmeny to hundreds of thousands of young women and influenced similiar work in the white world. There has been notable leadership in labor organizations which led to the sending of colored women to represent American labor at international meetings.

The advance in the great field of general employment is a slow and continuous fight, but the colored women are gradually wining. They can be found as clerks in Macys store in New York; they can be found as stenographers in governmental service; they can be found as factory workers in the middle west, and the one thing that all this striving calls for, is mutual recognition of the oneness of this effort of emancipation with the effort of all women in America and elsewhere.

A PROPOSED PLATFORM FOR THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY FOR 1950

The American people want Peace. They want neither to conquer the world nor police it. They have no desire to meddle in other peoples affairs, nor censor their thought nor control their industry. They want to spend the billions now wasting in war on human education and uplift for all men.

We are threatened by not nation. There is no disagreement between us and the Soviet Union which force can settle or which conference cannot resolve. We are opposed therefore to the Atlantic Pact and similar treaties.

We are blood-guilty in using the firightful atom bomb to kill women and children after unnecessarily refusing to outlaw the weapon save on our own terms; in curtailing its peacetime use; and surrendering this use to monopoly; and in planning even more frightful weapons.

We believe in self-determination for all peoples regardless of color, race, belief or political philosophy. We congratulate China on achieveing rule of the people and demand her recongition and the refusal of further aid to Chiang Kai Shek and his kind.

Specially do we demand the abilition of the colonial system and freedom from its tentacles of all present peoples who suffer from control by foreign masters. We see in this system endless cause of war, poverty, ignorance and disease.

Many of us are not satisfied in basing our prosperity on the degradation of most of mankind, but busy ourselves with transmuting political colonialism into industrial and financial slavery, so as to build high profit and high wage in Europe and the United States on poverty and starvation in Asia, Africa, Central and South America , the beautiful raped islands of the seven Seas.

We want to help the needy of all lands so far as we can; but we refuse to couple slarity with commercial profit or political control. We therefore demand that the Marshal Plan be confined to restoring the autonomy of the victims of war and not used for land monopoly, industrial advantage and thought-control.

Not by might nor by power can we help the world, but by sacrifice and example; we gain little by boasting of a democracy which we do not practise or of riches and comfort which at least a third of our own population do not share. We are ruled today by corporate wealth; and blessed as we are in natural resources, never before have so few owned so much at the expense of so many. Public welfare must replace private profit and planned economy must bring order and justice out of the anarchy of Free Enterprise and Private Initiative.

We demand control of industry, public ownership of banking, transport and communications, of mines and oil wells, and of all government subsidized industry. We demand limitation of income so as to insure a decent standard of living and curb excessive personal wealth; and we need a tax structure calculated to achieve these ends by stopping tax exemption for the greedy and increasing the tax burden of the needy.

We demand immediate suppression of attempts at thought-control by "Un-American" committees, secret police methods as used by the F. B. I., and witch-hunting by officials and the press. Communists, Catholics and Pacificists have the same right to think, vote and act, within the law, as other Americans; and injustice in the courts must not be used to punish freedom of belief.

We demand for every American citizen, no matter what his color, race or belief the right to vote and hold office; the right to live where others live and on the same conditions; the right to work according to ability and to income according to accomplishment; the right to move without segregation and to receive education and other public benefits without discrimination; and the right to marry any sane, sound person who wants to marry him. This means fair employment legislation, laws against lynching and the poll tax.

The foundations of our democracy rest on free and equal elections. We should dtop rewarding disfranchisement in sections like the South by giving 7000 votes in South Carolina as much power as 70,000 in Michigan, with consequent committee chairmanships and rights to filibuster. Representation should be based on votes cast. Only in this way can the democratic weapon of the Third Party be able to oust corruption and reaction

We demand federal aid to education with ut segregation or discrimination by race, color or belief. And we believe that education is the function of the State and not of the Church.

We defend the right of working people to organize and bargain, whether in public or private employ and we resent the use of court injunction, to limit this right. We demand of labor unions freedom of admission to their manks of all men of every race and color and of any shade of political opinion.

We call for increased government control of land ownership and use; for socialized medicine to protect the public health; for abolition of slums and for publicly subsidized housing on a nation-wide scale; for unemployment relief, sickness and old age security on levels sufficient for decent life; for the protection and subsidzation of workers in any essential industry like farming which has suffered from present organization of industry; we believe in the encouragement of all forms of self-help, like consumers cooperation.

We have made Science the prisoner of Big Business, governemt the slave of the army and education plaything of propaganda. We have come out of war a scared, suspicious, money-mad people, without love, faith or hope and with our charity married to profit.

We are increasingly becoming helpless victims of our secret police with spying, lying and wire-tapping, unrevealed witnesses and star-chamber methods even in the halls of Congress and in government employ.

We resent the intrusion of courts upon the realms of democracy and the increasing tyranny of judges on the rights of lawyers and clients.

We believe in America so thoroughly and in the Bill of Rights so completely that we refuse to exchange democracy for oligarchy, freedom for slavery or self-respect for "jim-crow" laws or practices.

We ask the votes of all persons who support the essentials of this platform and we do not ask or wish to know what other beliefs or aims they have so long as they wholeheartedly support ours. We believe that persons who so distrust their own aims as to exclude anybody from supporting them, show lack of faith in their own program.

This is a brief statement of our beliefs and policy. During the campaign we shall prepare and distrubite detailed statements on each of the points referred to above with facts and detailed suggestions for remedies and improvements.

A PROPOSED PLATFORM FOR THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY
FOR 1950

The American people want Peace. They want neither to conquer the world nor police it. They have no desire to meddle in other peoples affairs, or censor their thought or control their industry. They want to spend the billions now wasting in war on human education and uplift for all men.

We ask the United Nations to remember that their main object and reason for being is Peace and to this end, we need wider co-operation, greater faith in each other, mutual Disarmament and effort to achieve World Government with freedom, autonomy and abundance for all peoples.

We are threatened by no nation. There is no disagreement between us and the Soviet Union which Force can settle or which conference cannot resolve. We are opposed therefore to the Atlantic Pact and similar treaties.

We are blood-guilty in first and unnecessarily using the frightful atom bomb to kill women and children; in refusing to outlaw the weapon save on our own terms; in curtailing its peacetime use, surrendering this use to monopoly; and in planning even more frightful weapons.

We believe in self-determination for all peoples regardless of color, race, belief or political philosophy. We congratulate China on achieving rule of the people and demand her recognition and the refusal of further aid to Chiang Kai Shek and his kind.

Especially do we demand the abolition of the colonial system and freedom from its tentacles of all present peoples who suffer from control by foreign masters. We see in this system endless cause of war, poverty, ignorance and disease. We must not built high profit and high wage in Europe and the United States on poverty and starvation in Asia, Africa, Central and South America, and the beautiful raped islands of the seven seas.

~~We repudiate the Truman Doctrine wherever it supports~~

We demand that the Marshall Plan be confined to restoring the economy of the victims of war and not used for land monopoly, industrial advantage and thought control. We repudiate the Truman Doctrine wherever it supports oligarchy and reaction as in Greece and Korea. We ask redemption of our promise to Israel.

Not by might nor by power and far-flung armies, navies and aircraft can we help the world, but by sacrifice and example; we gain little by boasting of a democracy which we do not practise or of riches and comfort which at least a third of our own population do not share. We are ruled today by corporate wealth; and blessed as we are in natural resources, never before have so few owned so much at the expense of so many. Public welfare must replace private profit, and planned economy must bring order and justice out of the anarchy of Free Enterprise and Private Initiative. No pauper is free, no public service can be private, and the sick and ignorant cannot initiate enterprise.

We demand control of industry, public ownership of banking, transport and communications, of mines and oil wells, and of all government subsidized industry, and of all business which needs for proper functioning, police power and use of public property.

We demand limitation ~~of~~ and such control of income, rents, profits and prices as is necessary to insure a decent standard of living and to curb excessive personal wealth; and we ask a tax structure calculated to achieve these ends by stopping tax exemption for the greedy and decreasing the tax burden of the needy.

We demand immediate suppression of attempts at thought control by "Un-American" committees, secret police methods as used by the FBI, and witch-hunting by officials and the press. Communists, Catholics and Pacificists have the same right to think, vote and act, within the law, as other Americans; and injustice in the courts must not be used to punish freedom of belief and legal defense of accused persons.

We demand for every American citizen, no matter what his color, race or belief the right to vote and hold office; the right to live where other live and on the same conditions; the right to work according to ability and to income according to accomplishment; the right to move without segregation and to receive education and other public benefits without discrimination. This means fair employment legislation and laws against lynching and the poll tax.

The foundations of our democracy rest on free and equal elections. We should stop rewarding disfranchisement in sections like the South by giving 7000 votes in South Carolina as much power as 70,000 in Michigan, with consequent committee chairmanships and rights to filibuster. Representation should be based on votes cast. Only in this way can the democratic weapon of the Third Party be able to oust corruption and connivance reaction.

We demand federal aid to education without segregation or discrimination by race, color or belief. And we believe that education is the function of the State and not of the Church.

We defend the right of working people to organise and bargain, whether in public or private employ and resent the use of court injunction, to limit this right. We demand of labor unions freedom of admission to their ranks of all men of every race and color and of any shade of political opinion.

We call for increased government control of land ownership and use; for socialized medicine to protect the public health; for abolition of slums and for publicly subsidized housing on a nation-wide scale; for unemployment relief, sickness and old age security on levels sufficient for decent life; for the protection and subsidization of workers in any essential industry like farming which has suffered from present organization of industry; we believe in the encouragement of all forms of self-help, like consumers cooperation.

We have come out of war a scared, suspicious, money-mad people, without love, faith or hope and with our charity married to profit. We must cease to make Science the prisoner of Big Business, government the slave of the army and education the plaything of propaganda. We need desperately a free press

The persons who support this platform do not agree in all matters and have many minds as to wrongs and remedies; as to national and individual responsibility for present conditions. But here are set down the matters on which we do agree; and to the support of this platform we seek the votes of all persons and we do not ask or wish to know what other beliefs they have so long as they wholeheartedly support ours. We believe that persons who so distrust their own aims as to exclude anybody from supporting them, show paradoxical lack of faith.

BANNAKER'S PEACE PLAN

By W.E.B. Du Bois

"And suddenly there was with the Angel, a multitude of the Heavenly Host, praising God and saying: Glory to God in the highest and Earth Peace, good will toward men!"

Two thousand years passed. Years when we fought 10,000 wars and killed ~~more~~ people ~~than~~ ten times as many there are in the United States and Russia combined; and destroyed billions on billions of property and ruined the hearts and heads of all the world.

And suddenly, in 1949, there was with the Delegates at Lake Success, a multitude of the Pentagon Generals, praising ~~God and yelling~~ with Eisenhower, "We can lick the world!" Why was this? Because we are crazy. The world is crazy.

But in 1793, before the nineteenth century, and just after the Revolutionary War, there was a man, Benjamin Bannaker and he was black. "His head was covered with a thick suit of white hair, which gave him a very venerable and dignified appearance. His dress was uniformly of superfine drab broad cloth, made in the old style of a plain coat, with straight collar and long waistcoat, and a broad brimmed hat. His colour was n t jet black, but decidedly Negro. In size and personal appearance, the statue of Franklin at the Library in Philadelphia, as seen from the street, is a perfect likeness of him." Banneker had seen the filth and suffering and idiocy of war. He knew the peace-loving Quakers and so he wrote and published in his annual almanac-"A Plan of Peace."

Here are pages photographed from this article, printed in 1793; said Banneker: Our constitution is defective in not providing "an office for promoting and preserving perpetual Peace." He then outlined seven things to be done:

1. Appointment of a Secretary of Peace in the President's cabinet.

2. Power for this Secretary to establish and maintain free schools, where pupils would be instructed not simply in reading, writing and arithmetic, but "to cultivate Peace with all men" and not only to forgive but to "love our enemies;" and that God alone may take life.

3. That each pupil be given a bible inscribed "Peace on Earth; Good will to men."

4. Over the door of every home in the nation let there be inscribed these words: "The Son of Man came into the World, not to destroy men's lives but to save them."

5. Capital punishment to be abolished.

6. The militia to be disbanded and all military uniforms and titles discarded.

7. A museum to be established at the Capitol in Washington to laud Peace and condemn War; with exhibits, pictures and entertainment.

Shirley Graham says in her biography of Banneker, "Your Most Humble Servant":

"In Philadelphia Benjamin Rush read the Plan with deep satisfaction. They cynical comments he heard from men who should have been interested filled him with dismay, then angered him. "Cannot our country have peace?" he asked. Should not peace be the chief business of government?

One night after an argument which arose from a reading of the Peace Plan Dr. Ruch sat late at his desk. He looked at the last page of the Plan and shook his head. It was too fanciful! After a moment he drew a blank sheet to him and picking up a quill, began to write a new section for the Plan for Peace. He had been a soldier. It was out of his own experience that he wrote:

In order more deeply to affect the minds of the Citizens of the United States with the blessings of peace by contrasting them with the evils of war, let the following inscriptions be painted upon the sign which is placed over the door of the War Office------

1. An Office for butchering the Human Species
2. A Widow and Orphan making Office
3. A broken bone making Office
4. A wo den leg making Office
5. An Office creating public and private Vices
6. An Office for creating a Public Debt
7. An Office for creating Speculators, Stock Jobbers and Bankrups
8. An Office for creating Famine
9. An Office for creating pestilential Diseases
10. An Office for creating Poverty and the destruction of Liberty and national Happiness

" So wrote Dr. Benjamin Rush out of the despair of his heart, despair for his beloved young nation that stumbled on toward war.

" But Benjamin Banneker never saw this addition to the Plan for Peace."

Shirley Graham says in her Geography of Banneker, "Your most humble servant"

(Copy ~~##~~ 193-4)

The "Plan for Peace" published by Benjamin Banneker in 1793, is a remarkable historic document and peculiarly suited to reading in our own day. It demands a cabinet office in Washington to promote Peace; to take charge of free popular elementary education; to abolish capital punishment and to strive toward the ~~dropping of military titles and~~ clothing the glorification of war by exhibiting and emphasizing the victories of Peace.

Banneker published this plan in his almanac , where he was used to print his own work and quotations many authors. The Plan has no initial, ~~indicating~~ indicating that Banneker ~~not only published it but also~~ the Plan conceived and wrote. DR. DU BOIS MAKES HISTORY
IN CAMPAIGN FOR U.S. SENATE

Exclusive

By Robert Lucas

NEW YORK___(ANP)___ Dr. W. E. B. DuBois this week launched a new phase of his amazing career at a time when most men would be content to rest on their laurels. The world-famed scholar and Negro leader has tossed his hat into New York's political ring, thereby throwing old line politicos into near panic.

25-6-283

The 82-year-old statesman is the American Labor Party candidate for the U.S. Senate. Except for a brief stint as Special Minister Plenipotentiary to Liberia in 1928, it is his first venture into politics.

Because of his tremendous international stature, Dr. DuBois' candidacy as the first Negro to run for the U.S. Senate in New York has aroused interest far beyond the borders of the Empire State.

With this in mind, we visited Dr. DuBois at his office in the Council of African Affairs building. Why does a man with 50 years of outstanding service behind him choose to enter the arena of rough and tumble politics? we wanted to know.

"In the last years of my life," stated the former professor of Greek, Latin, Economics, history and sociology, I can think of nothing more important I could do than to project in this practical way the things I've fought for all my life."

Contrary to what might be a normal expectation, the factor of age has no bearing on the fitness of Dr. DuBois for public office. Political observers here agree that his brilliant mind and significant accomplishments raise him head and shoulders above the current crop of congressional material.

35-6-284

Sitting in his study, lined with books from ceiling to floor, the ALP Senatorial candidate gave every indication that he could easily fulfill the dozen or so radio broadcasts planned for him, plus the campaigning in Syracuse, Buffalo and other upstate cities.

He had just returned from a European trip, his 13th in the last 23 years, and he had much to say concerning the Number One topic of the day-- Peace. "There is in Europe a widespread desire for peace," declared Dr. DuBois. "There is a strong, almost bitter, reaction to war."

"England is moving toward war," he observed," but it is not popular. Too many men were killed in Germany for her to mount another war, but Germany is trading her influence between East and West. In Czechoslovakia, Roumania, Bulgaria and Hungary, there is a strong desire for peace. They are getting their greatest gains from peace; education, health, etc.

"Peace sentiment in Europe is overwhelming," he added, "It is hard for them to understand why the United States is so set on war."

Reaction to the noted scholar's candidacy ranged from the staid N.Y. Times headline "DuBois of ALP Ticket To Get Many Negro Ballots," to the N.Y. Age's prediction, "It's a cinch that if a Negro Senatorial candidate is in the running, a huge slice of those 400,000 votes will come from the Negro voters."

35-6-285

Political and geographical lines have apparently vanished as both Negroes and whites of all political shades and from as far west as California have come to the support of the historic candidacy of a Negro for the country's top congressional post. Running against Dr. DuBois are Sen. Herbert Lehman (d.), and Lt. Gov. Joseph Hanley (R.).

"My political activity has been almost wholly confined to writing," Dr. DuBois admits. "In this writing, with some speaking, I tried first to put the Negro vote in proper and effective relation to the national needs.

"In the first election of Woodrow Wilson, I sought to end Negro subserviency to the Republican Party. I tried to induce the Bull Moose movement to make Negro rights a main plank and fought it when it refused. I opposed Taft's 'lily-white' Southern policy and supported the third party movements of LaFollette and Henry Wallace."

It is generally conceded here that if the ALP reaches its goal of a record off-year registration of eligible voters, the election of Dr. DuBois is assured. Ewart Guinier, widely-known labor leader and chairman of the ALP's Harlem Council, has announced that the campaign will be launched Oct. 5 at Golden Gate ballroom with a mammoth Jubilee and Rally for Peace and Freedom, in honor of Dr. DuBois and commemorating his half-century of fighting for Negro rights.

Hanging over the fireplace in Dr. DuBois' study, in the midst of his degrees from Fisk, Atlanta, Harvard, Berlin and Howard universities, is a large portrait of Frederick Douglass. The visitor is immediately struck with the resemblance between the two Negro statesmen, one a leader of the Civil War era, the other making history today in the same fighting tradition of Douglass and other men of heroic stature.

MR. WALLACE IN 1948 AND 1950

W. E. B. DU BOIS

Anyone reading Mr. Wallace's speech of November 12, at Community Church, has difficulty in following his logic and reconciling his present views with his past pronouncements. I have long been an admirer of Henry Wallace and was ready to risk my career to support him in 1948. Back in 1933, I was glad of his efforts to rescue agriculture and curtail poverty by methods which seemed to my mind socialistic in method. His fight against monopolies as Secretary of Commerce followed this trend and when he was ousted for opposing Truman in 1946, I realized with others the tragedy of his failure to be nominated for the vice-presidency in 1944. In 1948 Wallace spoke as a prophet:

"I saw things from the insidefor nearly 14 years. And it is what I know of my own personal knowledge that leads me to speak out sharply and to act. For the Truman-Dulles-Vandenberg-Dewey policy has developed an approach which, if permitted to come to full fruition, will destroy completely the civilization of the past 2000 years and may destroy all human life on this planet."

"In pledging to live by the Constitution, we have earned enemies. And we are proud of our enemies:

The men who stand for Jim Crow
The men who stand for Taft-Hartley
The men who support fascists in Greece and China
The men who prefer an atmosphere of war, because they profit by it.

"A vote for them--for the Republicans or the Democrats-- is a vote for war, is a vote for renazification of Germany, for freeing another Ilse Koch, The Progressive Party alone gives the people a chance to vote for peace. For we are not committed, as they are, to the cartel interests of John Foster Dulles; we are not enmeshed, as they are, in the Dillon-Read banking house of James Forrestal. We do not profit, as they do, from mass murder and the dropping of atom bombs."

In 1949, Wallace added:

"There is always the danger ... that when the next big depression comes the military, backed by big business and the press, will organize a coup. There will be greater danger of this in the early 1950's than in 1933 when there was talk of such a threat.

35-7-22

"The November election have not changed the fundamental fact that the two great dangers faced by America and the world are American fascism and eventually war resulting therefrom."

He said in 1947:

"I fight the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan as applied because they divide Europe into two warring camps . Those whom we buy politically with our food will soon desert us. They willpay us in the base coin of temporary gratitude and then turn to hate us because our policies are destroying their freedom."

Of Chine he said in 1949:

"The situation in China is tragic proof of the inevitable failure of our present foreign policy, of which the Marshall Plan is a part. Sending money and military supplies to bolster reactionary governments against the will of their people serves the cause of reaction and war, not democracy and peace."

He was critical of Russia but friendly:

"I remember reading the papers a few days after FDR died. I read that the Truman Administration was about to make the most drastic reversal of our foreign policy since 1933. I realized the terrible danger. I saw the signs--saw the Russian haters move toward power even before Roosevelt was buried. I heard it when I sat in the back seat of the car with Truman and Byrnes on the way to the funeral train coming up from Warm Springs. There was a vast change in Washington. Herbert Hoover hurried toward important business at the White House."

"Now I heard the talk of hate even more openly. At Washington social gatherings, the talk of treating Russia rough began."

"We must be clear where the responsibility lies. Russia has made mistakes, many mistakes. But the men of the bipartisan bloc--Dewey, Truman, Dulles and Forrestal--started the cold war. Roosevelt's policies of postwar cooperation were scrapped before they were ever tried."

35-7-23

"The drive toward war, supported by both old parties, is being engineered by Wall Streeters and military men who stand to profit from war and war preparations. Not a single American principle or public interest would have to be sacrificed to make peace with Russia."

"Peace, continued Wallace, "is the first issue of all" in the '48 campaign. He regarded in 1948 events in Czechoslovakia as objectionable but, added, "We have to realize that we brought it upon ourselves by the way in which we operated in Greece, sending arms there, sending arms to Turkey." Mr. Wallace's platform in 1948 had this ringing declaration:

"We denounce anti-Soviet hysteria as a mask for monopoly, militarism, a and reaction. We demand that a new leadership of the peace-seeking people of our nation--which has vastly greater responsibility for peace than Russia because it has vastly greater power for war--undertake in good faith and carry to an honorable conclusion, without appeasement or sabre-rattling on either side, a determined effort to settle current controversies and enable men and women everywhere to look forward with confidence to the common task of building a creative and lasting peace for all the world."

In this speech of 1950 all this has changed both in word and emphasis. Wallace has apparently completely changed his attitude toward Russia:

"We are being forced to arm! Why? "

"During 1946-48, I wanted to meet Russia half way to prevent war. Today this possibility is remote and millions are in no mood to compromise, because Russia is determined to conquer the world peicemeal through an ever increasing ring of satellites.

"Russia developes discontent among backward peoples suffering from century old poverty and war misery

"Hunger, poverty, misery, disease and war gave communists the horses to ride on

"The danger to the United States from communism is infinitely greater than from Nazism because Russia appeals to half the world with a doctrine which seems to give them what they want in a measure far greater than what we have offered.

"Again and Again Russian leadership of the common man has resulted in unspeakable cruelties.

"Russia during this past year has engaged in utterly ruthless political exploitation of nations along her borders.

Since Tito's defection, Russia has taken over completely all countries on her western border. In 1949 and 50 all Chech leaders not trained in Moscow were eliminated. Russia undoubtedly pushed the button which launched the North Korean attack June 25.

"Like Trygve Lie I sood for admitting the New China into the Un. But just as the Chinese action in Tibet has changed Nehru's attitude, so also the action of the North Koreans on June 25, changed my attitude."

Then comes this astonishing statement:

"The Russians after their terrible mistake in Korea may put us on a most difficult spot by shifting from a propaganda peace drive to a bona fide peace offer!"

This reasoning is for me most difficult to follow. Apparently, Mr. Wallace sees the Soviet Union changing in 1949-50 from a nation seeking to defent itself from aggression to an expanding imperialism. But is this clear?

85-7-24

Mr. Wallace has previously admitted that Russia is surrounded by hostile airbases and hearing inbridled wartalk had a right to safe-guard herself. He knows that while Russia has never attacked a nation, 14 countries including the United States have invaded her

35-7-25

He refers to her 12 million dead in the second World War, "her demolished factories, her burned cities and ravished farms." He admits that after World War II "the great powers began to connive against each other" and that both Russia and the United States "have solved their political and economic problems by huge armaments."

Would it have been wise from the Russian point of view to sit down unarmed among the modern nations, and to have encouraged the raid of Western capital upon the Baltic states, Poland and the Balkans. Moreover is there not here a strange contradiction: on the one hand we call the Russians fools and slave-drivers and on the other hand declare that they have forced into their orbit and hold by force and immense and growing number of satellites against their will. This is a feat that America has failed in signally in Puerto Rico, the Phillipines, China and South Korea. Has Russian success in Poland, Czechoslovakia and other lands been proof of arms, of force or ideas? If is is force of ideas and those ideas prove wrong, will not time and truth right conditions sooner than world war?

Moreover how sure is Mr. Wallace of his facts? Did the Soviet Union start the Korean War? Or was it started by American business and Syngman Rhee? Certainly all the facts have not been aired and the American press is no biblical guide. Is it true that Poland and Czechoslovakia are overawed by force and in worse condition than before the World Wars? I visited both these lands in 1893 and 1910. Generalizations based on short visits to large countries are not conclusive but they are better than arm-chair judgements on the basis of Associated Press reports. I firmly belive that these lands are freer and more prosperous than ever in their history. Mr. Wallace's treatment of China is most amazing. Who had better opportunity of rescuing China after the onslaught of Japan than the United States, and who according to Wallace's own testimony muffed their chance more completely than this country, with all its warlords and Big Business. And yet Wallace has the effrontery to scold China and order her not to listen to the siren call of Russia. In the same breath he admits that the Soviet Union has less race prejudice than the western world and can usually maneuver to make it appear that we are using our arms on behalf of colonial powers, kings, landlords, or money lords to oppress people and stop the inevitable course of progress.

How much "maneuvering" does that take? Moreover Mr. Wallace makes some peculiar admissions: "Ever since 1929 the western world has been totally unable to bring about full employment except by war or getting ready for war."

What in the name of that God with whom Mr. Wallace professes close relations, is the rest of the world, especially the Yellow, Brown and Black, going to be up to, while America is arming to fight creation in spite of Wallace's admission that: "No nation has the God-given right to exploit other nations."

Rather gingerly, Wallace tries to attack both Socialism and Communism, with whom he once was willing to share a world. He remarks with that exasperating theological twist which he sometimes thrusts into his talks "Marxism denies the spiritual side of man and the existence of God" and then adds with confused logic; "But previous to the rise of Marxism, nations professing Christianity had spilled more blood in war than all the pagan nations put together. He declares that the Welfare State is not socialistic and deplores socialism, although last year his only criticism was that the American people were not ready for socialism, and chided the workers for having "little interest in Government ownership of key industries. Even after unemployment comes, the furthest they will go will be to sanction extensive government planning accompanied by adequate centralized power and government credit to give business itself the courage to do the job of stablizing employment at a high level.

The final tour de force of this speech is: "We in the US inspite of the McCarran Act still have a free world. Russia in spite of all she has done to teach her people to read and write, still has a slave world."

And he thinks that the labor movement of the world together with world-wide hatred of America is based on "envy".

This apologia of a man who once led the progressive forces of America is a confession of poor reasoning powers and surrender to the current hysteria of America for reasons which he himself is unable to fathom.

MR. WALLACE IN 1948 AND 1950

BY

W. E. B. DU BOIS

35-7-37

Aany one reading Mr. Wallace's speech of November 12, at Community Church, has difficulty in following his logic and in reconciling his present views with his past pronouncements. I have long been an admirer of Henry Wallace and risked my career to support him in 1948. Back in 1933, I was glad of his efforts to rescue agriculture and curtail poverty by methods which seemed to my mind distinctly socialistic. His fight against monopolies as Secretary of Commerce followed this same trend and when he was ousted in 1946 for opposing Truman I realized more than ever the tragedy of his failure to be nominated for the vice-presidency in 1944.

In 1948 Mr. Wallace spoke out as a prophet:" I saw things from the inside for nearly 14 years. And it is what I know of my own personal knowledge that leads me to speak out sharply and to act. For the Truman-Dulles-Vandenberg-Dewey policy has developed an approcah which, if permitted to come to full fruition, will destroy completely the civilization of the past 2000 years and may destroy all human life on this planet."

"A vote for them--for the Republicans or the Democrats-- is a vote for war, is a vote for eenazification of Germany, for freeing another Ilse Koch, The Progressive Party alone gives the people a chance to vote for peace. For we are not committed, as they are, to the cartel interests of John Foster Dulles; we are not emmoshed, as they are, in the Dillon-Read banking house of James Forrestal. We do not profit, as they do, from mass murder and the dropping of atom bombs." Henry Wallace later signed the Stockholm Appeal, altough nespapaers today report him as assenting to its use.

In 1949, Wallace said:

"There is always the danger... that when the next big depression comes the military, backed by big business and the press, will organizw a coup. There will be greater danger of this in the early 1950's than in 1933 when there was talk of such a thesat." After his defeat in 1948, he declared that: "The November elections have not changed the fundamental fact that the two great dangers faced by America and the world are American fascism and eventually war resulting therefrom."

"The situation in China" he said in 1949, is "tragic proof of the inevitable failure of our present foreign policy, of which the Marshall Plan is a part. Sending money and military supplies to bolster reactionary governments against the will of their people serves the cause of reaction and war, not democracy and peace."

He was critical of Russia in 1949, but friendly; because he knew the conspiracyoy against her: "I remember reading the papesss a few days after died. I read that the Truman Administration was about to make the most drastic reversal of our foreign policy since 1933. I realized the terrible danger. I saw the signs--saw the Russian haters move toward power even before Roosevelt was buried. I heard it when I sat in the back seat of the car with Truman and Byrens on the way to the funeral train coming up from Warm Springs. There was a vast change in Washington. Herbert Hoover hurried toward important business at the White House." The same Hoover who was from 1917, the most bitter and implacable enemy of the Revolution which spoiled his investments.

"Now I heard the talk of hate even more openly. At Washington social gatherings, the talk of treating Russia rough began." He blamed Russia, but "We must be clear where the responsibility lies. Russia has made mistakes, many mistakes. But the men of the bipartisan bloc--Dewey, Truman, Dulles and Forrestal--started the cold war. Roosevelt's policies were scrapped before they were ever tried."

He regarded in 1948, events in Czechoslovakia as objectionable but, added, "We have to realize that we brought it upon ourselves by the way in which we operated in Greece, sending arms there, sending arms to Turkey."

"The drive toward war, supported by both old parties, is being engineered by Wall Streeters and military men who stand to profit from war and war preparations. Not a single American principle or public interestwould have to be sacrificed to make peace with Russia."

In his 1948 campaign Wallace insisted "Peace is the first issue of all" His platform had this ringing declaration: "We denounce anti-Soviet hysteria as a mask for monoply, militarism and reaction. We demand that a new leadership of the peace-seeking people of our nation--which has vastly greater responsibility for peace than Russia because it has vastly greater power for war--undertake in good faith and carry to an honorable conclusion, without appeasement or sabre-rattling on either side, a determined effort to settle current controversities and enable men and women everywhere to look forward with confidence to the common task of building a creative and lasting peace for all the world." This was Henry Wallace of 1948.

In this speech of 1950 all has changed both in word and emphasis. Wallace apparently has completely altered his attitude toward Russia: "We are being forced to arm!" He cries, Why?

"During 1946-48, I wanted to meet Russia half way to prevent War. Today this possibility is remote and millions are in no mood to compromise, because Russia is determined to conquer the world piecemeal through an ever increasing ring of satellites." He enlarges on this theme: "The danger to the United States from communism is infinitely greater than from Nazism because Russia appeals to half the world with a doctrine which seems to give them what they want in a measure far greater than what we have offered."

35-7-40

The word "seems" rings curiously: if the commnists offer merely seem to give and does not fulfil its promise, will not Time correct this mistake at less cost than War? Apparently not for Mr. Wallace lashes out against Russia and its deception; he follows here exactly the reactionary line of the press owned by Big Business and the propaganda of Big Brass; with the sudden discovery of Tito as the long lost friend of America; the picture of Czechoslovakia as oppressed, the Korean war as started by Russia and the hope that India and China will fall out over Tibet:

"Russia during this past year has engaged in utterly ruthless political exploitation of nations along her borders."

"Since Tito's defection, Russia has taken over completely all countries on her western border. ~~In 1949 and '0, all Check leaders not trained in Moscow were eliminated.~~ Russia undoubtedly pushed the button which launched the North Korean attack June 2[illegible].

"Like Trygve Lie, I stood for admitting the New China into the U.N.. But just as the Chinese action in Tibet has changed Nehru's attitude, so also the action of the North Koreans on June 25, changed my attitude."

~~"Again and again Russian leadership of the common man has resulted in unspeakable cruelties."~~ He then explains the growth of Russia:

" Russia develops discontent among backward peoples suffering from century old poverty and war misery."

"Hunger, poverty, misery, disease and war gave communists the horses to ride on."

This is inept turning of the truth upside down: discontent among backward peoples developed Russia; while poverty, hunger and distress ride com unism to seek relief. If the world has a better horse, why not trot it out?

Then comes this astonishing statement:

"The Russians after their terrible mistake in Korea may put us on a most difficult spot by shifting from a propaganda peace tribe to a bona fide peace offer.!" Imagine Henry Wallace afraid of Peace!

This reasoning is for me is most difficult to follow. Apparently, Mr. Wallace sees the Soviet Union changing in 1949-50 from a nation seeking to defend itself from aggression, to an expanding imperialism. But is this true?

It is facts which this distracted world needs and facts Wallace does not even try to adduce. He bluntly accuses Russia of changes which he himself predicted and then deliberately puts the worst interpretation on them. Mr. Wallace has previously admitted that Russia, surrounded by hostile airbases and hearing unbridled war talk had a right to safe-guard herself. He knows that while Soviet Russia has never attacked a foreign nation, 14 countries including the United States have invaded her and subjected her for years to horrible curelites. Wallace knows how continously and persistently lies about Russia have been published in America.

He refers to her 12 million dead in the Second World War: "her demolished-factories, her burned cities and ravished farms;" he admits that after World War II, "the great powers began to connive against each other", and that both Russia and the United States "have solved the political and economic problems by huge armaments." Would it have been wise from Russian point of view to sit down unarmed among the modern nations, and to have remained neutral as Western capital prepared new raids upon the Baltic states, Poland and the Balkans?

Moreover, is ther not here a strange contradiction: on the one hand we call the Russians dreamers , fools and slave-drivers and on the other hand declare that they hold in their orbit an immense and growing number of satellites This is a feat that America has failed signally to ~~carry out~~ accomplish in Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Phillipines, Mexico, China and South Korea. Is Russian influence in Poland, Czechoslovakia and other lands proof armed force or of ideas? If it is ideas and those ideas in the end prove wrong, will not Time and Truth right conditions sooner than world war? Moreover who hung the Iron Curtain to break trade between East and West except on terms which Western capital laid down? This threw the east into the lap of Russia.

How sure is Mr. Wallace of his facts? Did the Soviet Union start the Korean War? Or was it started by American business and Syngman Rhee? Would not Peace in Korea have been of distinct advantage to Russia? Certainly all the facts have not been aired and the American press is no biblical guide. Is it true that Poland and Czechoslovakia are overawed by force and in worse condition than before the World Wars? I visited both these lands in 1893 and 1950, generalizations based on short visits to large countries are not conclusive but they are better than arm-chair judgments on the basis of Associated Press reports. I firmly believe that today the majority of the people of these lands are more prosperous and more hopeful than ever in their history. And that the western world is deceived by the bitter enmity and unconfirmed testimony of representatives of ousted landlords and monopolists who have for centuries exploited these lands ~~and are now abusing our hospitality~~.

M. Wallace:

~~Mr. Wallace's~~ present attitude toward China is most amazing. Who had better opportunity of rescuing China from the onslaught of Japan than the United States; and who according to Wallace's own testimony muffed their chance more completely than this country? And yet Wallace has the effrontery to scold China and order her not to listen to the siren call of Russia. He admits that the Soviet Union has less race prejudice than the western world and can usually "maneuver to make it appear that we are using our arms on behalf of colonial powers, kings, landlords, or money lords to oppress people and stop the inevitable course of progress . How much does that take in the face of our record in Greece, Korea and Puerto Rico?

Moreover Mr. Wallace makes some peculiar admissions: "Ever since 1929 the western world has been totally unable to bring about full employment except by war or getting ready for war." What is the rest of the world, especially the Yellow, Brown and Black folk going to be up to, while America is arming to fight all creation in defense of Wallace's admission that : "No nation has the God-given right to exploit other nations." Admitting the world-wide dislike of the United States, Wallace attributes this to envy of our prosperity and power; but in 1947, he had another explanation: "I fight the Truman Doctrine and the Marshall Plan as applied because they divide Europe into two warring camps. Those whom we buy politically with our food will soon desert us. They will pay us in the base coin of temporary gratitude and then turn to hate us because our policies are destroying their freedom."

35-7-43

Mr. Wallace in his attack on socialism merely quibbles; how a welfare state with planned economy differs from socialism is something which a champoin of the New Deal finds difficulty in explaining. He forgets that once his only criticism of socialism was that this country was "not ready" for it; and he chided labor for having "little interest in government ownership of key industries." With that irritating theological twist which Wallace always lugs into his talks. He admist that "previous to the rise of Marxism nations professing Christianity had spilled more blood in war than all the pagan nations put together." But charges that "Marxism denies the spiritual side of man and the existance of God." Marx seeking scientific unity declares that matter thinks and not an undiscoverable "spirit", but that did not hinder him from exalting the spiritual side of man as no economic philosophy has; and it comes in poor grace from a supporter of Roosevelt's Four Freedoms to deny freedom of religious belief.

The final tour de force of this speech is: "We in the US in spite of the McCarran Act still have a free world. Russia in spite of all she has taught her people , still has a slave world."

This begs the whole question. Many American, some of whom sit today in jail for no crime, would doubt the freedom of this nation; and if the Soviet Union is based on slavery, than a host of witnesses from Sidney and Beatrice Webb and Bernard Shaw to the Dean of Canterbury are either liars or fools.

This apologia from a man who once led the progressive forces of America, fills me with profound disappointment. It reads like abject surrender to current hysteria and the class interests surrounding Mr. Wallace. He was profoundly upset by the election of 1948. He could stand defeat when still defended by an applauding minority; but not defeat which entailed bitter criticism and the discountenance of respectable people. We saw him changing in 1949, and the change came before he had formulated the motives for it, because it was emotional rather than reasoned. This makes the logic of this speech so labored and unconvincing and so evidently contradictory to the past record of Henry Wallace.

MR. WALLACE IN 1948 AND 1950

W. E. B. DU BOIS

Anyone reading Mr. Wallace's speech of November 12, at Community Church, has difficulty in following his logic and reconciling his present views with his past pronouncements. I have long been an admirer of Henry Wallace and ~~was ready to~~ risk my career to support him in 1948. "In pledging to live by the Constitution, we have earned enemies. And we are proud of our enemies:

The men who stand for Jim Crow
The men who stand for Taft-Hartley
The men who support fascists in Greece and China
The men who prefer an atmosphere of war, because they profit by it.

"A vote for them--for the Republicans or the Democrats-- is a vote for war, is a vote for renazification of Germany, for freeing another Ilse Koch, The Progressive Party alone gives the people a chance to vote for peace. This was Henry Wallace in 1940.

In this speech of 1950 all ~~this~~ has changed both in word and emphasis. Wallace has apparently completely ~~changed~~ altered his attitude toward Russia:

Then comes this astonishing statement:

W. E. B. DU BOIS SPEAKS FOR PEACE

1900-1950

1900, London

In January 1900, a Pan-African Conference was held in Westminister Hall, London. Its Address which was written by W. E. B. Du Bois said:

"The problem of the twentieth century is the problem of the colour line, the question as to how far differences of race, which show themselves chiefly in the color of the skin and the texture of the hair, are going to be made, hereafter, the basis of denying to over half the world the right of sharing to their utmost ability the opportunities and privileges of modern civilization."

1911, London

In the great hall of the University of London, there was held a Rases Congress; Felix Adler and W. E. B. Du Bois were secretaries of the American section. Dr. Du Bois read a poem:

"Save us, world-Spirit, from our lesser selves!
Grant us that war and hatred cease,
Reveal our souls in every ace and hue!
Help us, O Human God, in this Thy Truce,
To make Humanity divine!"

1918, a Letter

In 1918, Dr. Du Bois wrote to President Wilson, just as the President was planning to attend the Congress of Versailles:

"The international peace Congress that is to decide whether or not peoples shall have the right to dispose of themselves will find in its midst delegates from a nation which champions the principle of the "consent of the governed" and "Government by representation." That nation is our own and includes in itself more than twelve million souls whose consent to be governed is never asked. They have no members in the legislatures where they are in the majority and not a single representative in the national Congress."

"A Conference, to consider the disposition of the former German colonies in Africa will serve, perhaps, better than any other means that could be taken, to focus the attention of the peace delegates and the civilized world on the just claims of the Negro everywhere."

Dr. Du Bois proposed

"The sending of personal invitations to representatives of the Negro race who can attend such a Congress;

... The making of strong representations to the Peace Conference sitting in Paris in behalf of both voice in and protection for 250,000,000 Negroes and Negroids in the League of Nations.

"The cordial and sympathetic co-operation of the Black, Yellow and White Races on terms of mutual respect and equality in the future development of the world."

1919, Editorial in the Crisis, June:

"We of America fight the great fight of Peace--we agitate, we petition, we expose, we plead, we argue. It is a long, slow, humiliating path, but for us War, Force, Revolution are impossible, unthinkable. For anybody the costs of bloody uprising are so vast

Leonard Woolf replies, July 29:

"I find that I can arrange a meeting between the officers of the Pan-African Congress and members of the Labour Party Advisory Committee on Sunday Afternoon August 28th in order to discuss questions connected with your movement."

Dr. Du Bois seeks to get the Labor Party to understand that the American Negro problem is part of the world problem of labor and peace.

"This question then, which is without doubt primarily a an internal and national question, becomes inevitably an international question and will in the future become more and more international, as the nations draw together. In this great attempt to find common ground and to maintain peace, it is therefore, fitting and proper that the thirteen million American citizens of Negro descent should appeal to the United Nations and ask that organization in the proper way to take cognizance of a situation which deprives this group of their rights as men and citizens, and by so doing makes the functioning of the United Nations more difficult, if not in many cases impossible."

"This Cultural and Scientific Conference for world peace has been a success. In a time of hysteria, suspicion and hate, we have succeeded in bringing face to face in friendly meetings, one of the largest gatherings of creative artists and thinkers the world has seen; and it would have been quite the largest if all who wished to come were here. Meeting together for three full days, we have found wide agreement and sympathy, we have established ideals and friendships belting the globe. We have not and are not now in complete agreement on all matters; but in one vital respect our agreement is complete: No More War! "

"We know and the saner nation knows that we are not traitors nor conspirators; and far from plotting force and violence it is precisely force and violence that we bitterly oppose. This conference was not called to defend communism nor socialism nor the American way of life. It was called to promote peace! It was called to say and say again that no matter how right or wrong differing systems of beliefs in religion, industry or government may be, war is not the method by which their differences can successfully be settled

"Two barriers and two alone hem us in and hurl us back today: One, the persistent relic of ancient barbarism--war: organized murder, maiming, destruction and insanity. The other, the world-oldhabit of refusing to think ourselves or to listen to those who do think. Against this ignorance and intolerance we protest forever. But we do not merely protest, we make renewed demand for freedom in that vast kingdom of the human spirit, where freedom has ever had the right to dwell: the expressing of thought to unstuffed ears: the dreaming of dreams by untwisted souls." He added at Madison Square Garden:

What we want is a decent world where a man does not have to have a white skin in order to be a man; where poverty is not a means to wealth; where ignorance is not used to prove race superiority; where sickness and death are not part of our factory system. And all this depends upon world peace. Peace is not an end. It is the gate ay to real civilization."

At the World Congress of the Partisans of Peace, Dr. Du Bois said:

"Let us not be misled. The real cause of the differances which threaten world war is not the spread os socialism or even of the complete socialism which Communism envisages. Socialism is spreading all over the world and even in the United States. ***

Against this spread of socialism, one modern institution is working desperately, and that is colonialism and colonialism has been and is and ever will be one of the chief causes of war. ***

Leading this new Colonial Imperialism comes my own native land, built by my fathers' toil and blood, the United States. The United States is a great nation: rich by grace of God and prosperous by the hard work of its humblest citizens.

Drunk with power we are leading the world to hell in a new colonialism with the same old human slavery which once ruined us; and to a Third World War which wil ruin the world.

are today being carried away by almost hysterical propaganda that the freedoms which they have and such individual initiative as remains are being threatened and that a Third World War is the only remedy.

Not all America has succumbed to this indefensible belief. The Progressive Party ... has challenged this program; The voters in 1948 declared wide agreement but were induced by fear to vote for a man who has not carried out his promises; The Council of Arts, Sciences and Professions assembled a vast protest against war the year and the Religious Sect of Quakers have just issued a fine balanced statement in the same line There are millions of other Americans who agree with these leaders of the Peace Movement; I bring you their greetings.

As candidate for United States senator from the state of New York, Dr. Du Bois said:

THE MOST SINISTER EVIL OF THIS DAY IS THE WIDE SPREAD CONVICTION THAT WAR IS INEVITABLE AND THAT THERE IS NO TIME LEFT FOR DISCUSSION. IT IS DOUBTFUL IF THE MASS OF AMERICANS WHO ACCEPT THIS JUDGMENT REALIZE JUST WHAT ITS IMPLICATIONS ARE. WAR IS PHYSICAL FORCE EXERCISED BY MEN AND MACHINES ON OTHER MEN SO AS TO COMPEL SUBMISSION TO THE WILL OF THE VICTORS. UNQUESTIONABLY IN PRIMITIVE TIMES THERE WERE REPEATED OCCASIONS WHEN SUCH RECOURSE TO FORCE WAS THE ONLY PATH TO SOCIAL PROGRESS. BUT AS CIVILIZATION HAS PROGRESSED AND INCLUDED LARGER AND LARGER MASSES OF MEN AND PORTIONS OF THE EARTH, TWO THINGS HAVE BECOME INCREASINGLY CLEAR: ONE, THAT THE COSTS OF WAR HAVE BECOME TOO GREAT FOR ANY NATION TO PAY NO MATTER WHAT THE ALTERNATIVE: AND TWO: THAT IN WAR AS NOW CARRIED ON, THERE CAN BE NO VICTORIOUS PARTY: IN MODERN WORLD WAR ALL CONTESTANTS LOSE AND NOT ONLY LOSE THE IMMEDIATE CAUSES OF STRIFE, BUT CRIPPLE THE FUNDAMENTAL BASES OF HUMAN CULTURE.

1950, Chicago.

At the annual meeting of the Progressive Party, Dr. Du Bois presentesd a proposed platform for the Party, which was in part as follows:

"The American people want Peace. They want neither to conquer the world nor police it. They have no desire to meddle in other peoples affairs, or censor their thought or control their industry. They want to spend the billions now wasting in war on human education and uplift for all men.

"We ask the United Nations to remember that their main object and reason for being is Peace and to this end, we need wider co-operation, greater faith in each other, mutual Disarmament and effort to achieve World Government with Freedom, autonomy and abundance for all peoples.

"We are threatened by no nation. There is no disagreement between us and the Soviet Union which Force can settle or which conference cannot resolve.

"Not by might nor by power, ~~and~~ far-flung armies, navies and aircraft, can we help the world, but by sacrifice and example. We gain little by boasting of a democracy which we do not practise or of riches and comfort which at lesst a third of our own population do not share. We are ruled today by corporate wealth; and blessed as we are in natural resources, never before have so few owned so much at the expense of so many. Pulbic welfare must replace private profit, and planned economy must bring order and justice out of the anarchy of Free Enterprise and Private Initiative. No pauper is free, no public service can be private, and the sick and ignorant cannot initiate enterprise.

We demand immediate suppression of attempts at thought control by "Un-American" committees, secret police methods as used by the FBI, and witch-hunting by officials and the press. Communists, Catholics and Pacificists have the same right to think, vote and act, within the law, as other Americans; and injustice in the courts must not be used to punish freedom of belief and legal defense of accused persons.

We have come out of war a scared, suspicious, money-mad people, without love, faith or hope and with our charity marred to profit. We must cease to make science the prisoner of Big Bussiness, government the slave of the army and education the plaything of propaganda. We need desperately a free press.

Conference at the Chinese Bankers Club with editors, publishers, business men and schoolmen. Dr. Du Bois told of the Negro Problem in the United States and discussed with them: "How far do you think Europe can continue to dominate the world; or how far do you envisage a world whose spiritual center is Asia and the Colored races?"

1936, Japan

Dr. Du Bois spoke at the Osaka Mainichi auditorium, at the University of Tokio and other schools. He discussed the future of the darker races, colonialism and world peace, as the result of understanding between Europe and Asia.

The Osaka Superintendent of education said "You deserve the highest respect...not only from all colored peoples, but also from all the peoples of the world."

1947, New York

An Appeal to the World, edited by W. E. B. Du Bois for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and presented to the Commission on Human Rights. Dr. Du Bois wrote:

"A discrimination practiced in the United States against her own citizens and to a large extent in contravention of her own laws, cannot be persisted in, without infringing upon the rights of the peoples of the world and especially upon the ideals and the work of the United Nations.

"This question then, which is without doubt primarily an internal and national question, becomes inevitably an international question and will in the future become more and more international, as the nations draw together. In this great attempt to find common ground and to maintain peace, it is therefore, fitting and proper that the thirteen million American citizens of Negro descent should appeal to the United Nations and ask that organization in the proper way to take cognizance of a situation which deprives this group of their rights as men and citizens, and by so doing makes the functioning of the United Nations more difficult, if not in many cases impossible."

1949, March, New York, Madison Square Garden

"This Cultural and Scientific Conference for world peace has been a success. In a time of hysteria, suspicion and hate, we have succeeded in bringing face to face in friendly meetings, one of the largest gatherings of creative artists and thinkers the world has seen; and it would have been quite the largest if all who wished to come were here. Meeting together for three full days, we have found wide agreement and sympathy, we have established ideals and friendships belting the globe. We have not and are not now in complete agreement on all matters; but in one vital respect our agreement is complete: No More War!"

"We know and the saner nation knows that we are not traitors nor conspirators; and far from plotting force and violence it is precisely force and violence that we bitterly oppose. This conference was not called to defend communism nor socialism nor the American way of life. It was called to promote peace! It was called to say and say again that no matter how right or wrong differing systems of beliefs in religion, industry or government may be, war is not the method by which their differences can successfully be settled for the good of mankind. To the defense of this absolutely indisputable thesis, proven by oceans of blood and worlds of human suffering, we have invited the cooperation of all men; and that cooperation to abolish war does not compel or even ask men to surrender their opinions. It simply insists that force is not reason and beliefs cannot be changed by suppression."

1949, April, Paris

At theWorld Congress of the Partisans of Peace, Dr. Du Bois said:

"Let us not be misled. The real cause of the differences which threaten world war is not the spread of socialism or even of the complete socialism which Communism envisages. Socialism is spreading all over the world and even in the United States.  Against thisspread of socialism, one modern institution is working desperately, and that is colonialism and colonialism has been and is and ever will be one of the chief causes of war.  Leading this new Colonial Imperialism comes my own native land, built by my fathers' toil and blood, the United States. The United States is a great nation: rich by grace of God and prosperous by the hard work of its humblest citizens.  Drunk with power we are leading the world to hell in a new colonialism with the same old human slavery which once ruined us: and to a Third World War which will ruin the world."

1949, Moscow, August

At the All-Russian Peace Congress, Dr. Du Bois was present as one of 25 prominent Americans invited to attend, most of whom refused to go. Dr. Du Bois to the 1,000 persons present, said:

"Americans are today being carried away by almost hysterical propaganda that the freedoms which they have and such individual initiative as remains are being threatened and that a Third World War is the only remedy.

"Not all America has succumbed to this indefensible belief. The Progressive Party...has challenged this program; the voters in 1948 declared wide agreement but were induced by fear to vote for a man who has not carried out his promises; The Council of Arts, Sciences and Professions assembled a vast protest against war this year and the Religious sect of Quakers have just issued a fine balanced statement in the same line. There are millions of other Americans who agree with these leaders of the Peace Movement; I bringyou their greetings."

1950, New York

As candidate for the United States senator from the state of New York, Dr. Du Bois said:

"The most sinister evil of this day is the widespread conviction that war is inevitable and that there is no time left for discussion. It is doubtful if the mass of Americans who accept this judgment realize just what its implications are. War is physical force exercised by men and machines on other men so as to compel submission to the will of the victors. Unquestionably in primitive times there were repeated occasions when such recourse to force was the only path to social progress. But as civilization has progressed and included larger and larger masses of men and portions of the earth, two things have become increasingly clear; one, that the costs of warhave become too great for any nation to pay no matter what the alternative; and two: that in war as now carried on, there can be no victorious party. In modern world war all contestants lose and not only lose the immediate causes of strife, but cripple the fundamental bases of human culture.

45-1-94

1950, Chicago

At the annual meeting of the Progressive Party, Dr. Du Bois presented a proposed platform for the Party, which was in part as follows:

"The American people want Peace. They want neitherto conquer the world nor police it. They have no desire to meddle in other peoples affairs, or censor their thought or control their industry. They want to spend the billions now wasting in war on human educ ation and uplift for all men.

"We ask the United Nations to remember that their main object and reason for being is Peace and to this end, we need wider cooperation, greather faith in each other, mutual Disarmament and effort to achieve World Government with Freedom, autonomy and abundance for all peoples.

"We are threatened by no nation. There is no disagreement between us and the Soviet Union which Force can settle or which conference cannot resolve.

"Not by might nor by power; by far-flung armies, navies and aircraft; can we help the world; but by sacrifice and example. We gain little by boasting of a democracy which we do not practice or of riches and comfort which at least a third of our own population do not share. We are ruled today by corporate wealth; and blessed as we are in natural resources, never before have so few owned so much at the expense of so many. Public welfare must replace public profit, and planned economy must bring order and justice out of the anarchy of Free Enterprise and Private Initiative. No pauper is free, no public service can be private, and the sick and ignorant cannot initiate enterprise.

"We demand immediate suppression of attempts at thought control by "Un-American" committees, secret police methods as used by the FBI, and witch-hunting by officials and the press. Communists, Catholics and Pacificists have the same right to think, vote and act, within the law, as other Americans; and injustice in the courts must not be used to punish freedom of belief and legal defense of accused persons.

"We have come out of war scared, suspicious, money-mad people, without love, faith or hope and with our charity married to profit. We must cease to make science the prisoner of Big Business, government the slave of the army and education the plaything of propaganda. We need desperately a free press."

Grant us that war and hatred cease,
Reveal our souls in every ace and hue!
Help us, O Human God, in this Thy Truce,
To make Humanity divine!"

In 1918, Dr. Du Bois wrote to President Wilson, just as the President was planning to attend the Congress of Versailles:

"The international peace Congress that is to decide whether or not peoples shall have the right to dispose of themselves will find in its midst delegates from a nation which champions the principle of the "consent of the governed" and "Government by representation." That nation is our own and includes in itself more than twelve million souls whose consent to be governed is never asked. They have no members in the legislatures where they are in the majority and not a single representative in the national Congress."

SHOULD NEGRO HISTORY BE TAUGHT AS A SEPARATE SUBJECT?

W. E. B. DU BOIS

For Congress

Theoretically a nations' history should be taught as a whole, and not in parts or in sections. It should be developed so as to tell one continuous and integrated story. But of course, such attempt at teaching must not contravene the facts. It is true that in many respects the history of a nation does not form one whole story, and cannot be understood unless parts of its history are studied and emphasized and afterward pieced together. Then too, there is always temptation to omit certain parts of the history in order to make a more logical story and to forget certain illogical and unfortunate incidents.

While then education should strive to teach national history as a whole and not make it predominantly the history of New England or of the South, or of the English or Scotch Irish, yet it must be acknowledged that if a part of a nation is unpopular as the Quakers long were; or disliked like the Mormons; or despised like the Negro, then care must be taken that the part these folk played in the general history of the country be not entirely omitted simply because we want to fortet them or because we do not like the people or section concerned. Such omission is not history and we must strive against it and we have done so, in may cases.

In the case of the American Negro, there are certain additional facts which make his a peculiar situation. Negroes were segregated even physically, much more than any other part of the nation and legally and spiritually they formed and still form a segregated caste often with separate schools and churches. They developed, therefore, a really separate history in their social efforts, in their thoughts, in their songs and in their writing.

On the other hand, this history naturally was not entirely separate, for Negroes were so intertwined with the total history of America that the story cannot be told if the Negroes are omitted.

Despite this, a certain shame at guilt, a dislike of recalling that this "land of the free" was also a land of the slave, tempts us either to omit entirely the part which the Negro played or to distort it. We do not like to remember, for instance, that the fathers of the country who declared that "all men are equal, with equal right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," said this in the face of 700 thousand slaves who formed a fifth of the nation. We are loath to remember that human beings in the United States were once legally real estate with no rights of property or family, to be bought and sold like cattle. This omission, whether deliberate or from sheer ignorance, not only is unfair to Negroes, but it is an affront to the ingelligence of the whites and a blot upon our system of education.

But there is still so much of race feeling against Negroes in the United States, that we cannot hope to have Negro history integrated in general history by the average school board or especially by teachers like May Quinn. It must be taught separately, until all are familiar with the main facts. This will be not simply a matter of defense for Negroes, but an upholding of science and truth.

I can best illustrate what I mean by referring to my own education. The first ten years of my elementary education took place in New England. There was little conscious prejudice there except perhaps toward the Irish and Catholics. The teachers were well-trained and graduates of excellent normal schools. The school term was 10 months in the year and the school buildings good and well equipped. Yet during that 10 years I did not learn of a single black man who had ever been of enough account to be mentioned in history. I did not learn of anything that the Negro race had done which was proof that it was equal to other races. There was no disparagement, there was simply omission. In the text books, particularly in geography, the races of men were illustrated so as to show benevolent and intelligent white folk and black folk who did not look altogether human. In literature there was no mention of Negroes except once in a while a joke.

This did not discourage me; it simply fired my ambition and when I became a teacher it kept me from boasting, since so far as the Negro race was concerned, there was nothing to boast about.

You may picture my dismay therefore in after years, having studied at Harvard and in Germany and being a teacher of economics and history, we welcomed Franz Boaz of Columbia to Atlanta Univeristy, Georgia and heard him talk about Negro empires and civilization in Africa! It was the most astonishing revelation that I had ever had. I literally fell on his neck after his speech and asked him for historical references to the matter of which he had spoken.

From that time my attitude toward history was changed. I found to my astonishment that history was not always a chronical of truth, but often the sort of fiction one likes to read. Practically the whole history of black folk had been either omitted from text books, or distorted; and when it was distorted, it was usually because the truth made many people uncomfortable. I undertook the restudy of Reconstruction in the United States after the Civil War and came to the conclusion that what was being taught was a terribly unfair and untrue picture of what happened after the slaves were freed and enfranchised.

My studies taught me the various accomplishments of Negroes; the discovery of the Southwest by Stephan Dorantes; the help in planning and building the capitol city of Washington by Benjamin Banneker, which Shirley Graham has recently so graphically told, but which those who celebrated the the 125 anniversary of the founding of Washington do not mention at all; the career of Frederick Douglass just documented by Philip Foner. In Brooklyn a few years ago a Negro pupil was ordered to sit down because he mentioned the 200,000 Negro soldiers in the Civil War. "There were no Negroes in the Civil War", snapped the white teacher. I then went further afield, in Africa, and saw the connection between Negro history and Egypt and the whole development of that continent in which centered so graphically the birth of science, the development of art, the building of the Catholic Church, and the establishment of the new industry in Europe.

Other American Negroes took up this line of study and it was Carter Woodson, who is just dead in Washington at the age of 71, who by his almost unaided efforts made Negro History Week celebrated in February throughout the United States. With his work and that of other Negro historians like Williams, Taylor, Wesley, and John Hope Franklin, who the other day received a Guggenheim Fellowship, there has been built up in America a considerable knowledge of the history of the Negro and of his place in American history. But this knowledge is not yet wide enough or sufficiently available to be taken for granted or included in history teaching of most schools and colleges.

For instance, the first national holiday of this country, the 5th of March was due to the martyrdom of Crispus Attucks; it was celebrated for ten years with orations by the greatest men of the nation, including Edward Everett and Daniel Webster, but unless this fact is brought forward in a special Negro history course, what would be said about it in the New York public schools?

We must have separate teaching of the acts, thought and meaning of the American Negro until the universities of the United States give courses on the subject. Today most of them do not; some few do and others refer incidentally to the subject; but on the whole one can study American history with almost no mention of Negroes, save as happy slaves.

THE P. I. C. CASE AND LABOR

Have members of the trade unions any interest in the case against the five officials of the Peace Information Center? The crime for which these leaders are being persecuted is telling the people of the United States what other countries are doing to promote peace. In this work they distributed various statements, facts and appeals; and especially they gave Americans a chance to read and approve if they wished the so-called Stockholm Appeal. This Appeal said:

> "We demand the outlawing of atomic weapons as instruments of intimidation and mass murder of peoples. We demand strict international control to enforce this measure.
> "We believe that any government which first uses atomic weapons against any other country whatsoever will be committing a crime against humanity and should be dealt with as a war criminal.
> "We call on all men and women of good will thruout the world to sign this appeal."

36-8-60

Immediately the Secretary of State declared publicly that this Stockholm Appeal originated in Russia and was for the advantage of Russia. The Peace Information Center replied that they did not care where the Appeal came from, they simply asserted the right of Americans to know what the Appeal was and to sign it or reject it as they wished. They also told them that hundreds of millions of people throughout the world were signing the Appeal.

Thereupon the Department of Justice intimated that talk advocating peace is treason and declared in indicting these persons that their ideas were not their own, but that they spoke as agents of a "foreign principal." The Defendants replied that they were not agents of anybody; that they circulated ideas which other people had stated and that by such circulation of ideas civilization had grown in the past and would grow in the future; that to deny people the privilege of knowing what other people think is thought control, which leads to a police state. For refusing publicly to acknowledge that they were foreign agents, these five persons were indicted and arraigned.

These five officials go to trial in October. If the Government wins, it can stop the circulation of any ideas of which it does not approve; it can stop international conference on problems; not only pf peace and war, but also international conference on labor problems, on church activities that are not purely religious; on the rights of women, on colonialism, on race problems and on any matter which is not discussed in accordance with those who happen to be in control of government in the United States. In our land, discussion will be confined to those matters about which the controlled press of the United States lets us know the truth and concerning the truth, as other people and other nations see it, we are not allowed either knlwledge or argument.

Manifestly, peace is Labor's greatest problem today, not only in this land but in the world. War settles nothing and leads simply to more war. It stymies the labor movement and sets groups of laborers murdering each other instead of striving in united effort to raise standards of work and living all over the world. It stops discussion, encourages inner bickering and directs attention and strength away from the main fight of workers for freedom and progress. War kills the labor movement, and the determination of the Department of Justice to make even discussion of peace a crime calls for all trade unions to enter the fight for the defense.

Not only does war kill our sons and ruin their education and drive them into insanity, but the only result of war is more war. Meantime we are working today to make millionaires, to raise prices and rents, to surrender our liberties, and encourage spies, traitors and liars. The vast taxes which are raised fall far more heavily upon the poor than upon the rich and the proceeds go not to education, flood control or social uplift, but mainly to more war and murder; thus we are fighting in this case for the right to advocate peace and the persecuted victims represent:

a grandmother, a Negro, a war-veteran, the father of a family, and a clerk stenographer. Three of these are members of trade unions.

The nation is going insane with war hysteria. We are discussing not the question of peace but simply what kind of war we are going to spend all of our strength and money on. We ask you to help in this crucial case and to join us in a campaign for Peace--No More War, by helping our defense.

ABOLITION AND COMMUNISM

W. E. B. DU BOIS

36-8-147

The abolition of human slavery and the advocacy of the communistic state both arose in the same decade of the 19th century. It was common in the forties to hear Abolitionists called Communists and to hear Communists accused of Abolitionism. The two reforms finally separated just as today the labor unions are trying desperately seeking to repudiate all accusation of the red tinge; while Communists accuse the unions for selling their birth right for a mess of pottage. In the mid Nineteenth century, the Abolitionists, often property holders and even small employers, repudiated all thought of distrubing the current industrial system, but declared that the system should not include slaves. On the other side, the Communists and Radicals drew away from Abolitionists and declared they were forgeting white wage slaves for the interests of a few black slaves who were not worth freedom. It was not until after the Civil War that Karl Marx drew these separating ideologies together.

Meantime Abolition, concentrating on the ethical question of slavery found themselves under just as bitter attack from other quarters: they were taunted with woman suffrage, free love and miscegenation. Dextrously shifting the argument from slavery, the South and its friends pointed out contented servants, kind masters and prosperous agriculture, and contended that Abolitionists were low, contemptible, unworthy of hearing and due to be jailed.

Frederick Douglass tells us of a meeting in Middlebury, Vermont in 1843: "In advance of our arrival the college students had very industriously and mischievously placarded the town with violent aspersions of our characters and the grossest misrepresentations of our principles, measures, and objects. I was described as an escaped convict from the State prison, and the other speakers were assailed not less slanderously. Few people attended our meeting, and apparently little was accomplished by it." Efforts to argue or speak orto write met increasing mob law. Douglass says of a meeting in Ohio: "They tore down the platform on which we stood, assaulted Mr. White and knocked out several of his teeth, dealt a heavy blow on William A. White, striking him on the back part of the head, badly cutting his scalp and felling him to the ground. Undertaking to fight my way through the crowd with a stick which I caught up in the melee, I attracted the fury of the mob, which lad me prostrate on the ground under a torrent of blows. Leaving me thus, with my right hand broken, and in a state of unconsciousness..."

The analogy between the treatment of Abolitions yesterday and the Communists today is strong. White men like Lovejoy were killed for advocating abolition. In 1835, Garrison was dragged through the streets of Boston, with a halter around his neck! A howling mob followed Wendell Phillips in Boston for three days, whenever he tried to talk.

But the great artillery of the pro-slavery contest was the judicial decision. Courts confiscated literature as subversive; judges sent even free Negroes into slavery on the word of a claimant, without a jury trial. Fugitives from slavery were hunted like beasts, while those who sought to rescue them found themselves branded as criminals.

Finally the slave power girded itself to one great solemn pronouncement which on the very verge of Civil War was to settle the slavery question for all time, by solemn edict of the Supreme Court. The robed justices ranged themselves on either side of their venerable and widely known Chief-Justice Taney and heard his solemn decision. The court affirmed that the sweeping language of the Declaration, that "all men are born free," had no application to Negroes, because at that time they were generally regarded "as so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." The case being thus thrown out of court, all further discussion of its merits was superfluous---a mere OBITER DICTUM, without legal force. Nevertheless, the court through its chief-justice went on to pronounce upon the plaintiff's claim and declare it baseless; on the ground that inasmuch as a slave was lawful property, and the Constitution decreed that no man should be deprived of his property without due process of law, therefore an act of Congress declaring in effect that when carried beyond a certain line a slave was lost to his master, was unconstitutional and void.

Thus in 1857, the courts of the nation for all time settled the question of Negro slavery. Six years later the Negroes were free and ten years later they had the right to vote in Judge Taney's state. The nation rejoiced:

> He hath put down the Mighty > from their seats, > and hath exalted them of low degree.

But the exaltation came slowly and with infinite pain. The fight for democracy had not ended; it had just begun its modern phase. The Negro worker became a serf on the land, disfranchised and poverty stricken. Hordes of immigrants poured into the new nation and tried to monopolize jobs by skilled trades, by race, by religion, by color. Negroes became professional strike-breakers, and lynching and riots ensued.

Finally came a new day when throughout the earth the welfare state began to replace private profit industry. The whole [illegible]rialist world strove for cheap labor and materials in Africa and Asia, to off-set the demand for higher wage on the part of European labor. This was the First World War and it shook capitalistic industry to its foundations. The gold standard of value fell and the automatic price markets ceased to function.

Immediately the old technique went into action: Socialists and Communists were accused of attacking property and thrift; they were called envious, lazy scoundrels; they must be killed, jailed and stopped from agitation. Again the Socialists and Communists separated and the Communists were condemned for their Socialist program. Russia was outlawed. Above all the courts, above democratic control and above the letter of the law must pronounce sentence and in New York, eleven Communist leaders are sent to jail: not for any act which they committed; not for any illegal advice which they gave; but for saying words and expressing ideas which some one might interpret as seditious. Thus the nation preens itself that it has stopped the laborer from thinking. Such is the modern Dred Scott case.

ABOLITION AND COMMUNISM

The abolition of human slavery and the advocacy of the communistic state arose in the same decade of the 19th century. It was common in the forties to hear Abolitionists called communists and to hear communists accused of abolitionism . The two reforms finally separated just as today the labor unions are trying desperately seeking to repudiate all accusation of the red tinge; while communists accuse the unions for selling their birth right for a mess of pottage. In the mid Nineteenth century, the abolitionists, often property holders and even small employers, repudiated all thought of disturbing the current industrial system, but declared that the systm should not include slaves. On the other side, the communists and radicals drew away from abolitionists and declared they were forgetting white wage slaves for the interests of a few black slaves who were not worth freedom. It was not until after the civil war that Karl Marx drew these separating ideologies together.

Meantime Abolition, ~~separated from accusations of attacking property~~ and concentrating on the ethical question of slavery, found themselves under just as bitter attack from other quarters: they were taunted with woman suffrage, free love and miscegenation. Dextrously shifting the argument from slavery, the South and its friends pointed out contented servants, kind masters and prosperous agriculture, and condended that Abolitionists were low contemptible, unworthy of hearing and due to be jailed. Frederick Douglass tells us Efforts to argue or speak or to write met increasing mob law. Douglass says of a meeting in Ohio: (Mc. 287-8) over

But the great artillery of the pro-slavery contest was the judicial decision. Courts confiscated literature as subversive; judges sent even free Negroes into slavery on the word of a claimant, without a jury trial. Fugitives from slavery were hunted like beasts, while those who sought to rescue them found themselves branded as criminals. Finally the slave power girded itself to one great solemn pronouncement which on the very verge of civil war was to settle the slavery question for all time, by solemn edict of the Supreme Court. The robed justices ranged themselves on either side of their venerable and widely known Chief-Justice Taney and heard his solemn cdecision: The Negro is not and never was a citizen of the United Stsaes He has always been regarded as having no rights which a white man is bound to respect

COLORED FOLK AND THE ROCKEFELLER PLAN

The recent report of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund is issued by a panel dominated by big business. In addition to the Rockefeller interests, eleven great corporations were represented and ten departments of universities and other organizations largely dependent on gifts from the wealthy. Ten other participants represented the press and Foundations, both closely allied with big business.

The colored world therefore must regard this report as what America in Industry and Trade regards as best for itself in foreign relations. For this very reason perhaps no historian or social scientist of broad background was present except A. A. Berle who believes that private capital has changed its nature by masking ownership and using the wages of labor for investment without giving these shareholders any voice in policies or in the distribution of profits.

The report emphasizes the fact that today nations must be interdependent instead of independent. Into this circle of nations, it declares, "any Communist state that is prepared to assume the responsibility and self-restraint of international life can be accepted." Apparently any capitalist state is eligible whether or not it assumes such responsibility. The report proceeds to picture the role of America as purely philanthropic, since it has "no territorial ambitions" and seeks a "World of Peace."

R The object of the Soviets on the contrary "has been and remains that of bringing Europe under their control." This is an astonishing perversion of history. The basic object of the Western world had been to return the Soviet Union and its allied countries to the control of the West. For this purpose the Soviets have had to fight invasion from nearly all the civilized countries and is today surrounded by American bases designed for attack upon the Soviets.

The plan says that the Soviet Union hopes to expand "until it has gained a clear preponderance of power in the world" and that it "has not expanded by persuasion but by force." This is proven by the fact that the Soviet Union has absorbed those countries which its armies occupied at the close of World War II.

Here again is a question of history. The Soviet Union after winning World War II at terrible sacrifice occupied the Baltic States, Hungary and a part of the Balkans not for expansion so much as for self-defense. Clemenceau had marked this borderland as the "cordon sanitaire" from which eventually Western Europe would reconquer Russia. This territory then the Soviets had to retain, or live under the continual threat of Western attack. Also these countries including the Soviet Union itself and Czechoslovakia were places where Britain, France, Germany and the United States had already invested in cheap labor and materials and were determined to regain capital invested and spread the sway of private capital to the Eastern Heartland.

America is generous, but its actions especially as dictated by big business are not always philanthropic. In fact what America wants from its international relations is income, wealth and power, particularly from those parts of the world where labor and materials are cheap. This is clear from our investments in oil, gold, diamonds and other metals; in fruit and sugar and dozens of other commodities. The profit from such investment is shown in the copper output of Northern Rhodesia. In a recent year it sold for $36 million. Of this the 17,000 black laborers whose forbears owned the land and who did the work of mining including much of the skilled work, got ~~600,000~~ $600,000 or $35 a piece for the year. Another labor group, who in truth were part of the employers, consisted of 1690 white artisans. They received $2½ million or $15,000 each annually. They have a union to which no Negro can belong and they have a right to vote. There remained a balance which, after costs of production and taxes were subtracted, left at least $15 million profit for the white shareholders in Europe and America. Manifestly it is profit like this far exceeding any profit that could possibly be made in domestic industry which attracts big business and influences our foreign policy. This is a matter on which this report does not touch.

The allies refused before the war to make alliance with the Soviet Union. Hitler offered alliance which Stalin accepted because it was either that or isolation. We entered the Second World War openly declaring that we cared not which side won so long as both killed as many as possible of the other. Our assistance to the Soviets was little and indecisive. When, therefore, despite this the Soviet Union won at Stalingrad, we had to surrender to them the "cordon sanitaire." [redacted]

This is the clear lesson of history and this the Rockefeller Plan ignores. On the contrary they declared that Europe must keep the door open "to those nations and peoples which historically have been associated with it and are now drawn into the Soviet orbit." The Baltic States, Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Balkans share the great European tradition and "must be welcomed into its intellectual and cultural life at every opportunity."

But they say nothing of the economic welcome which these countries were facing. They were poor for the most part, with low paid labor, ignorant masses, monopolized land and materials underpriced in the world market. They had long been exploited by Western Europe. The Soviet Union regarded their future as bound up with its own. Unless these border states became Socialist, Russia might easily be restored to capitalism.

Consider what happened at the end of the Second World War in 1945. Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin met at Yalta in February. They decided to invite France to join them and to divide Germany into four zones. Reparations were to be collected in order to destroy German military power, and war criminals were to be punished. The UNO was to be held in San Francisco with themselves, China and France. The veto system was to be used in the Security Council and the USSR was to enter the war against Japan.

April 12th, Roosevelt died. In May, Germany surrendered and in July another conference took place at Potsdam, but with Truman instead of Roosevelt. The day before Truman arrived the Atom Bomb had been tested. He felt himself master of the world. Byrnes, a South Carolina variety of Nazi, was his Secretary of State and thought it time to get "tough" with Russia and Truman started. He dragged his feet at Potsdam assenting to ousting of Nazis and cartels in Germany but he stopped aid to the badly wounded Soviets with catastrophic speed. We demanded payment for the aid already extended and we blocked chances of reparations from Germany being used to restore the reeling Soviets. Four days after the conference closed Truman dropped the bomb on Hiroshima and Japan surrendered. Churchill next year flattered him at Fulton and set him on the Soviets. Congressmen and other leaders publicly demanded that we "drop a bomb on the Kremlin." The following year Marshall revealed the plan of big business by which European capital was to be revivified with American loans and strengthened to fight against socialism. Socialism meantime triumphed in the states bordering on the USSR; not by "free elections" manipulated by the wealthy, but by the realization among the masses of what was for their welfare. Herein lies the basis of the charge which the Rockefeller Plan stresses that the Soviet Union has used such "deception and frustration" in its relations with America that Americans have become "tough, suspicious and insistent on guarantees of compliance" in treaties made with the Soviet Union.

In truth few nations have kept their word more scrupulously. The difference was that America insisted that their interpretation of the treaty was the right one while the Soviet Union declared that its interpretation was just as sound. The Soviet Union promised that the vast majority of these nations, hitherto landless, poverty-stricken, ignorant and disfranchised would seize mastery of the state by direct force or benevolent dictatorship. Here was a fundamental difference of thought, but it was not deception or breaking of a treaty. Thereupon our effort turned toward encouraging revolt in the Soviet Union itself, Czechoslovakia, Poland and Hungary. Congress openly appropriated $100 million for such effort and our International Secret Service added as much more.

We deluged Hungary with propaganda and encouraged revolt in alliance with those Hungarians who wanted in conjunction with foreign investment to get rich on Hungarian workers and peasants. (The Soviet Union stopped this revolt by interfering with troops which was not only defense of the helpless masses of Hungary, but self-defense for the whole Russian Revolution.)

Then came an extraordinary rush of events. Acheson became Secretary of State. The Nato was organized as the army of western capital, but then to the astonishment of the United States in September 1949, the Soviet Union had the Atom Bomb. We were certain that they had secured it by treason and we executed two innocent citizens in shameful revenge.

The nation went crazy. They punished Hiss. They convicted the Communist leaders. The President declared a national emergency, ordered the making of the H Bomb and the Hollywood 10 were sent to jail.

Then came the second shock: the rise of China. The Plan says that the alliance of the Soviet Union and China is a revival of the attempt of Hitler to dominate the Eurasian continent. As proof of this the Plan declares that a major objective of American foreign policy from 1899 on was "the integrity and progress of China," and that the aim of the United States in the Second World War "was an independent China." This is a fantastic misinterpretation of the facts. The Open Door policy toward China adopted by the United States was not an attempt to restore Chinese independence and integrity. It was merely an effort to insure that the United States preserved equal opportunity with European nations to exploit and divide China. We did not enter the Second World War to make China independent. We saw it already prostrate and dependent . We did not believe the Chinese capable of self-rule and Henry Luce, a member of the Rockefeller panel, proposed to begin the American century by superseding the British as masters of Asia. We picked as our puppet to carry out this scheme, Chiang Kai-shek, a murderer and a traitor against whom our own agents warned us. We gave him arms and money and when China kicked him out and used our own arms against us, we were "shocked" because we ourselves had driven China into the arms of the Communists.

The Rockefeller Plan proceeds: "Communist leaders in China are apparently determined to be the enemies of the United States." To the contrary the United States is determined to refuse to recognize 680 million Chinese as China and instead to recognize the 10 million of Taiwan as China and promising to help Chiang Kai-shek conquer China. The Rockefeller Plan declares that Communist China is today in a position which "in the past has always led to aggression." It points out that Chinese action in Korea, Tibet and India proves this and adds that Soviet-China strategy is to "isolate the United States." This is of course untrue. China took no action in Korea until our troops invaded China from Korea and as competent investigators believe used bacteriological warfare for the first time in history. Then China resisted and we ran. We returned with frightful bombardment. Truman was frightened and recalled MacArthur.

We have always recognized Tibet as belonging to China. When rebellion took place there the Chinese had a right to put it down because it was not only revolt, but revolt of slaveholders, land grabbers and religious fanatics. This was none of our business. Also it was not the business of India except as certain Indian merchants inherited Great Britain's claims in an unsettled dispute. The profit from unregulated trade on Tibet's border is large enough to spark internal struggle in India.

The Rockefeller report admits need for"complete knowledge of what is going on in China" and follows that statement by another declaration, "China is in the throes of a vast and brutal revolution." This is a curious contradiction. There are authorities who declare that the Chinese Revolution is not brutal and that the attacks on China made by Dulles and certain American reporters have been completely answered. The Rockefeller Plan is deeply sympathetic with the parts of Asia which China does not dominate, where millions of Chinese live, but which long have yielded vast profit to European exploitation. Here the motives of Western control were hardly concealed. For Britain and France there were in Malaya and Indo-China "no Ten Commandments" and cities like Singapore, Hanoi and Saigon were international whorehouses and gambling hells for white sailors, travellers and"explorers": When Vietnam started to drive out these invaders, we supported the French masters until they were beaten. This Plan touches our relations with our southern neighbors but gingerly. It does not quite assert that Communism is the cause, but it says that "Soviet strategy" is separating the United States from its Latin neighbors and it does not mention the Rockefeller oil interests, the United Fruit Company nor the Sugar Trust. Big business in the United States has separated us from Central and South America and the West Indies and will turn them toward Communism unless we curb the great corporations.

The plan seeks " to make sure that the world does not decline into new bi-polarity this time more durable and more fearful in its implication because based on color rather than ideology." In building toward the future the imperative principle must be that race and color not be accorded artificial significance. "The way we order our life at home is an impartial factor in weaving broad unity." How are we ordering our affairs at home so far as Negroes are concerned. The American Negro occupies a higher position than he did fifty years ago. Many occupy high positions in the civil service, on the bench and in industry. Many of the trade unions still discriminate but most admit Negroes. Yet the Negro is still a caste beyond the Color Line. His masses are still poor, ignorant, ill-housed and ill-clothed; most of them in the South cannot vote and their schools are still for the most part segregated. Injustice in the courts is still common..

There is progress. But its rate and ultimate aim is something which the colored world would better watch, otherwise that which we miscalled the war against Communism may yet become the war across the Color Line. For we are struggling desperately in the United States to bribe Negroes of ability to help big business in the self-exploitation of Africa and not to complain over the discrimination which still rules America. We do not realize that the great force which holds back any present war of the Color Line, is the Soviet Union. Here is a white nation which the colored world will never fight as Paul Robeson once said. Because Communism has outlawed color discrimination.

But on the other hand the Rockefeller report is painfully vague on its actual plans for Africa. It promises "sympathy and encouragement." This from the nation which encouraged the African slave trade, waxed rich on Negro slavery, fought a terrible war to preserve it, and still with South Africa draws the worst color bar in the world is not too encouraging. We may "sympathize" with exploitation of cheap labor and "encourage" land theft and disfranchisement. With this Negroes will not be content. Nor will the colored world agree.

The American Negro occupies a higher position than he did fifty years ago. Many occupy high positions in the civil service, on the bench and in industry. Many of the trade unions still discriminate but most admit Negroes. Yet the Negro is still a caste beyond the Color Line. His masses are still poor, ignorant, ill-housed and ill-clothed; most of them in the South cannot vote and their schools are still for the most part segregated. Injustice in the courts is still common..

There is progress. But its rate and ultima te aim is something which the colored world would better wwatch, otherwise that which we miscalled the war against Communism may yet become the war across the Color Line. For we are struggling desperately in the United States to bribe Negroes of ability to help big business in the self-exploitation of Africa and not to complain over the discrimination which still rules America. We do not realise that the great force which holds back any present war of the color line, is the Soviet Union. Here is a white nation which the colored world will never fight as Paul Robeson once said. Because Communism has outlawed color discrimination.

But on the other hand the Rockefeller report is painfully vague on its actual plans for Africa. It promises "sympathy and encouragement." This from the nation which encouraged the African slave trade, waxed rich on Negro slavery, fought a terrible war to preserve it, and still with South Africa draws the worst color bar in the world is not too encouraging. We may "sympathise" with exploitation of cheap labor and "encourage" land theft and disfranchisement. With this Negroes will not be content. Nor will the colored world agree.

The report apparently assumes that any capitalist state will be accepted without question. The American Negro was represented by Lester Granger of the Urban League. The plan asserts that the American objective is " a world of peace based on separate political entities" and may differ in religion, culture, asocial organization. So far as America is concerned it is asserted, "No territorial ambitions or desires now stir America."

War was waged against China, but MacArthur was recalled. We learned in September 1949 that the USSR had the H Bomb and we publicly murdered the Rosenbergs as the traitors who must have revealed it to them. McCarthy reigned from 1952 until his death in 1956. Dulles became Secretary of State in 1957 and in 1958 came Sputnik.

Taiwan Nationalist China.

To keep China out of the Security Council and save American investments in Korea, Truman rushed us into a"police action" called the Korean war. McArthur tried to make this a conquest of China and China declared he used bacteria. The Chinese drove him three hundred miles and Truman frightened as McArthur rushed back, dismissed him.

THE LIFE OF W.E.B. Du BOIS, 1868 - 1953

It is strange what small things determine the course of human lives. My life, for instance, has been conditioned by the color of my skin. This fact, trivial of itself, was of cosmic importance in the eyes of the world in 1868 when I was born. So strongly did color and race absorb my thought that fifty years ago, when I wrote THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK I said: "The Problem of the Twentieth Century is the Problem of the Color Line." This has been proven true, although of course not nearly as clearly and logically as I had in mind. We can, however, see today how the Western European world is ~~becoming~~ ranged against the colored peoples of Asia and Africa, and how differences of color and race serve strongly to outline the deeper problems of our day.

Naturally I soon learned that my skin was dark because of my African descent and I began early to take special interest in Africa. The facts I had to learn as any stranger would. First I became emotionally ~~stirred~~ stirred by revelations of Negro art, like the ~~Negro~~ folk songs, which I first learned from hearing the Hampton Institute singers. Later in life I saw specimens of African plastic art and of handwork. I learned what a decisive influence African art had on modern art. I saw that the African artisan was so schooled in appreciation of beauty that he was never content to make a tool which was simply useful. It had also to be carefully ornamented, as in the case of this paddle, ~~and~~ these Congo knives, ~~and this extraordinary suit of armor~~ Iron was probably first welded by Negroes and this suit of chain armor, was made ~~hand-wrought~~ by black Sudanese in Africa at least five hundred years ago. Every little iron circlet of the 25,000 which it contains is made by hand. And here are chains of slaves. But they were made in England.

My family line comes from two streams. One, predominantly European, sprang from French Huguenots who came to America ~~and~~ merged with Africa in the West Indies, and then returned to the valley of the Hudson. My grandfather Alexander represents them, and his son, Alfred. The black Burghardts were brought to the valley of the Hudson by the Dutch in the 17th century, where they lived over 200 years. My mother Mary Burghardt married Alfred Du Bois and here they are with me ~~as infant~~ their only child.

As a child I went through the public schools of Great Barrington, earning some money outside school hours by mowing lawns and splitting kindling. I was graduated from High School in 1884. This is my class, of which I was the youngest. Here are some of my textbooks. My commencement essay was on "Wendell Phillips."

I wanted to go to Harvard college, but I had no money. However I was given a scholarship by Congregational Churches to go to Fisk University in Tennessee. There I had a happy three years and then, having secured a Harvard scholarship I went there ~~and~~ was graduated in 1890, and stayed two more years in the Graduate School. The Slater Fund then sent me abroad for two more years' study, and in 1894 I was ready for my life work.

There opened before me four main lines of work and endeavor which over the years I ~~have come to~~ followed: First there was the search for the truth, especially as it related to Negro peoples. My idea was that what we call the Negro Problem was really a problem of ignorance; that first we should know the facts concerning race relations and from that come to conclusions concerning methods of settling these problems. I went to Atlanta University to teach history and sociology and give half my time to studies of the Negro's problems. In the next thirteen years we issued 15 studies which came to be known around the world. The idea back of them was to study one problem as thoroughly as we could the first year, and then ten years later to come back to a similar

I began with an intensive study of Negroes in Philadelphia then study, with increased facilities and knowledge. The second year we would take another subject, and then repeat that ten years later, and so on through a cycle of ten different studies over a period of a century.

Of course this ambitious program was never realized. We did, however, keep it up for 13 years, and finally, when we had to give up it was because we could not collect the $5000 a year which the studies cost ~~and which~~ including my salary of $1200.

Meanwhile strong resentment was rising among colored people, especially among young men like Monroe Trotter, against the doctrines of Booker Washington. Trotter was jailed for heckling Washington at a public meeting. I strongly ~~resented~~ protested against this and eventually formed the Niagara movement in 1906. This organization ~~was~~ merged with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. I came to New York in 1910 to become one of ~~the~~ the five incorporators ~~of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People~~ as an executive officer of the NAACP. Among the incorporators, besides myself was the grandson of William Lloyd Garrison, a liberal white woman, Mary Ovington, John Haynes Holmes, a militant minister of the Community Church, and ~~the~~ a young Jewish banker, Walter E. Sachs.

For forty years the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has organized and led the fight for Negro emancipation and for real democracy in this nation unlimited by restrictions of race and color. With fixing its basic methods and ideals I had much to do by lectures, and conferences, but especially by ~~my~~ editing the CRISIS magazine which I started on my own responsibility. The CRISIS sought to put special emphasis on two things, news concerning the colored people in America, the West Indies and Africa; and also concerning the peoples of Asia and the islands of the sea. These were arranged in little news notes in the section called "Along the Color Line". Then the CRISIS tried to print pictures of colored people and their doings. Our covers became notable, and our pictures of graduates and of Negro children. Our total job was to make a clearer statement of the position of thinking Negroes concerning their place in America and their future in the world.

Between 1912 and 1930, the CRISIS was self-supporting, paying all salaries including mine; rent, production and distribution. It reached for a time a circulation of over 100,000 copies monthly and a cash income of over $70,000 a year. With the depression, its income fell off, and it no longer paid its cost but had to depend in part on subvention from the NAACP. This main organization continued to grow in influence and power.

Along with these two lines of effort -- search for truth and agitation for the rights of Negroes in the United States, arose naturally the effort to transmute my lifelong interest in Africa into action. This was brought into action as early as 1900, when the United States Government commissioned me to make a series of charts illustrating the condition of American Negroes for the Paris Exposition. By a series of charts and photographs we illustrated the increase in the Negro population, the roots of the African slave trade, education and illiteracy, landholding and home owning. There were thirty-two charts, five hundred photographs and numerous maps and plans. I received a gold medal for this exhibit. This exhibit attracted many Negro visitors from all over the world and some of them met in London and held a Pan-African Conference. After the First World War, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People sent me to Paris to study the treatment of American Negro troops. I took advantage of the trip to attempt to start a Pan-African movement.

I attended the great World Races Congress in 1911 of which Felix Adler and I were American secretaries.

wide contest. In the fiftieth year after emancipation I wrote and staged a pageant in New York. It drew such crowds that I staged it in Washington, Philadelphia and finally in Hollywood Bowl. These efforts in art expression might ~~possibly~~ have released me from the provincialism of race consciousness and led me to become an artist. But the color line in the United States did not encourage this.

Writings which touched the African phase of my career were a little book on the Negro in the Home University Library in 1915, a novel protraying the strife between white and colored peoples called DARK PRINCESS in 1928 and a larger study of Negro history, BLACK FOLK THEN AND NOW, in 1939.

This culminated in BLACK RECONSTRUCTION in 1935, which belongs in a sense to the activities of my search for truth. This work was begun on a grant from the Rosenwald Fund while I was still with the NAACP. I decided to leave that organization in 1934; first because the CRISIS was no longer self-supporting and secondly because I conceived of a broader program for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People which I was not able to initiate. I thought younger men should carry through. I was sixty-six. I thought my active years had passed. My resignation was received with regret and demands to reconsider, but when President John Hope of Atlanta University offered me a chance to return to my scientific career with larger opportunity for teaching and writing, I accepted.

1934 was the beginning of a ten year period at Atlanta University during which I finished and published BLACK RECONSTRUCTION; founded and for four years edited a quarterly review of race relations called PHYLON; reorganized on a broader scale my former studies of the Negro problems; planned an Encyclopaeda of the Negro after being chosen by a notalbe group in 1936, Editor-in-Chief.

For ~~forty~~ years after the close of the Civil war the youth of America were taught by the best ~~of the~~ historians ~~and social reformers philosophers of the day~~ that after Emancipation vindictive ~~social~~ elements in the North forced Negro suffrage on the South and put in political control over white people a mass of ~~ignorant and~~ half-civilized Negroes, most of whom were incapable of taking part in civilized government. Along with all my efforts, as a sort of obbligato, ran my writings. ~~I think at bottom~~ fundamentally I had always conceived myself as a writer as well as a scientist, and certainly much more so than as agitator or propagandist. During the era of my scientific search for truth I published my book on the slave trade, my series of Atlanta studies, and the PHILADELPHIA NEGRO. During the period of agitation for Negro rights I published five larger and more distinctly Negro works in addition to twenty annual volumes of the monthly, CRISIS magazine. These included a book of essays, THE SOULS OF BLACK FOLK, my biography of JOHN BROWN, a novel of the cotton crop called THE QUEST OF THE SILVER FLEECE, a further volume of essays called DARKWATER, and a consideration of the gifts which black folk had made to American civilization.

My writing in itself, subtly and molecully divided itself into recording ~~and interpreting of~~ facts and efforts to do this with taste and literary skill and also to achieve art in other ways. For instance I wrote plays and poems, and once in a little theatre movement which I helped promote in Harlem, my Krigwa Players won second prize in a nation-wide contest. In the fiftieth year after Emancipation, I wrote and staged a pageant in New York and repeated it in Washington and Philadephia and finally in Hollywood. My poem on the Atlanta riot was widely quoted, and ~~I was however the more minded to leave despite the kindest pressures to remain, because I was offered~~ a chance to return to my scientific career with larger opportunity for teaching and writing. I therefore returned to Atlanta University in 1934 for a ten year period in which I finished and published Black Reconstruction; founded and edited for four years a quarterly review of Race Relations, Phylon; arranged to reorganize on a broader scale my former studies of the Negro Problems; planned an Encyclopaedia of the Negro of which I ~~had been~~ was chosen Editor-in- Chief in 1936 by a notable group.

On my return to New York, I first went to Haiti to lecture on education on invitation from the government. I then wrote Color: Democracy as a Protest against Negro discrimination and colonialism. My request for help from several Funds was freely refused but I published a pamphlet about it and made friends scholarly. When the UNO met at San Francisco the Directors of the NAACP were commisioned by the Govern ent to appoint a consultatr. They named me and later added Walter White and Mary Bethune. In San Francisco, I wrote a column for the Chronicle, sent statements and petitions to the officials and interviewed delegates. Some meetings were also held. Returning to New York, I became interested in the new Progressive movement. I did not join the party so as not to involve the NAACP in politics, but I exoressed my own convictions

The same year, 1945, I went to Manchester, England to attend a Fifth Pan-African Congress called by the African delegates to the Paris Trade Union meeting. Here I preside and met Nkrumah, now prime minister designate of the Gold Coast, West Africa and Kenyatta, later condembed in Kenya

I was next involved in a sucession of Peace congresses as fear of a Third World War increased. I attended and spoke at the Waldorf-Astoria conference: then I went to Another ~~crisis~~ change ~~faced~~ came to me in 1948, ~~as~~ which was inevitable, because of the great crisis which the world faced in the second half of the century. It was becoming clear that a rich and powerful civilization could no longer allow the majority of mankind to be poor, ignorant and sick. Efforts spread every where to change these conditions through increased social control of wealth. My thought and efforts were growing in sympathy with this world development. But the NAACP had long been trying to settle only one social problem, that of Negro equality in the United States. On no other social reform was there unity of thought in its ~~ranks~~ membership. Moreover the nation now began to move toward reaction toward ~~nearly~~ in every social reform, and to regard war as inevitable. I had no power to alter the policy of the NAACP and made no effort to do so. But despite my disclaimers, when I favored a Third Party movement, attacked colonial policies and talked peace, the NAACP was blamed for what I was saying. It was hinted to me that I had been recalled to the NAACP not to work but to rest. I did not and could not take this advice and as a result, I was dismissed in 1948. I took an unpaid position in Paul Robeson's Council on African Affairs and went on with my work

Only change toward wealth control, purchasing with accident & capitalism with union Labor health peace alienate minimum support

When liberals and progressives called a Peace Conference in 1949 I took part eagerly. Later that same year I attended the great Peace Conference in Paris, and then along with twenty- five prominen t Americans I was invited to attend the Peace Conference in Moscow, ~~Russia.~~ I was the only one of the twenty five who accepted, but I went there and on my return visited Poland and Czechoslovakia.

In America I helped to organize a Peace Movement and became President of the Peace Information Center, which was designed to let the people of America know how the Peace Movement was spreading in the world and particularly to circulate the Stockholm Appeal against atomic weapons. As a result of this I and other officials of the Peace Information Bureau were indicted as "agents of a foreign principal". We denied that we were agents, but were taken to court where I was handcuffed, finally we were all acquitted of this absurd charge.

During the indictment and trial I and Shirley Graham were married. We then toured the United States to raise funds for the defense of the five defendants. A committee under Alice Citron corresponded over the world, and the support which we received was universal and astonishing.

This, then, in general outline, is my life and work. And I am deeply grateful to you who have consented to listen to its portraiture.

I wrote in 1949 a comparative study of the United States and the Soviet Union for which I have not yet secured a publisher. Presently I am trying to finish a novel which will contain Black Reconstruction in fictional form ? Years from 1876 to 1954

46-10-25 In 1915 when the new edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica was planned, I was asked to write on the American Negro and wrote an article in which I again declared that the Negro had helped the south during Reconstruction

Then I changed my work and turned as I hoped for a short time to propaganda, to agitation, to trying to impress upon the American people the need to give attention to the problems

46-10-26 I worked on it while I was at Harvard and at the University of Berlin, and finished it at Wilberforce University. I took my doctor's degree in 1895 and in 1896 my thesis was published as the first volume of the new Harvard Historical studies. At the University of Pennsylvania I began my first sociological survey of the Negro, which was published as the Philadelphia Negro in 1899. On this work I outlined my plan for a hundred years of study of the Negro problem.

and not hindered. The editor refused to publish this in the form in which I had written it, and I declined to let my contribution be used.

So now on return to Atlanta University I began again to study Reconstruction and the result was the book, "Black Reconstruction". It must be noted, that since the publication of this book it has been impossible to continue the theory that the Negro was simply a thief and a fool after emancipation. Writers today are compelled to admit that it was the Negro who established the public school as an institution in the South, that he began a new social legislation, that the Constitutions which he helped form and pass were used in the Southern states for a generation after the Negro had been given the vote, and that a fair interpretation of the Negro's role would prove that he tried under difficult circumstances to establish democracy in the United States as it never had functioned before, with a sound economic base. During the ten years which I spent at Atlanta University I founded a new quarterly magazine, "Phylon" for the general study of race problems. It began publication in 1940 and I edited it for four years. Then I began to try to re-establish my all-embracing plan for a general study of the Negro problems. I secured the consent of nearly all the Negro colleges in the south to make Atlanta University the center of a new, continuous and all-embracing study of the Negro race in America, using their departments of Social Science, and having them take part in a general conference on methods in social science and studies in race relations which would be held annually at Atlanta University and would be attended by the leading students of sociology in the United States and later in the world. I succeeded in getting this scheme established. We held two conferences, and were reaching out for funds and better methods when, without notice, I was suddenly retired from my professorship at Atlanta wide contest. In the fiftieth year after emancipation I wrote and staged a pageant in New York. It drew such crowds that I staged it in Washington, Philadelphia and finally in Hollywood Bowl. These efforts in art expression might have released me from the provincialism of race consciousness and led me to become an artist. But the color line in the United States did not encourage this.

In 1896 I went to the university of Pennsylvania as Assistant in Sociology and began my career as student of social problems and writer. Here are my books.

Writings which touched the African phase of my career were a little book on the Negro in the Home University Library in 1915, a novel protraying the strife between white and colored peoples called DARK PRINCESS in 1928 and a larger study of Negro history, BLACK FOLK THEN AND NOW.

This culminated in BLACK RECONSTRUCTION in 1935, which belongs in a sense to the activities of my search for truth. This work was begun on a grant from the Rosenwald Fund while I was still with the NAACP. I decided to leave that organization in 1934; first because the CRISIS was no longer self-supporting and secondly because I conceived of a broader program for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People which I was not able to initiate. I thought younger men should carry through. I was sixty-six. I thought my active years had passed. My resignation was received with regret and demands to reconsider, but when President John Hope of Atlanta University offered me a chance to return to my scientific career with larger opportunity for teaching and writing, I accepted.

1934 was the beginning of a ten year period at Atlanta University during which I finished and published BLACK RECONSTRUCTION; founded and for four years edited a quarterly review of race relations called PHYLON; reorganised on a broader scale my former studies of the Negro problems; planned an Encyclopaedia of the Negro after being chosen by a notalbe group in 1936, Editor-in-Chief.

Meantime I published two more books, one [1952?]

46-10-13 a novel on the economic problems of the south called "The Quest of the Silver Fleece" and the other which indicated my continued interest in Africa: It was published in 1915 in the Home of University Library and went through many editions. Also to illustrate my interest in Africa and race relations came a series of conferences in Europe. These were preceded as early as 1900 by the exhibit illustrating the work of the American Negro in the Paris exposition U.S.

~~and other parts of the world. I~~ 46-10-13

I continued to publish books. A volume of essays called "Dark [1952?]

The Life of W. E. B. Du Bois, 1868-1953

It is strange what small things determined the course of human lives ~~influence our life~~. My life for instance has been conditioned ~~from childhood~~ by the color of my skin. This fact, trivial of itself was of cosmic importance in the eyes of the world in 1868. ~~Thereafter it became the main fact of my existence and guided all I ever tried to do~~

So strongly did color and race absorb my thought that

Fifty years ago, when I wrote the Souls of Black Folk I said "The Problem of the Twentieth Century is the Problem of the Color Line". This has been proven true, although of course not nearly as clearly and logically as I had in mind. We can however see today how the ~~main part of the white~~ Western European world is becoming ranged against the colored peoples of Asia and Africa and how ~~problems of color outline the great problems of our day. Naturally~~ differences of color and race ~~do not of course cause but~~ serve strongly to outline the deeper problems of our day.

~~Thus~~ Naturally I soon learned that my skin was dark was because of my African descent and I began early to take special interest in Africa. The facts ~~about Africa~~ I had to learn as any stranger would, ~~and~~ I read and I became ~~e~~motionally stirred by ~~certain~~ revelations of Negro art. ~~The~~ Like the Negro folk songs which I first learned from hearing the Hampton Institute singers ~~were a tremendous revelation of beauty.~~ Later in life I saw specimens of ~~Black~~ African plastic art and ~~handi~~ of handwork. I learned what a decisive influence African ~~of~~ art had had on ~~modern~~ modern art ~~in Europe~~. I saw ~~realized~~ that the African artisan was so schooled in appreciation of beauty that he was never content to make a tool which was simply useful. It also had to be carefully ornamented, as in the case of this paddle, ~~and~~ these Congo knives, ~~and~~ this extraordinary suit of armor. Iron was notably first worked by Negroes and this suit of chain armor, hand-wrought by black Sudanese in Africa at least five hundred years ago. Every litte iron circlet of the 25,000 which it contains is made by hand. And here are chains ofr slaves. But they were made in England ----

...ine comes from two streams. One, predominantly European, sprang from French Huguenots who merged with Africa in the West Indies and then returned to the valley of the Hudson. My grandfather Alexander represents them and his son Alfred. The black Burghardts were brought to the valley of the Hudson by the Dutch in the I7th century, where they lived 200 years. My mother Mary married Alfred and here they are with me as infant. I married in I896 a wife with whom I lived 53 years until 1950 when she died. We had two children. The little boy died in infancy. The daughter lives and has a daughter. As a child I went through the public schools, earning some money outside school hours by mowing lawns and splinning kindling. I was graduated from High School in I884. This is my class, of which I was the youngest. Here are some of my textbooks. My commencement essay was on "Wendell Phillips."

I wanted to go to Harvard to college, but had no money. I was given a scholarship by the Congregational Church to go to Fisk University in Tenn ssee. There I had a happy three years and then having secured a Harvard scholarship I went there and graduated in I890, and stayed two more years in the Graduate School. The Slater Fund then sent me abroad for two more years study and in I894, I was ready for my life work.

There opened out before me four lines of work and endeavor which over the years I have come to follow: First there was the search for the truth, especially as it is related to Negro peoples, then historical

My idea was that what we call the Negro problem was really a problem of ignorance; that first we should know the facts concerning race relations and from that come to conclusions concerning methods of settling these problems. I went to Atlanta University to teach history and sociology and give half to studies of the Negro's problems. In the next thirteen years we issued 15 studies which became to be known around the world. They varied the idea back of them was to study one problem as thoroughly as we could the first year, and then ten years later to come back to a similar study, with increased facilities and knowledge. The second year we would take another subject, and then repeat that ten years later, and so on through a cycle of ten different studies over a period of a century.

Of course this ambitious program was never realized. We did, however, keep it up for 13 years, and finally, when we had to give up it was because we could not collect the $5000 a year which the ...st and which included my salary of $1200.

Du Bois sent to Poland Dec. 1958

TO POLAND

by W.E.B. Du Bois

I have been to Poland three times. The first time was 59 years ago, when I was a student at the University of Berlin. I had been talking to my schoolmate, Stanislaus Ritter Von Estreicher. I had been telling him of the race problem in America, which seemed to me at the time the only race problem, and the greatest social problem of the world. He brushed it aside. He said, "You know nothing, really, about real race problems." Then he began to tell me about the problem of the Poles, and particularly of that part of them who were included in the German empire; of their limited education; of the refusal to let them speak their own language; of the few careers that they were allowed to follow; of the continued insult to their culture and family life.

I was astonished; because race problems at the time were to me purely problems of color, and principally of slavery in the United States and near-slavery in Africa. I promised faithfully that when I went on my vacation that summer I would stop to see him in his home at Krakow, Poland, where his father was Librarian of the University.

I remember now my schoolmate, Stanislaus. He has long been dead, and I hear he died refusing to be a stool pigeon for the Nazis in conquered Poland. He gave his life for a great cause. How broad it eventually became! How much he realized that behind the Polish problem lay the Jewish problem, and that all were one crime against civilization, I do not know.

I remember now one scene in Poland over a half century ago. It was of worship in a Catholic Church. The peasants were crowded together and were grovelling on their knees. They were in utter subjection to a powerful hierarchy. And out of that, today they have crawled and fought and struggled. They see the light.

Thirteen years after that I passed again through Poland and Warsaw. It was in the darkness, both physically and spiritually. Hitler was supreme in Germany, where I had been visiting for five months, and I sensed the oncoming storm.

I passed through Warsaw into the Soviet Union just three years before the horror fell upon that city.

Then finally three years ago I was in Warsaw again. I have seen something of human upheaval in this world; the scream and shots of a race riot in Atlanta; the marching of the Ku Klux Klan; the threat of courts and police; the neglect and destruction of human habitation. But nothing in my wildest imagination was equal to what I saw in Warsaw in 1949. I would have said before seeing it that it was impossible for a civilized nation with deep religious convictions and outstanding religious institutions; with literature and art; to treat fellow human beings as Warsaw had been treated. There had been complete, planned and utter destruction. Some streets had been so obliterated that only by using photographs of the past could they tell where the street was. And no one mentioned the total of the dead, the sum of destruction, the story of crippled and insane, the widows and orphans.

The astonishing thing, of course, was the way that in the midst of all these memories of war and destruction, the people were rebuilding the city with an enthusiasm that was simply unbelievable. A city and a nation was literally rising from the dead.

I trust that the people of Poland realize how much hope their suffering and effort gives today to the inhabitants of the United States.

I remember studying in school of the partitions of Poland and of the way in which a great nation had been destroyed. We were given to understand then, in the late 19th century, that no Polish nation would ever rise again.

At that time and since we have regarded ourselves as the fortunate people of the earth, free to think and act; with adequate income among the majority of our workers, and with Peace as our object and practice.

Today all this is changed. Our civil liberties are curtailed. Our right to think and act is less than ever before, and we face the bleak prospect of a determined effort among the fascist masters of Big Business to make this a nation promoting war and strife over the whole world. Color discrimination is less than it once was and we fight daily to abolish it, but it still dominates the nation so that Americans of African descent are given less education, poorer housing and greater exposure to disease, and receive less income for more and harder work than white Americans.

In the midst of this situation the determination of Poland to rise from the dead, her marvelous accomplishments in rebuilding her industry, and especially in the unification of her people without class distinctions, is a great inspiratic

I wish I could visit your country again to see what has happened since 1949; but I am a prisoner in my native land and am not allowed to travel outside. Nevertheless, I can send you my congratulations and thanks, and my hope that you will continue to be an example to the United States of America of a free and prosperous democracy which is learning how to produce and distribute wealth for the welfare of all and not simply and mainly for the agrandisement of the few.

STALIN AND AMERICAN NEGROES
by W.E.B. Du Bois

The death of Joseph Stalin shocked 15 million American citizens of Negro descent in a peculiar way. Stalin had unequivocably advocated Peace while all other rulers voiced two words for War to every one for Peace. These Negroes want peace for more reasons than whites. To this black group, war for 200 years has meant fighting for a nation which did not recognise them as part of it. As slaves they fought to free America from England; as slaves and serfs, they begged to fight for the abolition of slavery and gained permission only after studied humiliations. In the First World War, they had to fight Americans harder than Germans for recognition as soldiers and citizens; and while this battle was less fierce in the Second World War, it was still a battle against segregation and color discrimination. The American Negro has been unswervingly loyal to the United States when loyalty was a bitter pill, but he wants now to fight for it without being compelled to surrender his self-respect. Above all, he wants Peace. If, therefore, Stalin was for Peace, he was for Stalin.

With the war in Korea came a new turn in this old dilemma. Koreans were Colored People. They suffered from white nations, the same discrimination and contempt as Negroes suffer. Moreover, American Negroes know that Joseph Stalin, son of a serf, had worked as Commissar of Nationalities to make the Soviet Union the one modern state which outlawed race discrimination. Even if this legislation did not always work perfectly, the Negro knew it worked better than the pogroms of Czarist Russia or the caste laws of South Carolina. Thus the American Negro was drafted into the Korean war and obeyed because it was his duty as a citizen. But he writhed and still writhes under the humiliation.

Then a new paradox fronted him when in Africa, his own kin began to revolt. Would American Negroes be asked to fight African Negroes in defense of the increasing investment of American wealth in African land, materials and cheap labor? Negroes know of the capital which their nation has poured into Malan's South Africa and of the kind of state which he proposes to build on the color-bar. Will American Negroes be asked to surrender their basic loyalties to uphold reaction and tyranny in their ancient Motherland? And if they do, can they ever hold up their heads among men?

It was not sensible for the new Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, to tell Negroes that the revolt of Africa was part of a Soviet plot to surround America. Negroes may be largely ignorant because of lack of schools, but they are not that ignorant. They know and know too well why Africa revolts: the British slave trade, American slavery; hunger, caste, disease and bitter exploitation today. Against any summons to fight with white Europe against black Africa and indeed against continued war with Asia, the American Negro raises final protest. He sorrows that the great man, Joseph Stalin, who spoke for Peace and against Race Discrimination, today lies dead in Moscow.

Du Bois Defense de la Paix July 29, 1953

AMERICA AND PEACE

Let me look back with you over the short history of America whose youth and late rush to world influence must be considered. Singular good fortune has repeatedly spelled doom for these fortunate isles. Prodigal gift of rich and endless land has nurtured greed. Strong and willing labor has invited slavery. Rivalries of race and cultures have quickened talent, until, mad with our very prosperity, we let Liberty choke Equality and Brotherhood die at birth. Yet we drew continual strength from all the world; from Asia came Faith; from Africa, Work with Song; from Europe, Civilization. In such a new world of singular opportunity with freedom of movement and freedom of trade over unprecedented stretches of territory, we have grown rich and healthy, powerful and keen, with rare technical mastery of the forces of nature and a reckless self-confidence born of youth and inexperience. Blind to history and ignorant of human nature, we see Life as the strife of Individuals and have small concept of the age-old social bodies or of the eternal Society of Man.

36-11-60

America of today lightly forgets that she was once a colony dominated by an empire and gained autonomy only by violent revolution; by throwing off just such bonds as she now helps to impose on peoples of Asia and Africa. Wildly and erratically down the years our ways have wandered: from conquest of the wilderness to conquest of Mexico; from domestic serfdom to a system of industrial slavery stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

That leadership which the masses must find if they survive, came to us from time to time because of our unhampered and often lawless freedom, but never reached peaceful, consistent and planned progress. We threw off dictatorship of property and religion. We spread common school education and approached universal suffrage, limited by slavery and color of skin.

Then in blood and destruction we emerged into a vision of democracy unlimited by race, religion or wealth. Again our triumph spelled doom. The freedom which we thought we had gained for black mankind became freedom for the exploiter of land and labor. In the last half of the 19th century individual wealth, however gained, became more important in popular esteem than human freedom, and the new industry became the master and not the servant of the new democracy.

But even American individualism had to yield to social compulsion as the Frontier closed on our western borders. The free west became owned and ordered. The individual highwayman of industry could not longer ride at will. Exploitation of labor and Raw Material became instead a matter of more intense effort and more subject to integrated and planned capitalism. The flow of cheap immigrant labor dwindled, the black freedmen began to fight for the freedom that was eluding them, white labor began to organize against capital. But Labor was divided: Irishman against Negro and German against Scandinavian and foreign-born against native. On new and intricate skills and machines climbed the mechanic and the white collar worker; over all ruled the Manager and over him the Financier.

We became a money-mad people, ruled increasingly by corporate wealth and ruthless in our methods of gain. Freedom became license and democracy a matter of barter and sale. Yet there was intelligence and vision enough for fierce battle for reform in the last quarter of the century and the United States entered the 20th century determined to stand with the progressive forces of mankind in Science, Government and Humanity with Labor poised to hearken to Europe and fight for socialism.

As the fight of Labor grew more intense and the labor vote forced the rate of profit down and raised wages, a vision of a path to new profits came to American capital. This path was not new; it was very old, but it seemed new to a new people. It was the old colonial expansion. It started with the sugar and fruit of Hawaii and turned to conquest of Spanish islands; it crept down old paths to Central and South America. It excluded European participation with a new Monroe Doctrine designed now to protect investment and not human liberty.

Until the First World War we thought only of colonial expansion in the Americas. This war for the redistribution of Asiatic and African colonies found, therefore, the United States cold and disposed to withdraw into isolation until two temptations pulled us in opposite directions: one, led by Woodrow Wilson, would save the world for democracy and wage war to end war; the other looked on the disaster of the world as our business opportunity to supplant Europe in the exploitation of the Eastern World. We tore into this path with such concentrated effort that we not only completely threw over Wilson's idealistic League of Nations, but joined European reaction against Socialism and the new-born Soviet Union. With characteristic American impulse and blind zeal we knocked the very foundations out from under modern capitalism: -- the Gold Standard, the world market, free land and cheap colonial labor. For a decade world industry and trade reeled, colonial peoples staggered to their feet while the Soviet Union built unshakable foundations.

Then the Old World, led by two mad men, tried to achieve new world domination. Britain, France and the United States joined Hitler and Mussolini to rebuild colonial imperialism. But the new masters asked too high a price, although Britain and France made every effort at accommodation, and deeply sympathized with the Fascist plan to arrest Communism. But in America poverty, unemployment and despair spread so far that Franklin Roosevelt displaced the old individualism with a new socialism and under the tutelege of Harry Hopkins even joined American skill to Soviet strength while Britain and France reluctantly followed.

Fascism and Hitlerism fell and colonialism started to follow. A Golden Age of Mankind dawned: a planned economy for a distracted and tottering world, upheld by some vast vision of equal, unexploited, healthy peoples being led to learn the long and laboriously accumulated wisdom of mankind by a new concept of Democracy. San Francisco followed Potsdam, Yalta, Teheran and Stalingrad -- followed falteringly and haltingly but surely, until tired, Franklin Roosevelt dropped in death.

It was then that the long strained weaknesses of the United States again appeared. Far less than other peoples is the United States a unity. We have no national patriotism. We worship success as Wealth and Wealth as Power. We are far too young for cultural integration. We are a congeries not only of races, nations and cultural patterns, but all these lack time for understanding and historic interpretation. In place of a national consciousness has arisen a fiercely believed-in folk-lore of individual prowess, hammering out personal success. We forgot or never knew our dependence on each other.

There crept into our polity, beside differences of race and culture, new class distinctions of rich, middle-class and poor; investors, employers, technicians, skilled laborers and common laborers, beside criminals. Managers displaced employers; better paid labor shared in exploitation of poorer paid, and all American labor exploited Negroes and colonial peoples. Organized finance directed industry, distributed capital and planned economy. Having actually lost least by war and destruction, American Industry started after the great depression of the thirties to reorganize world trade and industry and replace Great Britain as banker of mankind. But it met two stunning rebuffs. First, Communism did not collapse as America expected, but grew in strength and extent so that Eastern Europe was closed to western exploitation. Second, China, which America regarded as already in her power under the puppet, Chiang Kai Chek, was reorganized under a communist regime in alliance with the Soviet Union. American business regarded this as plot and betrayal, and the Korean War began as an effort to regain control of Chinese labor and raw materials.

This change of outlook and aim, which never would have occurred under Roosevelt, developed to full orientation under his accidental successor, Harry Truman. Truman was a provincial western politician, without broad learning or wide experience. He had no thought of ever questioning the absolute superiority of the American Way of Life. Under the direction of Big Business, Truman completely reversed the policies of Roosevelt. He became suspicious and inimical toward the Soviet Union; made war in Korea and announced the Truman doctrine of armed limitation of the spread of communism. Trade, industry and finance through tighter and more conscious control of the whole economy of the nation began to plan an anti-socialistic world. The Hitler plan of thought control was further developed. The old American folklore of pioneer enterprise, individual initiative and reward of private prowess was emphasized. News gathering and distribution, broadcasting, publication of books, periodicals and newspapers came increasingly under the centralized control of organized capital.

Public opinion was skillfully aroused to suspect and hate the Soviet Union and to oppose her designs by a military preparedness surpassing anything the world ever knew. A false scare of imminent war nearly forced universal military service through Congress and did accomplish wide drafting of youth into the military forces. As opposition developed skillful efforts began to silence it. Confessed informers, liars and traitors were publicized and rewarded, while advocates of peace and friendship were intimidated. Teachers and writers were dismissed; radicals, progressives and liberals jailed; congressional inquisitions, unhampered by the usual legal limitations was installed, and the pulpit either silenced or taken into loud alliance. Never before in America has there been such suppression of freedom of thought and expression of opinion.

When you judge the United States today, bear this in mind. Not the America of intelligence and courage is forcing war on the world, but the America half-informed and deliberately misled which regards such a gathering as the World Peace Council as a conspiracy against civilization and seriously sees in socialism and communism plots to overthrow the American Way of Life. Thus an hysterical nation is blundering toward a resurgence of religious dogma and is turning a Prince of Peace into a God of War. What happens? It is hard to paint the present scene in America in conceivable tones. May I essay. I select from an endless list of specific cases ten which illustrate our spiritual Reign of Terror:

1. There is scarcely in the land a University or college from which there has not been dismissed either from long service or from the start of a promising career, one or more professors, accused of "sympathy" with "communism."

2. The Attorney-General of the United States has drawn up a long list of organizations, which, without hearing evidence or giving reasons, he declares are "subversive" because of some connection past or present with Communistic or Socialistic ideas. Alleged membership in any of these organizations can mean loss of job or benefits of public housing.

3. From the public schools of New York and a dozen other large cities, successful teachers of ten, twenty or more years have been summarily dismissed for belonging to some "subversive" organization or for refusing to say whether or not they ever belonged to the Communist Party.

4. The eleven official heads of the Communist Party are in jail not accused of illegal acts but because communist writers have at various times and places wrote of revolution and since this government is declared in present danger, these leaders are in jail for what they might sometime do. Fifty other Communist leaders are under sentence and temporarily free on bail.

5. The strong defense of labor unions which Franklin Roosevelt established has been sabotaged by new laws and administration. Aggressive labor unions have been outlawed and their leaders persecuted. On the Atlantic coast the handling of cargoes involve crimes of all sorts. On the Pacific coast stevedores are well organized and social benefits available. This was achieved by Harry Bridges ten years ago. Ever since, Bridges has been persecuted as a "Communist". Year after year this persecution has persisted with varying charges. The government has used as witnesses well-known liars and stool pigeons. The case is going to be brought into court again by the Federal Department of Justice.

6. A notable leader of the United Nations Organization was Alger Hiss, a promising young man who had occupied responsible government positions. On the testimony of a confessed traitor Hiss was arrested and accused of betraying the secret data to the Soviet Union. He was tried and the jury disagreed. They were publicly assailed. He was arrested and tried again. This time he was convicted ~~xxx~~ by virulent public opinion and then by jury, and given a jail sentence. Prominent Americans attested their belief in his integrity. Although now eligible for parole he has been denied it on account of "public opinion."

7. Frederick Field, descendant of two of America's outstanding families, himself one of America's experts on Asia, who strongly sympathized with the new Chinese Republic, was sent to jail because he refused to reveal the names of contributors to a bail fund which was used legally to keep accused persons out of jail until tried.

8. The Rosenbergs, hard-working young parents of small children, have been executed. They were not tried for treason but for conspiracy to give secrets to the Soviet Union ~~in time of peace~~. It was never proved that they either knew atomic secrets or revealed them. At the time of the alleged action we were at peace with the Soviet Union. Their accusers, who themselves confessed treason, furnished no proof against the Rosenbergs beyond unsupported assertion. One of them was never punished, the other given fifteen years, while the victims were sentenced to death. Up until the last minute of their lives they were promised commutation of sentence if they would "confess" and name their "co-conspirators". They steadfastly refused and denied their guilt.

9. When a group in Chicago planned a Memorial Meeting for Stalin a crowd entered the hall, beat the participants and while police looked on, burned Peace literature in the streets.

10. A wounded American prisoner in Korea wrote his mother in California of his good treatment and the desire for peace. Comrades signed this letter and his mother read it at a Peace Rally. She was subjected to a series of persecutions. When the soldier was released he was segregated and not allowed to communicate with his family.

The underlying cause of this sort of action, of which I have indicated only a few samples, is caused by the extraordinary propaganda which had led America to believe:

That universal selfishness brings total prosperity.

That without private profit Industry cannot carry on.

That poverty for most men is inevitable.

That most persons and especially colored peoples are incapable of civilization.

That the United States is in danger of violent overthrow by foreign attack.

That Socialism is a fool's dream and Communism a scoundrel's conspiracy.

* *

Intelligent America knows better than this but intelligent America is afraid of losing status and the chance to earn a living. The schools teach but a minimum of elementary economics and students are avoiding history and the social sciences and crowding into physics, chemistry and "business". No progressive thinker and few liberals can get books published or broadcast or can lecture on public platforms. Such persons cannot travel on American passports unless they swear not only that they are not and never have been Communists, that they do not and never have belonged to any of the "subversive" organizations", but they must also convince the Department of State that they will not while abroad support or encourage any policies of the "Communist Movement", anywhere.

This is the situation in which we find ourselves. We have not yet been able to better it. We have tried to bring the matter to political decision in the last two presidential campaigns. Our first leader deserted the cause. The Progressive Party ticket in the second campaign was disfranchised in twenty-two states and in the rest it was refused public hearing to such extent that our candidate and platform were almost unknown. Since the campaign the Government has started a remorseless effort to imprison and impoverish our recent candidate, Vincent Hallinan, by seizing his property and accusing him of income tax fraud over a period of five years.

Organized religion in this nation, Catholic, Protestant and Jewish, is with a few exceptions determined on war with Communism especially in the Soviet Union and China. Thus the united voice of religion is against Peace; and liberal priests, ministers and rabbis are in danger of ouster. Recently a bishop of the largest Protestant union of Churches spent twelve hours before a Congressional committee protesting that the first duty of the church was to fight Communism. He finished by recommending for investigation the chairman of the one organization in his own church who had dared to defend me when my advocacy of Peace had brought indictment by the Federal courts as a "foreign agent."

Our intellectual leadership in university, platform and literature is almost entirely submissive or silent save in lone cases like that of Albert Einstein. The recent pronouncement of the Association of University Professors for freedom of speech was a shameful apology for red-baiting.

The new administration, headed by a general, is dominated by business men interested in war and colonial expansion and rich by their profits. It began with a threat to attempt the dismemberment of the Soviet Union by bribery and suborning of treason. It threatened to annul the treaties and understandings which ended the Second World War; it is striving to arm Germany, Japan and Western Europe in firm pact to join the United States in military alliance against the Soviet Union; it denies recognition to China.

For a century and more the United States has had vigorous peace movements, religious and civil. Today there are corporations endowed with millions of dollars dedicated to forwarding peace among the nations. Yet the only active ones who today actually work for peace, even with the Soviet Union and China, are the National Council for American-Soviet Friendship and the American Peace Crusade. Both are threatened with listing as "subversive" by the Government. The Peace Information Center of 1950 was closed by government persecution as agent of a "foreign Principal". The Quakers still resist war but are very moderate and refuse all cooperation with other agencies. Thus the organized peace movement in this nation is almost literally scared to death. Yet it is not dead and it will never die.

Emphasis on the great Truth that only by union of Communist social ideals and American mechanical skill can this world be saved. One day this fact must force itself on the United States. Until then, have pity on us, Mankind, and patience with us.

I speak as an American, and as an American who wishes for America fulfillment of its most glorious destiny. I wipe away all memory of ill to my people of the Negro race. I forget things hard to forget and remember only how many peoples have found beneath the Stars and Stripes hope and Sanctuary. I stand myself too near Eternity not to cling to firm belief that one day the United States of America, struggling with her own soul today as once she strove to emancipate four million slaves, will again fight down suspicion and distrust, repudiate greed and devote her skill and wealth not to murder but to more abundant life for all men.

Once in the dawn of this century British and American capitalists sent out the steamship Titanic, as a mechanically perfect machine; so perfect that it defied God, ignored warning and arrogantly drove straight into the icy jaws of Death. Today, Americans dream that with the Atom bomb, with Japanese and German soldiers, the United States will rule the earth, with the aid of colonial peoples conquering each other for America. But we know in our hearts that this dream is mad. With the sympathy of the wiser world we will yet seek the light and find it, without violence and without war.

AMERICA AND PEACE

Let me look back with you over the short history of America whose youth and late rush to world influence must be considered. Singular good fortune has repeatedly spelled doom for these fortunate isles. Prodigal gift of rich and endless land has nurtured greed. Strong and willing labor has invited slavery. Rivalries of race and cultures have quickened talent, until, mad with our very prosperity, we let Liberty choke Equality and Brotherhood die at birth. Yet we drew continual strength from all the world; from Asia came Faith; from Africa, Work with Song; from Europe, Civilization. In such a new world of singular opportunity with freedom of movement and freedom of trade over unprecedented stretches of territory, we have grown rich and healthy, powerful and keen, with rare technical mastery of the forces of nature and a reckless self-confidence born of youth and inexperience. Blind to history and ignorant of human nature, we see Life as the strife of Individuals and have small concept of the age-old social bodies or of the eternal Society of Man.

America of today lightly forgets that she was once a colony dominated by an empire and gained autonomy only by violent revolution; by throwing off just such bonds as she now helps to impose on peoples of Asia and Africa. Wildly and erratically down the years our ways have wandered: from conquest of the wilderness to conquest of Mexico; from domestic serfdom to a system of industrial slavery stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

That leadership which the masses must find if they survive, came to us from time to time because of our unhampered and often lawless freedom, but never reached peaceful, consistent and planned progress. We threw off dictatorship of property and religion. We spread common school education and approached universal suffrage, limited by slavery and color of skin.

Them in blood and destruction we emerged into a vision of democracy unlimited by race, religion or wealth. Again our triumph spelled doom. The freedom which we thought we had gained for black mankind became freedom for the exploiter of land and labor. In the last half of the 19th century individual wealth, however gained, became more important in popular esteem than human freedom, and the new industry became the master and not the servant of the new democracy.

But even American individualism had to yield to social compulsion as the Frontier closed on our western borders. The free west became owned and ordered. The individual highwayman of industry could not longer ride at will. Exploitation of Labor and Raw Material became instead a matter of more intense effort and more subject to integrated and planned capitalism. The flow of cheap immigrant labor dwindled, the black freedmen began to fight for the freedom that was eluding them, white labor began to organize against capital. But Labor was divided: Irishman against Negro and German against Scandinavian and foreign-born against native. On new and intricate skills and machines climbed the mechanic and the white collar worker; over all ruled the Manager and over him the Financier.

We became a money-mad people, ruled increasingly by corporate wealth and ruthless in our methods of gain. Freedom became license and democracy a matter of barter and sale. Yet there was intelligence and vision enough for fierce battle for reform in the last quarter of the century and the United States entered the 20th century determined to stand with the progressive forces of mankind in Science, Government and Humanity with Labor poised to hearken to Europe and fight for socialism.

As the fight of Labor grew more intense and the labor vote forced the rate of profit down and raised wages, a vision of a path to new profits came to American capital. This path was not new; it was very old, but it seemed new to a new people. It was the old colonial expansion. It started with the sugar and fruit of Hawaii and turned to conquest of Spanish islands; it crept down old paths to Central and South America. It excluded European participation with a new Monroe Doctrine designed now to protect investment and not human liberty.

Until the First World War we thought only of colonial expansion in the Americas. This war for the redistribution of Asiatic and African colonies found, therefore, the United States cold and disposed to withdraw into isolation until two temptations pulled us in opposite directions: one, led by Woodrow Wilson, would save the world for democracy and wage war to end war; the other looked on the disaster of the world as our business opportunity to supplant Europe in the exploitation of the Eastern World. We tore into this path with such concentrated effort that we not only completely threw over Wilson's idealistic League of Nations, but joined European reaction against Socialism and the new-born Soviet Union. With characteristic American impulse and blind zeal we knocked the very foundations out from under modern capitalism: -- the Gold Standard, the world market, free land and cheap colonial labor. For a decade world industry and trade reeled, colonial peoples staggered to their feet while the Soviet Union built unshakable foundations.

Then the Old World, led by two mad men, tried to achieve new world domination. Britain, France and the United States joined Hitler and Mussolini to rebuild colonial imperialism. But the new masters asked too high a price, although Britain and France made every effort at accommodation, and deeply sympathized with the Fascist plan to arrest Communism. But in America poverty, unemployment and despair spread so far that Franklin Roosevelt displaced the old individualism with a new socialism and under the tutelege of Harry Hopkins even joined American skill to Soviet strength while Britain and France reluctantly followed.

Fascism and Hitlerism fell and colonialism started to follow. A Golden Age of Mankind dawned: a planned economy for a distracted and tottering world, upheld by some vast vision of equal, unexploited, healthy peoples being led to learn the long and laboriously accumulated wisdom of mankind by a new concept of Democracy. San Francisco followed Potsdam, Yalta, Teheran and Stalingrad -- followed falteringly and haltingly but surely, until tired, Franklin Roosevelt dropped in death.

It was then that the long strained weaknesses of the United States again appeared. Far less than other peoples is the United States a unity. We have no national patriotism. We worship success as Wealth and Wealth as Power. We are far too young for cultural integration. We are a congeries not only of races, nations and cultural patterns, but all these lack time for understanding and historic interpretation. In place of a national consciousness has arisen a fiercely believed-in folk-lore of individual prowess, hammering out personal success. We forgot or never knew our dependence on each other.

There crept into our polity, beside differences of race and culture, new class distinctions of rich, middle-class and poor; investors, employers, technicians, skilled laborers and common laborers, beside criminals. Managers displaced employers; better paid labor shared in exploitation of poorer paid, and all American labor exploited Negroes and colonial peoples. Organized finance directed industry, distributed capital and planned economy. Having actually lost least by war and destruction, American Industry started after the great depression of the thirties to reorganize world trade and industry and replace Great Britain as banker of mankind. But it met two stunning rebuffs. First, Communism did not collapse as America expected, but grew in strength and extent so that Eastern Europe was closed to western exploitation. Second, China, which America regarded as already in her power under the puppet, Chiang Kai Chek, was reorganized under a communist regime in alliance with the Soviet Union. American business regarded this as plot and betrayal, and the Korean War began as an effort to regain control of Chinese labor and raw materials.

This change of outlook and aim, which never would have occurred under Roosevelt, developed to full orientation under his accidental successor, Harry Truman. Truman was a provincial western politician, without broad learning or wide experience. He had no thought of ever questioning the absolute superiority of the American Way of Life. Under the direction of Big Business, Truman completely reversed the policies of Roosevelt. He became suspicious and inimical toward the Soviet Union; made war in Korea and announced the Truman doctrine of armed limitation of the spread of communism. Trade, industry and finance through tighter and more conscious control of the whole economy of the nation began to plan an anti-socialistic world. The Hitler plan of thought control was further developed. The old American folklore of pioneer enterprise, individual initiative and reward of private prowess was emphasized. News gathering and distribution, broadcasting, publication of books, periodicals and newspapers came increasingly under the centralized control of organized capital.

Public opinion was skillfully aroused to suspect and hate the Soviet Union and to oppose her designs by a military preparedness surpassing anything the world ever knew. A false scare of imminent war nearly forced universal military service through Congress and did accomplish wide drafting of youth into the military forces. As opposition developed skillful efforts began to silence it. Confessed informers, liars and traitors were publicized and rewarded, while advocates of peace and friendship were intimidated. Teachers and writers were dismissed; radicals, progressives and liberals jailed; a congressional inquisitions, unhampered by the usual legal limitations was installed, and the pulpit either silenced or taken into loud alliance. Never before in America has there been such suppression of freedom of thought and expression of opinion.

When you judge the United States today, bear this in mind. Not the America of intelligence and courage is forcing war on the world, but the America half-informed and deliberately misled which regards such a gathering as the World Peace Council as a conspiracy against civilization and seriously sees in socialism and communism plots to overthrow the American Way of Life. Thus an hysterical nation is blundering toward a resurgence of religious dogma and is turning a Prince of Peace into a God of War. What happens? It is hard to paint the present scene in America in conceivable tones. May I essay. I select from an endless list of specific cases ten which illustrate our spiritual Reign of Terror:

1. There is scarcely in the land a University or college from which there has not been dismissed either from long service or from the start of a promising career, one or more professors, accused of "sympathy" with "communism."

2. The Attorney-General of the United States has drawn up a long list of organizations, which, without hearing evidence or giving reasons, he declares are "subversive" because of some connection past or present with Communistic or Socialistic ideas. Alleged membership in any of these organizations can mean loss of job or benefits of public housing.

3. From the public schools of New York and a dozen other large cities, successful teachers of ten, twenty or more years have been summarily dismissed for belonging to some "subversive" organization or for refusing to say whether or not they ever belonged to the Communist Party.

4. The eleven official heads of the Communist Party are in jail not accused of illegal acts but because communist writers have at various times and places wrote of revolution and since this government is declared in present danger, these leaders are in jail for what they might sometime do. Fifty other Communist leaders are under sentence and temporarily free on bail.

5. The strong defense of labor unions which Franklin Roosevelt established has been sabotaged by new laws and administration. Aggressive labor unions have been outlawed and their leaders persecuted. On the Atlantic coast the handling of cargoes involve crimes of all sorts. On the Pacific coast stevedores are well organized and social benefits available. This was achieved by Harry Bridges ten years ago. Ever since, Bridges has been persecuted as a "Communist". Year after year this persecution has persisted with varying charges. The government has used as witnesses well-known liars and stool pigeons. The case is going to be brought into court again by the Federal Department of Justice.

6. A notable leader of the United Nations Organization was Alger Hiss, a promising young man who had occupied responsible government positions. On the testimony of a confessed traitor Hiss was arrested and accused of betraying the secret data to the Soviet Union. He was tried and the jury disagreed. They were publicly assailed. He was arrested and tried again. This time he was convicted by virulent public opinion and then by jury, and given a jail sentence. Prominent Americans attested their belief in his integrity. Although now eligible for parole he has been denied it on account of "public opinion."

7. Frederick Field, descendant of two of America's outstanding families, himself one of America's experts on Asia, who strongly sympathized with the new Chinese Republic, was sent to jail because he refused to reveal the names of contributors to a bail fund which was used legally to keep accused persons out of jail until tried.

8. The Rosenbergs, hard-working young parents of small children, have been executed. They were not tried for treason but for "conspiracy" to give atomic secrets to the Soviet Union. [redacted] It was never proved that they either knew atomic secrets or revealed them. At the time of the alleged action we were at peace with the Soviet Union. Their accusers, who themselves confessed treason, furnished no proof against the Rosenbergs beyond unsupported assertion. One of them was never punished, the other given fifteen years, while the victims were sentenced to death. Up until the last minute of their lives they were promised commutation of sentence if they would "confess" and name their "co-conspirators". They steadfastly refused and denied their guilt.

9. When a group in Chicago planned a Memorial Meeting for Stalin a crowd entered the hall, beat the participants and while police looked on, burned Peace literature in the streets.

10. A wounded American prisoner in Korea wrote his mother in California of his good treatment and the desire for peace. Comrades signed this letter and his mother read it at a Peace Rally. She was subjected to a series of persecutions. When the soldier was released he was segregated and not allowed to communicate with his family.

The underlying cause of this sort of action, of which I have indicated only a few samples, is caused by the extraordinary propaganda which had led America to believe:

That universal selfishness brings total prosperity.

That without private profit Industry cannot carry on.

That poverty for most men is inevitable.

That most persons and especially colored peoples are incapable of civilization.

That the United States is in danger of violent overthrow by foreign attack.

That Socialism is a fool's dream and Communism a scoundrel's conspiracy.

Intelligent America knows better than this but intelligent America is afraid of losing status and the chance to earn a living. The schools teach but a minimum of elementary economics and students are avoiding history and the social sciences and crowding into physics, chemistry and "business". No progressive thinker and few liberals can get books published or broadcast or can lecture on public platforms. Such persons cannot travel abroad on American passports unless they swear not only that they are not and never have been Communists, that they do not belong and never have belonged to any of the "subversive" organizations", but they must also convince the Department of State that they will not while abroad support or encourage any policies of the "Communist Movement", anywhere.

This is the situation in which we find ourselves. We have not yet been able to better it. We have tried to bring the matter to political decision in the last two presidential campaigns. Our first leader deserted the cause. The Progressive Party ticket in the second campaign was disfranchised in twenty-two states and in the rest it was refused public hearing to such extent that our candidate and platform were almost unknown. Since the campaign the Government has started a remorseless effort to imprison and impoverish our recent candidate, Vincent Hallinan, by seizing his property and accusing him of income tax fraud over a period of five years.

Organized religion in this nation, Catholic, Protestant and Jewish, is with a few exceptions determined on war with Communism especially in the Soviet Union and China. Thus the united voice of religion is against Peace; and liberal priests, ministers and rabbis are in danger of ouster. Recently a bishop of the largest Protestant union of Churches spent twelve hours before a Congressional committee protesting that the first duty of the church was to fight Communism. He finished by recommending for investigation the chairman of the one organization in his own church who had dared to defend me when my advocacy of Peace had brought indictment by the Federal courts as a "foreign agent."

Our intellectual leadership in university, platform and literature is almost entirely submissive or silent save in lone cases like that of Albert Einstein. The recent pronouncement of the Association of University Professors for freedom of speech was a shameful apology for red-baiting.

45-11-119

The new administration, headed by a general, is dominated by business men interested in war and colonial expansion and rich by their profits. It began with a threat to attempt the dismemberment of the Soviet Union by bribery and subornation of treason. It threatened to annul the treaties and understandings which ended the Second World War; it is striving to arm Germany, Japan and Western Europe in firm pact to join the United States in military alliance against the Soviet Union; it denies recognition to China.

For a century and more the United States has had vigorous peace movements, religious and civil. Today there are scores of organizations, corporations endowed with millions of dollars dedicated to forwarding peace among the nations. Yet the only active ones who today actually work for peace, and peace with the Soviet Union and China, are the National Council for American-Soviet Friendship and the American Peace Crusade. Both are threatened with listing as "subversive" by the Government. The Peace Information Center of 1950 was closed by government persecution as agent of a "foreign Principal". The Quakers still resist war but are very moderate and refuse all cooperation with other agencies. Thus the organized peace movement in this nation is almost literally scared to death. Yet it is not dead and it will never die.

In this dark hour what can be done? Nothing but unswerving determination to persist in appeal to the intelligence and conscience of America. Emphasis on the great Truth that only by union of Communist social ideals and American mechanical skill can this world be saved. One day this fact must force itself on the United States. THE FREE WORLD FOR CORPORATIONS

Beginning January 20, 1953, the United States is going to be governed by corporations or at least by men who represent them and by whom they have been trained. These men believe in freedom for corporations — freedom to initiate industrial enterprises and to conduct them with a minimum of interference from government or trade unions. They especially want free initiative for new enterprise and new invention. The object of their work and plans is to make profit for the corporations. The things which these corporations make and the work they do, are secondary to the profit they make. They make steel, they build automobiles they bore for oil, they buy and sell goods; but in no case is what they do and make of the first importance. Of first importance is that the income from their effort shall be greater than the expense. They do not try to make the best steel or the most efficient cars or the most usable minerals or groceries, but only as good as will yield a profit. No profit no corporations.

The corporations which have now taken over the government of the United States are included among the Free Persons for whom the nation will strive. They are among the persons for whom the Peace Crusade will fight. Freedom to their minds is freedom for corporations to make profit.

There is however a catch in this argument which bothers some people and ought to bother all. And that is that corporations are not persons like other individuals. They are not free agents who think and feel. They are artificial persons whom we pretend are real and agree to treat as persons. Such artificial persons are created by governments; they are the creatures of the State. If now they essay to rule the State, will that make any difference? It might. First, are the aims of creator and created the same? The individual wants food, clothes and shelter; family and children; education, art and literature, leisure and dreams. Corporations want profit. They argue that through profit and only through profit individual will get all this, but here many individuals demur. They point out that corporations have no feelings, can only be punished by lowering their profit and conduct their business by monarchical or oligarchical methods. While the State conducts its business by democracy, or tries to. What happens now when the corporation runs the State, i.e. oligarchy controls democracy? Some say that what happens is War -- class, civil, and World; frustration and confusion; loss of freedom; but of whose freedom? ours or that of the Corporation? At any rate if the State creates the corporation and the corporation rules the State, certainly we can hardly expect the State to rule the Corporation. Q.E.D., certainly then, the people will not rule the United States in 1953. The Corporations will

But cry the Doubters, the Corporations will not actually rule, only their representatives who are ~~fooling and~~ good men. But but whose traing and whose orders will these good men follow? Whose thought and ~~ideals training~~ have they adopted or rather have adopted them? Who pays them now and holds their future then chelsea future in their hands. Above all in whom do they really believe -- in the worker and voter, or in the (industrial) captain of industry and the imperial rule of world ~~encircling industry~~? What do they really think of America? Is it popular elections and ~~a~~ trade unions with strikes and bargaining or is it Big Business? ~~ruling the world~~. What they think they'll do.

embracing world-rule over slaves and "Niggers"

~~Which raises Negro to dea~~ decides on the role of Negroes and guides fate of nations uncertain, largely ignorant

Beginning in January, 1953, the United States government is going to be run by Business. The Secretary of State will be a corporation lawyer, largely interested ~~and trained~~ in ~~formulating corporation industry on a~~ world wide scale; the defense program ~~which will conduct the equipment of the armed forces of the nation,~~ now expending three-fourths of our huge national income for war will be in the hands of General Motors, which includes some of our greatest ~~industrial~~ corporations. Our law enforcement agencies will be in the hands of the Chase National Bank and ~~affiliates~~ similar institutions & corporation lawyers. Agriculture will be guided by big farming agencies and the many interests of the Interior will be in the hands of general business and banking corporations.

This according to many ~~past~~ thinkers in the past will be an ideal set-up. I clearly remember when the nation sighed for business men in politics instead of professional politicians, ~~professional men~~ and theorists. This they said would make government simple direct and easily understood. It was keep it from straying into fields with which it should have nothing to do and where it too easily got muddled and went wrong

Government we said then was essentially simple:. Most matters of human interest could be attended to best by the individuals concerned: a man worked at whatever pleased him and earned the income his efforts deserved. He bought property and used it as he wished. He begot and raised children and educated them. All there was for government to do was to preserve order, prevent fraud ~~cheating~~ and take care of a few -- the fewer the better -- matters of convenience: making roads, carrying mail and teaching the children of the poor, so that they could read and write.

A large number of us attributed most our current ills to unwise attempta to exceed this necessary minimum of government functions. This was a clear political program easy to understand and teach ~~in elementary schools.~~

There was one catch. Human beings are interested in knowing something about the world - its past, it differences in space, its laws and forces; they want to rest and travel, listen to music and see pictures and statues; they want to indulge in romance and dreams, to play games and see plays & make all sorts of experiments Now if these and similar things are done -- and in some way, among all people and at all times and in all places they are and will be done, who will do them? Plainly because they cannot be left entirely to individuals, they involve action in groups, the ~~use~~ occupy of space and time, use of materials which are scarce and above the call for all money. Yet if men live and live in communities, towns, families, cities and nations, some how these needs of man must be attended to and they call for more than individual effort. ~~But~~ If we reduce government to its simples terms of of keeping the peace and stopping cheating and to the fewest and simplest cooperative efforts there is a vast field of civilized work which must be done like highways, bridges and flood control; universities and scientific research; administering ~~publicly owned~~ the common wealth of slaves & contracts & corporate directing cooperative industry and determining how the results shall be distributed. For these reasons governments today without exception are trying to do far more than establish police and courts. They are planning TVA's, running universities and vast scientific experiment stations; they are establishing museums, organizing corporations, which are not individuals nor mortal; they build ships and railroads, airplanes; markets and stock exchanges ~~and markets~~ and control ~~over~~ wages, income and expenditures. In fact a modern government seeks to do all that men want done and do not or cannot do as individuals.

Presicely, says Mr. Eisenhower, is our mistake and we are going to put government back to its simple task and run it as a business. For Business, say the Philosophers whom we put in power last November, has but one object and that is ~~xx~~ to make money. Successful profit is sucessful busines. An author writes literature a musician composes music, a preacher talks about right and wrong; But a business man makes money. If he does not he is no business man. Now says our new president we'll run this government ~~like~~ as a business and get business men to do the job. We will take in enough money to pay our bills and no more . Our bills will be for ~~necessary~~ expense and that will not include music, art, higher education and science and it will have ~~nothing~~ to do with wages, income and ownership and use of natural resourses.

Very well. But the query remains: who in such case will attend to what government does not give ~~notice~~ and about which bankers, merchants, manufacturers know nothing and yet which mankind ~~demand~~ must be done?

Let the People do these things themselves. But who are the people? Is not the Government the People or could it not be if it were so minded? And if it could and would be, just how could Dulles serve the man who needs higher wages? And what would be the function of the Chase National Bank in stopping Crime or of Dewy, the Kingmaker in stopping World War.

I have been in California again. The famous but capricious California weather has been perfect: 14 days of golden sunshine for my eight lectures on Africa and Peace while Shirley talked twelve times. We began in Los Angeles, February 15, Five hundred persons chiefly colored listened to me in the Elks Auditorium in the afternoon and at night a thousand crowded Fritschman's Uniterian church and a hundred or more overflowed. On Tuesday and Wednesday two receptions followed in private, one under the Arts, Sciences and Professions. On Friday came the unbelievable dinner -- 850 plates at $10, with 200 who could not get in

On the 21st to San Francisco and that night 750 persons in Ambassador Ballroom with many standing. On Monday an interview over Radio KPFA, a subscription cooperative with no advertising. Then a meeting at Taylor Magnolia Church, Oakland. It was crowded to the doors and many stood. Wednesday we spent with the Hallinans on their lovely estate and with their six lusty boys. At night I spoke at Berkeley for the Peace Seminar of the University of California The unitarian church just outside the campus was filled with students and teachers.

In all I addressed about three thousand persons, of whom perhaps a third were colored. I talked on revolt in Africa and outlined the ruthless capitalist exploitation; once I dwelt on West Africa and again on present prospects for peace. Once I gave a lesson in elementary economics and outlined socialism and warned Negroes of class struggle beginning within the Negro race in the United States. Almsot all I said was well-received, usually with deep sympathy I pulled no punches. I think the Peace sentimen on this coast is definitel rising and the witch hunting has reached its limit even in the schools. But it is not yet dead. Most men, black and white are still scared for their jobs and they have ample reason. The Government is persecuting the Hallinans for daring to run for Progressive policies. The Trade Unions are compelled to fight back bitterly. But California is still a land of ideas and courage.

Of course I played. I saw thebroad Pacific, the Castles of Hollywood; the Muir Woods and Mount Tamalpais. I crossed the Golden Gate on fairy bridges and dined on Fisherman's Wherf. It was all a hopeful interlude in a world that needs hope as seldom begore

TRADE UNIONS AND COLORED WORKERS

TRADE UNIONS AND COLORED WORKERS

by W.E.B. Du Bois

In 1950 I spoke to the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers on "Trade Unions and Colonies." Since then so much has happened that I venture to write this article along the same general theme.

Until recently labor unions have felt no interest in colonial problems. The reasons are obvious. Colonial peoples are strangers to the average American or British worker. They are strange in appearance, in color and hair, stranger in culture, in clothes and homes, in language and religion, in folkways. They easily appear as curiosities and caricatures. This is the reason that when labor came into political control of Great Britain little change was reflected in the colonial policy of the Empire. It was still based on ignorance, poverty and disease for black and brown, out of which came luxury and power for the rich, and high wage for white labor.

Today when the British Labor Party is out of power its attitude toward the increasing urgency of colonial problems has been disappointing. It has made some protest against mass murder in Kenya by landless natives, and it has assented to independence in West Africa; but it has shown no enthusiasm in opposing the Rhodesia Federation, the overthrow of the constitution in British Guiana, and the removal from power of Kabaka in Uganda. It has taken no real stand against the situation in South Africa.

The organization, therefore, of the gold and diamond mines of South Africa became a world pattern. Black laborers were brought from all parts of Africa by force, fraud and promise. They were held in the mines, worked under force, whipped, and paid 25¢ a day. Their family life throughout South Africa and even Central Africa was broken up. All efforts to unionize these workers were opposed not simply by the mine owners but by the white workers, since the white workers received high wages and a privileged position because the wages of the blacks were so low. Trade unions not only refused to admit Negroes, but agitated to keep Negro unions from being formed or legally recognized.

It is easy to see how this mass of more than eight million workers have been put in practical slavery to 1½ million white exploiters and paid wages varying from 10¢ to $1 a day. On the other hand, the white people of Africa are not the sole exploiters. In 1949 the Union of South Africa received 90 million dollars as a loan from the United States, and the Wall Street Journal predicts that in the next five years the United States will furnish a billion and a half dollars for South African mining and industry. The Morgan and Rockefeller interests have been investing in South Africa for a long time. The Ford interests began investing 25 years ago. General Motors has recently built a 20 million dollar plant there. General Lucius Clay, recently head of the "Freedom" movement in the United States, is director of the corporation which in three years made nine million dollars profits in the Union of South Africa. Firestone, Goodyear, General Electric, have all been increasing their investments since the end of the Second World War, until today most of the invested capital of South Africa comes from America.

The United States Consul General in the Union of South Africa said in August, 1930, "This country has a greater future than almost any young country in the world." The Vice-President of the General Steel Casting Corporation, one of the largest manufacturers of railway equipment in the United States, has visited South Africa three times in the last five years. He said in August, 1950, that he considered South Africa had unlimited potentiality for development. "I can see it going ahead with great speed, for it is so rich in so many kinds of raw materials. The South Africans are a great people."

In the United States the millions of yellow, brown and colored workers of colonial countries have had little effect on thought or policies. When the American trade unions withdrew from the World Federation, few of their members know that one underlying reason was because the white British unions wanted to control and speak for the colored unions, while the Africans wanted independent voice and action. We joined Britain in rejecting this demand. However, in our own nation, an analagous demand that Negroes, living chiefly in the South, be either denied union membership or segregated began to disappear before Negro migration north and their entrance into industrial competition with white workers. Then came the discovery that Negroes were men as good or bad as other men and as worthy of union brotherhood.

Since then Negroes have joined unions in increased numbers. But the fact that the union movement has not become strong in the South and the consequential lower rate of wages there, have led many industries to take advantage of this and move out of the high wage districts of the North into the South. More favorable climate, laws made for the advantage of Big Business, large natural resources and huge subsidies from the federal government, have increased the problems of labor in the United States because the white Southern worker excludes the Negro worker in many of the most important industries.

White and black workers of the world are still separated and unacquainted, but not nearly so widely as 100 years ago. The first time I went to Europe travel took two weeks; the last time it took 18 hours. When I went to Africa in 1923 it required a month of travel. I could make the trip tomorrow in 24 hours. But if physical distance has thus lessened, industrial ties of work and wage, of trade and commerce have equally clamped the imperial powers and the colonial world together. This is true in food supply and clothing, but especially in metals. Metals are the basis of civilization. Primitive man used stone, wood and bone for tools and weapons, but started on the road to civilization when copper and iron, gold and silver, bronze and brass came into knowledge and use. Their discovery and use made history.

Today metals are indispensable for three uses: structure, as in the case of iron; transmission of power as in the case of copper; and chemicals as in the case of petroleum oil. The increase in the use of these materials during this century has been amazing: Pig Iron has increased in use from a half million tons in 1900 to over 100 million tons today; copper from 18,000 tons to 2 million; This shows not only miraculous increase in the industrial use of metals from wells and mines, but the way in which a new world of industry and labor is threaded together. Of the bonds of industry you are more or less aware -- ten groups control the copper of the world; despite owning our own iron mines we imported three million tons in 1930 and much more in 1950. We import minerals of every kind which laborers of other nations and continents mine, dig and process. Those laborers are your colleagues and fellow workers. What you earn depends on what they earn. Their standards of living indirectly determine yours. The greatest reserves of copper in the world are in Africa; the iron around Lake Superior is 50% pure, but the iron which we are just beginning to import from Liberia is 70% pure and the ledge from which its fabulous supply comes is leased for 80 years to an American corporation. Negroes who mine this iron get less than a dollar a day and have no union.

Labor was once led to believe that the ignorance and inefficiency of colored labor was natural and incurable and that white labor had a right and duty to ride on their backs. Today this theory has been proven false. Degradation of black labor does not increase the wage or strengthen the position of white labor; on the contrary it is the cause of the inability of white labor permanently to better its condition and make labor as such respectable and decent, capable of high education, contributing to civilization, art and science. The plight of the workingman in China, Africa and the West Indies is your problem as well as his, your duty even more than his, for you stand on the ramparts of a new world of infinite possibilities while he climbs out of its staggering foundations which have been erected on the corpses of his fathers.

This brings us face to face with a fundamental contradiction. The hard and dirty work of the world has got to be done. The better it is done, the more carefully and effectively, the better the world will be. Whatever work is necessary and beneficial should be performed because and only because the world needs it and the reward of the laborers should be what he needs in order to be a healthy, intelligent and well-rounded man, no more, no less. Unnecessary work should not be permitted, and reward beyond reasonable need as well as starvation wage should be illegal.

Men must come to realize that it is not the kind of work that a man does which should settle his social status, but the necessity of the work, the training for doing it well, and the reward which all honest, necessary work deserves.

When by invention and machine hard toil, lifting and digging, and repulsive conditions can be avoided, the results of such invention should go to all.

What then, the world wants and what gradually it is coming to realise as its ideal, is a distribution of the necessary work of the world among men carefully prepared in mind and body to do this work and to do this work for the benefit of a better and higher manhood and not simply as their sole means of survival. When this stage is reached there must be no social degradation or compulsory poverty, ignorance and disease attached to the performance of necessary work.

Higher training for the gifted; leisure for human beings, is possible now and where these are lacking something is wrong with our intelligence and organization. This ideal is abroad in the world, but it is being held back and kept down by the status of colonial peoples who have been, more than workers in civilized lands, oppressed and distorted by poverty, ignorance and disease. No fight for the eventual improvement in equality of the workers in the United States, France and Great Britain will be successful until they cease to be pulled down and kept back by the conditions in Africa, Asia and the West Indies and by conditions in our own South.

If the ideal of the white American worker is to become rich and not have to work, or if he aims to be well-off and let the world's darkies do the drudgery at starvation wage while he does pleasant labor which yields hi leisure and a car, then he is in for disappointment. The yellow, brown and black laborer will share the advance of labor or by competition prevent it. And that advance is not toward idle wealth or superior lordship over serfs. No, it is sharing the world's work and drudgery as equals, with equal leisure and happiness in a world decent for all and not simply for a favored few.

AMERICAN NEGROES AND THE ELECTION OF 1954

AMERICAN NEGROES AND THE ELECTIONS OF 1954

by W.E.B. Du Bois

One of the difficult questions of the new year is that of the political action of Negroes in the critical elections of this year. It will be pointed out, as so often in the past, that the Negro voter will hold the balance of power in the congressional elections of this fall as well as in the presidential election of 1956. This fact is significant, however, only if Negroes vote substantially as a unit.

41-3-89

Before the election of 1912 the Negro vote could be counted as almost solidly Republican. But this was of less importance than might seem, because most Negroes lived in the South where they were disfranchised. In the election of 1912, because Taft had surrendered largely to the lily-white South and Wilson had made gestures toward the Negro, their vote was split; most of it still went Republican, but a small proportion went Democratic.

Wilson's failure to live up to his promises of "ungrudging justice" to black folk, and the crazy effort of the Bourbon South to celebrate the return of the Democrats by making color caste national, threw the Negro vote back to the Republicans in the next four elections. In the election of 1928 the Negro was ignored and insulted to an unprecedented extent by both Hoover and Smith; but his vote had increased in power and effectiveness by the emigration which made his political power a reality in the North. Politicians in states like New York, Michigan and Illinois had to calculate with it.

Moreover, the economic aspect of the Negro problem, in contrast to merely the political, began to press for attention. In 1932, then, the Negro vote began to go Democratic, in a revolt which represented the revolt of Northern worker, black and white, against Hoover and the Republicans. The socialism of Roosevelt's "New Deal" was exactly what the Negro needed. He was struck down by the depression of the thirties and suffered worse than any other class of Americans. Roosevelt's efforts did not give him complete justice but he did gain. His northern city poor were saved from actual starvation; his unemployed got some of the opportunities of the WPA, and a few got into the CCC. In the South the benefits to Agriculture went to the white landowners more largely than to the black tenants, and relief funds went overwhelmingly to whites. Negroes were almost excluded from the benefits of the TVA. But in the North where the Negro vote was still increasing in number and organization, the Negro benefitted much by the New Deal.

In the far-reaching and ambitious attempt to reorganize the whole stature of American industry by the National Industrial Recovery Administration, the Negro made effort and strong propaganda to get better wages, more and more varied employment and more consumer recognition. When mass organization of the working classes was made possible by the CIO Negroes began for the first time to pour into the union movement from which hitherto most of them had been excluded. A revolution of political allegiance followed when in the elections of 1944 and 1948 the Negro vote went almost solidly for the Democrats in the North, and even Negroes in the South, as the White Primary began to fall, showed signs of going Democratic. Republicans sneered that this was simply thanks for bread and butter which was quite true, but it illuminated for Negroes a new conception of politics; votes might be used not simply for appointments for a few leaders, not even simply for civil rights as a matter of change in laws, but for getting bread and butter, decent housing, and in general a higher standard of living necessary to any real citizenship.

This realization of the use of the ballot for economic uplift was blurred in the elections of 1948 and 1952, first by foreign war and then by the intense propaganda that prosperity lay in war with the Soviet Union and in suppressing Communism. The mass of Negroes and their leaders paid but minor attention to the fight against Communism because they did not understand it. But back of the smoke and fury which these matters seemed to raise among white folk, shrewd black thinkers began to narrow and concentrate their drive for increased Negro civil rights and social recognition. Their success was great, and in the election of 1954 this bids fair to continue to be the strongest political line of the Negro voter.

41-3-92

What can the two parties offer the Negro for his support? The Republican party represents Big Business, not only in the North but expanding rapidly in the South. It needs the Negro vote now cast in the North and the increasing Negro vote which will soon be doubled in the South. If they offer to pay for this with overthrow of job discrimination and segregation they may lose the Southern white vote. The action of Eisenhower shows his frustration on this point: he gives off shore oil to Big Business in the South and appoints the most notorious Southern Negro hater in politics to the UN which faces increasing problems on the color line. ~~He as yet dares nothing to attract the Negro vote;~~ He has made no major Negro appointment and said no word about civil and economic rights except slow and vague changes in military racial practices. He has, however, let his Attorney General join in the attack on race segregation in schools. If the Supreme Court decrees this, it will cost the Republicans the Southern white vote and probably gain them the bulk of the black vote north and south.

The Democratic party which gained the Negro vote by the New Deal, retained it under Truman by his promises of a national FEPC policy and increased civil rights. But Truman did nothing to implement this promise, although Negro civil rights increased during his term. This was not, however, due to Democratic party policy. Today Stevenson has not by word nor deed made a single gesture toward the Negro vote. His political thought, through his grandfather, is Southern; he touches the race question by waving the long discarded Red Shirt of Reconstruction, saying no single word on FEPC, disfranchisement or civil rights, and advocating war with the Soviets so far as his own lukewarm belief permits.

Meantime, half concealed by mists in the rear, lies uneasily that pertinent question: have American Negroes any interest in war with the Soviet Union or does the American Negro problem touch in any way the spread of socialism in the world or in the triumph of Communism? On this matter many ~~most~~ Negroes of education and knowledge of world affairs are discreetly dumb. Some ~~They~~ have suffered already from red-baiting and fear it. By joining the witch hunt many of them are making their present jobs secure and even gaining new and unexpected positions both in politics and industry. Recently the president of one of the largest Negro state colleges refused to let the students hold an NAACP meeting on his campus. When friends remonstrated he said with sly pomposity: "That is my stragedy!" My friend, who was present, agreed.

Most Negro newspapers do not discuss the most discussed question in the world today: Socialism; and join in wholesale and uncritical condemnation of Communism in the Soviet Union and China. A few Negro leaders follow the red-baiting American mob and shriek for war and the overthrow of Communism by force and violence.

Even these, however, have found it increasingly difficult to keep silent at the persecution of certain Negro leaders of proven integrity. Paul Robeson is one of the most gifted of Negroes, with a lovable and frank disposition known to all American Negroes. Negroes have found it pretty hard to condemn him for saying exactly what nine tenths of them believe, namely that American Negroes should never fight the one nation among civilized peoples which has made the color line illegal. Ben Davis is known as an honest, sincere worker for the civil and economic rights of working people, black as well as white. In the fullness of his young manhood he languishes in a "Jim Crow" jail today, not because he has done nor is accused of doing any illegal act. He is disgraced and dishonored by a decision of the Supreme Court which will go down in history as one of the most unjust decisions on record. The Negroes of the United States almost to a man, and their newspapers, are sitting in shamed silence at his crucifixion. If the Democratic or Republican parties expect to win on this record of Negro persecution they stand on an insecure platform and they know it.

41-3-94

But all this hides and obscures the real problem which may not be discussed in the next campaign because money and fear can prevent discussion of this as well as of other pressing problems; and that is, what interest have American Negroes in Socialism and in one of the paths for complete socialism, Communism. Some Negroes, myself included, and most liberal whites used to assume that Negroes, from the lessons of slavery and caste, would as they progressed quite naturally range themselves with the liberal and even radical causes. We had to be reminded that American Negroes are human with all human foibles; that today with all their phenomenal progress they are still as a mass ignorant and poor, and peculiarly prone to be influenced by money, power and current public opinion. ~~The majority~~ Numbers of them today therefore are following the red-baiting and witch-hunting tactics of their white fellow citizens. There is, however, the saving remnant, and it will grow. These Negroes know and think and dare speak. They know that the hope of the world is Socialism, that steadily the whole civilized world is moving inexorably toward socialism, and that the recent uplift of American Negroes was implemented by the socialism of Harry Hopkins in Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal.

Public taxation to furnish capital for industry; public relief, public taxation to give farmers sufficient income to raise the food we all need,' public control of great river systems for public good and not simply for private profit; organization of workers, consumers, competitors, managers, for public welfare and not for the increase in the number of millionaires, — all this is Socialism and this the New Deal tried to accomplish. Admit it did not wholly succeed; admit it made mistakes, especially in not attacking the political power of Big Business,' nevertheless what it did was a magnificent effort which America will not soon forget and whose reversal and end was the chief casualty of the Second World War.

How shall the world achieve the socialistic organization it must have for civilization to succeed and grow? There are as many recipes as minds. But one great modern nation essayed Communism, that is, compulsory socialism directed by a group of dictators (for the good of the working class). They were assailed by every type of misfortune and had first to drive from power what all scholars regard as one of the most selfish, ignorant and dissolute religious organizations of the modern world. They succeeded in building a Communist state. How successful this state is, there is wide disagreement. I regard it as the most hopeful nation on earth. Dominant American opinion today regards it as a criminal conspiracy which must be overthrown by world war.

What voters and particularly Negro voters should discuss in the coming campaign, should be Socialism and Chinese and Russian Communism,' and the future of these great movements especially as they touch the Negro in America, Africa and the islands of the sea. Such open and fair discussion will be prevented by force and fear. Every effort will be made to force the Negro voter to believe without inquiry that Communism is a crime; that Socialism is a fatal mistake, and that only war and unlimited preparation for world war can meet these evils. This, if successful, will cut the thought and action of most American Negroes off from the main current of progressive thought in the world, particularly among workingmen and especially among colored workers. Today American Negroes know almost nothing of the revolution which is transforming 400,000,000 of the Chinese, the worst exploited laborers in the world, into free, happy workers. Instead of this American Negroes will only hear of the necessity of murdering Communists in China, Indo-China and Korea, and driving and keeping out of jobs any Americans who honestly believe that the truth about Socialism is not being told in the United States. If we are not careful, American Negroes will find themselves on the wrong side of the great world movements of human progress, and regarded with astonishment by the civilized world as people too stupid to know their own best interests.

They will gradually be cut off from cooperation with the progressive forces of the world, and their artistic gifts and labor force will be added to the reaction which is triumphing in the United States. This will be loss to the white world, but it will critically hinder the colored and black world. The nationalist movements in the African world today were sparked by the American-inspired Pan-African movement early in this century. Today in the Caribbean, in West and East Africa, in South and Central Africa, black men are staggering to their feet. Against them is arraigned not only the greed of Britain, France and the United States, but in the United States, American Negroes are using their power or their inactivity to help caste in South Africa, exploitation in West Africa, and disfranchisement in the West Indies, and Central and South America. Few American Negro newspapers have defended the government which tried to raise the disgracefully exploited sugar workers of Guiana; we sent a ~~disgraceful~~ miserable pittance to support the slaves of South Africa in their resistance to Malan; and let the African Council on African Affairs which sent that be labelled as "subversive". We are willing to remain ignorant on evils in Uganda, the Sudan, the Belgian Congo and colored Central and South America.

But the whole American Negro group will not follow this misled

Mass
~~majority~~. Let the modern "Uncle Toms" follow American Big Business to its inevitable disaster, a ~~minority~~ group of us will insist at any cost on the right to know, to have our children taught the truth, to have the right to advocate peace and friendship even with Communists; to advocate the advance of the socialist state until the rule of private profit yields to the demands of public welfare, and until the color line absolutely disappears along with the exploitation of the poor workers of the world.

41-3-98

Above all, the American Negro does not ~~realize~~ understand that the next center of colonial revolt and racial uplift is going to be in Africa. The extent of upheaval in Africa is not realized today in America, but in every part of the dark continent Negroes are protesting: first, against the stealing ~~and segregation~~ of their land upon which they depend for making a living. This is most serious in Kenya and in the Union of South Africa. Secondly a demand for political representation extending all the way from membership in legislative bodies to full autonomy. In the new political organization in South Central Africa the Negroes are not adequately represented. They have practically no real representation in the Union of South Africa and Southwest Africa. Their representation is limited and indirect in the Belgian Congo. They are fighting for larger representation throughout the French Sudan and the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, and they are fighting for independence and autonomy in West Africa. All of these movements are in the same direction and in some cases they have flared to murder and violence; in all cases they must be taken account of by those who look forward to a new world.

American Negroes especially should in the elections of 1954 keep clearly in mind the attitude of the United States toward the problems of Africa. Unless Negroes keep these facts in mind

Eisenhower has made a few Negro appointments but they are not important so far as policy making is concerned or so far as having anything to do with solving any important parts of the Negro problemx. His one major contribution to Negro rights has been to let his attorney-general join in the attack on race segregation in schools. An unanimous Supreme Court has abolished school segregation, but it is a question as to how far this can be put down as the work of either party. Most of the members of the Court at present are Democrats. ~~The appointment of Chief Justice by Eisenhower can be acclaimed as a credit to the party. But~~ on the whole this decision is a result of concerted and long continued effort on the part of American Negroes, and not of any party policy

TO THE AMERICAN NEGRO, 1954

After a long career devoted principally to the emancipation of the American Negro from partial slavery to full and equal citizenship, I claim the right to advise my people in this day of crisis -- of crisis greater I fear than most of them imagine.

The greatest question of our day is Communism. The American Negro is asked today to choose between two pictures of Communism. The first declares that Communism is a crime promoted by conspirators who are enslaving peoples for selfish reasons. The attempts have failed yet the Soviet Union threatens to overthrow the world and the United States, especially by force and violence. That persons who believe in Communism or cooperate with Communists deserve severe punishment; and that this nation should prepare to contain if not exterminate Communism by the greatest possible preparation of military force; an effort so great as to threaten the nation with a major financial disaster.

The second thesis says that Communism is an attempt to eliminate poverty, ignorance and disease among the majority of peoples, through efforts to achieve socialism by Communist methods; that Socialism has long been regarded as the goal of modern civilization by many great social philosophers; that the present Communist attempts to achieve Socialism are succeeding and spreading widely and are the hope of future civilization.

Both these statements cannot possibly be true. It would therefore be the natural reaction of honest persons asked to choose between them, or to modify them into more acceptable statements, to begin careful study of these beliefs so as to guide their thought and action toward

Right and Truth.

But today so violent is the belief ~~in~~ of many Americans in the first thesis, that any real study of Socialism or Communism is forbidden, any belief in it even if honest is regarded as a crime, and the nation is asked to forbid contrary opinions, curtail the democratic process of government, and ~~later~~ even to go to war in order to support a belief which the majority of Negroes and probably most whites today do not understand. It is asserted that we are in present danger of communist revolution by force and violence.

I am not writing to ask any American Negro or anybody else to embrace Communism. That is a matter for his individual intelligence and conscience and his knowledge of Truth. But I am saying, and saying with warning and deep conviction, that no patriotic American and no loyal descendant of African slaves, can for a moment consent without bitter protest to deny to any free ~~American~~ citizen the right himself to search for the truth, to make up his mind in accord with the evidence, and then to act within the law as he thinks right. If he thinks it his duty to defy the law, he must be ready to suffer the consequences.

With that firm belief, I am convinced that every Negro should make an attempt to learn what socialism and communism are; what they are trying to accomplish and what success they are having. Personally I believe that today Communistic nations are leading the world in the fight against poverty, ignorance and disease and against that worst of diseases, race prejudice. My belief is based on personal investigation and study. I ask no man to share this belief unless he makes similar effort to know. If and when he does, I recognize his full right to disagree with me.

I believe that the present hysterical fear of Socialism and Communism is the false propaganda of the selfish rich. Let me remind my readers that today, in this nation every effort is being made by those in authority to prevent truth from becoming known; by use of misleading news reports and wrong interpretation of news; by keeping honest study of socialism and communism out of schools and colleges; by scaring social leaders into silence; by open use ~~ex~~ in court of stool-pigeons~~x~~ hired spies and confessed liars; by censoring books and periodicals; radio and television; and by slanting and distorting every source of public information so that it is most difficult if not dangerous for honest and well-meaning people to really know what is truth and what they should think.

Today the leaders of our industry and makers of public opinion are helping every reactionary movement in the world from land monopoly in Guatemala to race discrimination in South Africa.

It will be no service to this nation if 15,000,000 of its citizens, by ignorance or silence, help such effort toward making sincere search for truth and honest belief impossible in this country. Negroes ought to know better than to be party to such policies. Never forget that in this nation and others whenever a difficult social problem is faced, which usually touches income and property, there will be concerted effort to stop knowledge of the facts and discussion of the situation by strong public opinion and even by law. This was the case in the slavery controversy in the United States from 1699 to 1863. The repression led to bloody Civil War. For 90 years after the Emancipation Proclamation repeated effort was made to stop discussion of the status of Negroes by public disapproval, vicious slander and law. There is only one way to meet such tactics and that is by re-assertion of the right of American citizens to know and to think.

If this nation has sense enough to learn anything from history it should be that no great social problem can be settled by making it dangerous or illegal for people to study it, discuss it and to come to believe about it whatever they think right. This battle for freedom of opinion we once thought had been won and won forever in this land. Today we are told and told by threat, insult and punishment that Communism is something we must not study, must not know about, must not discuss and about which we have no right to hold honest opinions.

Sons of Africa, it is up to you; out of the bitter experience of your own past, to tell this nation that this destruction of elementary human rights is not only unworthy of the Declaration of Independence and the Bill of Rights, but even ~~[redacted]~~ contrary to ordinary common sense.

THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF NEGROES TO AMERICAN CIVILIZATION

THE CONTRIBUTIONS OF NEGROES TO AMERICAN CIVILIZATION

When peoples live together for centuries and share building a nation, there are no mathematical ways to deter mine just what each has contributed to the results. We can only speculate and reason concerning the various ways in which each group has halppd.

In the case of the American Negro there are seven or eight contributions; whihh it can be argued they have contributed.to the building up of the United States. First, as explorers and companions of explorers; secondly and perhaps greatest the gift of labor and hard work; third as soldiers to defend the country; then as builders of democracy, primarily for themselves but eventually for all Americans. The establishment of the idea of freedom for all citizens of a country, a contribution to song, to literature and art, and to what for want of a better word wemay call a Spirit.

Copy Gift Forword, I,II Also III

The legend that Negroes were in America even before Columbus has a basis in fact. The Negro countenance, clear and unmistakable occurs repeatedly in Indian carvings and in Mexican temples. There are evidences of Indian customs and of African traders. There was a Negro colony in Mexico which may have been instrumental in establishing the city of Mexico and its influence pervaded neighboring tribes and perhaps reached Peru. There is historical record that Alonzo, the Negro, piloted one of the ships of Columbus, although there has been also desperate effort to show that in that case Negro was a description rather than evidence of race.

During the period of exploration from the beginning of the 15th century Negroes were frequent in America They had permission to enter in ~~12~~ 1502. In 1 503 the government of Haiti was trying to prohibit them because they fled to the Indians and made trouble. When the new Sugar culture began in Spain and the canary islands it was transferred to the West Indies and Negroes brought as laborers. But again, they incited the Indians to rebellion and actual rebellion began on Diego Columbus' plantation. There wasx a Negro priest in Mexico in ??1940 and a brotherhood of Negroes and one of Indians. Pizzaro was dragged to the cathedral by Negroes. A Negro was with Balboa when he discovered the Pacific Ocean, and thirty Negroes helped to direct 500 Indians in transporting material across the mountains. Cortez had Negro companions from Cuba to Mexico. And as early as 1528 there were at least 10,000 Negroes in the New World. They accompanied DeSoto. They were in Chile,and trained Negro artisans helped found St. Augustine in Florida in 1565 and other American towns.

Perhaps the one explorer on which we should dwell is the story of Steven Dorantes who sailed from Spain in 1527. He became eventually a leader of the expedition that went to discover the 7 cities of Cibola and eventually discovered what is now New Mexico.

But the great work of Negroes in America was as laborers.

HISTORY OF THE COCOA PRODUCTION ON THE GOLD COAST, B.W.A.

c. 1955

HISTORY OF COCOA PRODUCTION ON THE GOLD COAST, B.W.A.

undated

Export of cocoa from the Gold Coast:

1891	80 lbs.	$20
1900	536 tons	$135,000 - 5.2 of total export
1950	267,401 tons	$162,000,000 - 70% of total export trade

In 1879 William Tetteh Quarshie introduced cocoa bean from the Spanish island of Fernando Po.

Gold Coast dollar earnings from cocoa alone amounted to more than the dollar earnings of New Zealand, Pakistan and Ceylon.

Three big companies operated in West Africa at the beginning of this century: The United Africa Company of London; Holt Company of Liverpool, Zochonis & Co. of Manchester. There are about a dozen smaller firms in Britain and firms controlled by Indians, Syrians and Lebanese in the retail trade on the Gold Coast.

32-13-1

The African petty bourgeoisie consists of middlemen traders, shopkeepers, often acting as families, a thousand women hucksters and market venders.

The United Africa Company is the greatest monopoly. It is the biggest united in the worldwide Unilever commercial empire, and originated on the Gold Coast in 1879, being a combination of British firms. It became in 1882 the National Africa Company and in 1886 the Royal Niger Company. By 1893 the Royal Niger Company had swallowed up most traders and forced African middlemen out of business by trade licenses and marketing regulations and control of the police. In 1900 the Royal Niger Company distributed 145% of its capital to shareholders and became The Niger Company.

The Lever combine in 1920 secured control of the Niger Company. In 1929 Lever Brothers acquired the Niger Company and other corporations and formed the United Africa Company. This company now owns the shares of 40 companies and controlling interest in 25 other concerns.

During the last war it secured predominant interest in other commercial enterprises worth controlling, and branched into public works. The United Africa Company then became ~~the~~ a subsidiary of Unilever and Lever Brothers, with capital resources of $280,000,000 and interest in 300 companies. It is still expanding.

By controlling imported manufactured goods and food stuffs big firms charged consumers maximum prices and on the other hand, paid producers of cocoa and palm products minimum prices for their crops.

During the depression of the 30's these companies formed a pool and fixed a uniform price to be paid producers. In 1937-8 the farmers declared a boycott. They refused to collect or sell the cocoa beans. They stopped buying European goods. Customs revenues fell, textiles designed for export from England dropped from 39 million square yards to 14 million square yards in six months. The British sent out a commission of inquiry. The commission condemned big business methods. The British government set up a West African Produce Control Board to buy all cocoa so as to eliminate the dealers and shoppers, but some like the United Africa Company acted as local buyers for the Board.

38-13-2

In 1947 the Gold Coast Marketing Board was established to take general charge of buying, grading and selling cocoa and to develop the cocoa industry. It had 12 members: 4 officials, 4 African farmers appointed by the government, 2 Africans nominated by the chiefs and 2 Europeans representing the Chamber of Commerce. The first Board made $40,000,000 profit during the war.

This Board was re-organised in 1951 with an official African majority. The profits had amounted to $159,000,000 by 1952, and arrangements were made to buy cocoa directly from the farmers.

Another Board has been established to deal with other crops like copra, palm kernels and coffee. A million pounds has been given toward the endowment of Gold Coast University College for cocoa research there and elsewhere.

Industrially the Gold Coast is backward. There are almost no secondary industries. They import matches, soap, cigarettes, leather, shoes, textiles, paints, bottles, sugar, corn meal, condensed milk, cement, gin, rum and chocolate.

The mining situation is worse than the cocoa. The Gold Coast has the second largest output of manganese in the world and has never contributed taxes to the country until a new proposal in 1955. The profits are fabulous. Gold, diamonds, and bauxite are mined.

THAT THIRD PARTY

1956 ?

THAT THIRD PARTY

By W.E.B. Du Bois

Friend wife regarded me disparagingly as she served the soup; it was split pea from a can, but reinforced and encouraged with home genius.

"So you're entering politics again."

I nodded dissent. The soup was very tasty.

"But you are advocating a third party."

"Yes."

"What chance has a third party?"

"Small, I fear."

"Then why on earth do you support it?"

"I must -- one never can tell when the change will come."

"Also, one never can tell when brambles will bear berries."

"Or shrimps whistle; but one can guess when third parties must come in order to avert disaster. I somehow sense the critical time. I cannot believe that the American people are stupid enough to bow much longer to the rule of the idiots now in Washington or to confine their choice in Albany to an heir of the Robber Barons or of the Rockefeller Oil Trust whose victims at Caracas yesterday spit in our faces.

"You can't imagine this? You who saw the communists jailed, the Rosenbergs crucified, Sobel persecuted, Saypool and Kaufman promoted, and you yourself handcuffed for talking peace."

With the roast which had delicious brown gravy I hastened to admit that I was naturally credulous. "I tried a third party and failed when Wallace lacked guts. I tried a second time when they put in prison Halinan, my candidate. I tried a third time and Marcantonio died deserted by his friends."

The Social Worker spoke up and said: "So, slapped down three times you hunt for another cheek?"

"I must. To live is to try. To try is often to fail. To fail is to try again. What else? That is life. A third party is due either by vote or by violence. I prefer a vote."

Here the lawyer after a second helping, butts in. As a rule I avoid lawyers; but this one helped keep me out of jail. I like him. He said:

"But the guys that you got about you -- can you trust them?"

"Why?"

"Because we agree."

"Entirely?"

"Oh, no -- naturally not - being human; but in essentials. You see, here we are seven - A Socialist, a Reformer, a Progressive, a Liberal, a Labor Leader, a Minister and a man who usually keeps still. We agree on seven points: -- no more war; cease preparation for war and atomic bomb testing; stop universal military service; justice to labor with fair taxation; abolish the racial color line; peaceful co-existence with socialist states; recognition of a citizen's right to vote for Communism."

"Is that all that these fellows believe in?"

"Oh, no -- each one believes in this and much more. For instance, the Socialist reverses Trotsky, hates Stalin and declares that the Soviet Union is not really a socialist state."

"And you agree with him?" "Oh, no, I say: "Trotsky and Stalin are dead, and will in all probability remain so. Call the USSR what you will, it has given the world the best educational system today in existence; it has established social medicine for two hundred million people; it has abolished unemployment; it has broken the grip on a nation of one of the worst systems of superstition and religious dogmatism the world has seen; it has planned industry successfully and advanced science miraculously. It should be our aim to do as well as this and to do it if we can, in less time and at less cost. But at whatever time and cost, do it we must."

"Fine talk, but believe me, your socialist friends will spend more time bewailing the past than building the future. However, lets look at the Social Reformer."

"I know --- I've known him forty five years and forty six of these years he has spent climbing on and off the fence, trying to be liberal and conservative, Socialist and Capitalist, orthodox and radical. Almost all things to all men."

"Will he ever wholly support a great cause?"

"If enough others do; and enough others may."

Just then, the student arrived, in time for dessert and in time to throw in a word." "You have a Capitalist with you - surname "Progressive," - can he build Socialism?"

"He can certainly help and this one has helped. Indeed, Capitalism must help build the welfare state, even if it can never complete it, under privately owned capital. At any rate, I have more faith in the capitalist who works for public welfare than in the Socialist who practices private exploitation."

The lawyer returned to the fray. "And do you lean on Liberals?" he asked.

"As little as possible, yet we must lean somewhere. Liberals are avowed enemies of socialism, but firm friends of progress. They mean well and usually that is about all they mean. Nevertheless, the good intentions which pave Hell, are better than no pavements at all.

"And Labor?"

"Once the chief support and the hope of Socialism in America, until Big Business paid the unions to purge themselves of 'communism." Now labor unions with their leadership shorn largely of brins and character, with men like Harry Bridges and Ben Gold curcified, often become the people's bitterest enemy, guided by a Meany so aptly named, or a Reuther bound by webs of his own weaving."

"And the church?"

"Hopeless. A cardinal shrieks 'hate your enemies.' A bishop drives the Melishes from their fine social service and closes the church. A community church in New York becomes government informer to stop the courageous mouth of Fritchman in Los Angeles. Led by the President we all go to church and pray loudly while every profitable business helps raise millions to hire a handsome idiot stage religious revivals and talk harmless crap. Meanwhile, crime flourishes, stealing increases, murder spreads, families keep disintegrating,and children go to hell.

I managed to avoid the green salad, but the dessert was rhumbaba and it was delicious. Friedd wife was ominously silent, while I sipped and mused aboud, as the others politely pretended to listen.

"The free democracies of the West are disintegrating, Socialism increases, Communism spreads, France falls and we seem to follow. Out Senators are old and frightened, fat and ordered about by a pro-slavery south, owned by Texan oil millionaires and led by Eastland and Byrd. Our Congressmen are spry and active representatives of their own private business interests, while well-paid lobbies with the best brains in the land attend public business. We have lost our manners. Henry Cabot Lodge cannot even address the Soviet representative in the United Nations with ordinary courtesy. Big business is buying up our educational system and telling us what to teach..

The news agencies tell us what we may hear. The Department of Justice indicates what we may say. And the Department of State - where we may go. We just don't know how to use our freedom; so we gamble and take dope.

The teacher who is nice but timid and dares visit us but seldom, here laid down her spoon and sighed. She whispered:

"You are impossible."

"True," I beam. "And that is because I live in an Impossible World. Despite that, I refuse to commit suicide. I face Hoover and his secret police resurrected from the Medieval Inquisition. It blackmails Congress into giving endless money to snoop and hire liars at wages far higher than we pay teachers and artists and without Civil Service rules. The FBI gathers gossip, tittle-tattle guesses, and lies, in secret dossiers which scare the bravest. It can detect in hours treason against Big Business but is unable to discover the Ku-Klux-Klan in years. I face the Dulles brothers Spy Ring and Investment Trust backed by army, navy and airforce, with almost unlimited money and little accounting, supported by a monopolized press with scientific lying called advertising and legal stealing hailed as Free Enterprise.

"All this is frightening and I am far from serene, but somehow I cannot believe that the United States of America, once the greatest democracy on earty, will forever remain stupid enough to bow to this unreason."

I happened here to look across the table and saw stark Fear. It lay behind the eyes of the Man who was always Silent. I suddenly realized why he was silent: he was afraid, for his wife, his child, his job; for his own soul, now lost, which once dared poetry, satire and sketched cartoons; he was afraid for me. Yet he said no word and I made no reply. I continued to talk.

"The nation may awake this Fall. It may not. If not, we fail and try again -- What?"

I'm not sure who spoke - it might have been me - or even Friend Wife:

"You are a definition of a Fool? Now, now, Good Folk, let's not get personal; this dinner was much too good."

Friend wife smiled and herded upstairs for coffee.

THE THEORY OF HUNGARY or
THE SAGA OF HUNGARY

c. 1956

THE THEORY OF HUNGARY

By W. E. B. Du Bois

I have been in Hungary twice, in 1893 and 1936. From these brief glimpses, and from reading and listening, I have evolved a theory of Hungarian history. It is not completely accurate, for many data are missing, but I believe in the main it is true.

Once upon a time some fifteen centuries ago, there rushed out of the teeming East a hungry horde of Huns. Some drove west under Attila and sacked Rome. Other tribes called Magyars settled in the valley of the Danube. After 500 years one of their chiefs became a Roman Catholic and as Stephen became first king of Hungary.

Hungary became a feudal country with magnates and bishops holding vast tracts of land. Four-fifths of its inhabitants were serfs.

Over the West out of Constantinople swept a Renaissance of Learning; over Hungary dropped 150 years of that Turkish tyranny which the Eastern Roman Empire long resisted. A crusade against the Turks turned into a revolt against the Church; and Dozsa, a lesser noble, led the peasants in resistance. He was beaten and roasted on a red-hot throne and his peasant followers made to eat his flesh. As punishment, a new code said: "All peasants have lost their liberty.... They are placed under eternal servitude to their landlords." The Protestant Reformation which aroused West Europe passed most of Hungary by and in its stead came the reaction of the Catholic Counter-Reformation. There was now added to Slavic Hungary a new element, the Germans. The Hapsburgs came in 1526, and Hungary for two centuries was the seat of continuous battle between German and Slav, Turk and Emperor, magnate and noble, with serfs trodden underneath and almost forgotten.

As western Europe struggled to escape feudal serfdom, Hungary, tied by land entail and grants of estates and privileges, was keeping the noses of peasants in the rich mud of the great Hungarian plain.

For three centuries, revolt shook Hungary, but it differed from the type of revolt in England and France. It was in essence the attempt of the middle class to wrest recognition from the magnates and to enjoy their privileges and their right to exploit the labor of the peasants. These lesser nobles, small landholders, professional men and employers called themselves the "Commons." They sat in the Hungarian House of Commons, but never regarded themselves as leaders of the peasants or laborers, but rather as rightful heirs of the Magnates. The Austrians spoke French and German; the lesser nobles spoke Latin while up to 1830, Hungarian was spoken only by peasants and not even taught in the schools.

The same pattern of strife kept recurring: a small but powerful group of magnates forming about five percent of the population and owning 85 percent of the land; a large group of lesser nobles, numbering a million and a half in the eighteenth century, posing as "the Commons. The lesser nobility formed in Hungary a much larger class than in neighboring states; Austria had one noble to every 300 inhabitants; Poland had one to every 68; but Hungary had one to every 20. These nobles sought the privileges of the magnates and exploited the mass of peasants and laborers, who were poverty-stricken, illiterate, and diseased.

The magnates struggled to keep from being overwhelmed by the mass of their slavic fellow subjects, and the Hapsburg monarchy helped them. The nobles fought the magnates and tried to form a slavic state separate from Austria; but usually they fought to take over the land and privileges of the magnates and seldom to enfranchise the peasants or to distribute monopolized land.

In fine during all these centuries of struggle, the mass of Hungarian peasants and workers had little leadership. At best the lesser nobles had used them to wrest privileges for themselves from the magnates; some without doubt pitied the peasants but few were their real leaders.

As late as 1896, after three centuries of strife, a peasant leader thus painted the plight of the Hungarian peasant:

"Come with me in the Spring and hoe for sixteen hours for twelve cents a day; eat dry bread and rotten bacon, sleep in a hole dug with his own hoe for six hours.

We work even longer in summer. On the putzsas four families, 20 to 25 people, live in one room. I have seen men collapsing on the street from starvation. Such things are not exactly calculated to make one enthusiastic about the Fatherland. Do our lords think we shall starve to death without a word?"

During the twentieth century peasants and workers writhed; 150,000 of them fled to America to become the worst exploited labor of the coal and iron mines. In 1905 and 1906, one hundred thousand serfs and laborers struck. The landlords invoked martial law, set soldiers to work on the farms, and tried to import Chinese coolies.

A nephew of the Austrian Emperor killed in Yugoslavia, started the First World War. Two million Hungarians were mobilized and driven to the front by Austrian and German troops. The victorious Allies made their treaty of peace. Hungary lost 72 percent of her territory and 64 percent of her inhabitants.

With peace came revolution in Hungary. The whole organization of the country had collapsed and Count Karolyi, a great magnate, proclaimed a republic. Of Hungary's nine million population, half were peasants and three million of these landless. Predominantly agricultural, it was still semi-feudal. Landholding classes struggled to retain control. Karolyi said: "Only under the Russian shield can a Slavonic Europe feel safe." He wanted to reconstruct Hungary on a basis of ties to Slavs, replacing oligarchy with a federation of Slavic nationalities.

With the depression, came distress to Hungary. Millions in money were stolen; mayors of seventeen cities were convicted of theft. The Hungarian nobility joined Hitler, whom the Austrian monarchy had spawned and Hitler annexed Austria to Germany.

Meantime the revolution in Russia had established a socialist state despite the redoubled efforts of the Western world. This threat to capitalism called for renewed attempts to overthrow the Soviet Union. The consultations at Locarno in 1925, included plans for a mass attack on the Soviet Union. By 1928 this crystallized at a Paris meeting, where France, Germany, and Britain adopted a plan of attack, financed by the great Trusts. The financial collapse of the capitalist world in 1929, postponed this and Japan started war in the East in 1931.

Disturbance spread over Europe as in Germany Hitler rose to power: Soviet pfficials were assassinated in foreign embassies; Trotsky in exile was in the pay of Hitler and began world-wide propaganda against the Soviet Union; the premier of Rumania was killed; the Croix de Feu began its Fascist activity in Paris; revolts inspired by Fascists broke out in Baltic and Balkan states and in the Ukraine; Nazi terrorists were active in Poland and Austria and in France the King of Yugoslavia and the French foreign minister were assassinated. Hitler became master of Germany in 1933 and marched straight to war. In 1935, Italy invaded Ethiopia; in 1938, Hitler seized Austria; in 1939 he invaded Czechoslakia and Poland, and in 1940, Norway, Denmark, Holland, and Belgium. In 1940 Italy attacked France and Greece.

In a Europe seething with unrest, Karolyi began his reforms in Hungary by dividing his own huge estates. The magnates and nobles allowed Russian communism to take over the government so as to bring aid from the Allies. Karolyi resigned and the Hungarian Soviet Republic was born under Bela Kun and lasted four months. Hungarian nobles with Rumanian soldiers and western allied help drove out the Communist regime before it could start. Budapest was taken by the Rumanians and in 1920, Horthy, an admiral without a fleet, headed a kingless kingdom in Hungary from 1919 to 1944. He was backed by the Hungarian nobility, 980 of whom owned a third of Hungary. The White Terror began, Jews were tortured and killed.

38-6-100

United States citizens bought nine million dollars worth of Horthy securities and had loaned other millions to private industry. Our businessmen were interested in Hungarian government railways and banks. Seventy million dollars of Hungarian loans were subscribed to in the United States and by 1935, some fifty-three million of these loans were in default. Count Karolyi said that if American bankers ceased to loan money to the Horthy regime, it would fall. Other countries were involved: Shell Oil of Britain and thread and jute interests, and Swiss, Dutch, and Swedish interests.

Meantime the great magnates and the Catholic hierarchy proposed to settle matters in Hungary by restoring the Hapsburgs and founding a powerful central federation of Catholic states. The young pretender Otto became of age in 1933. He was supported by the Pope and Mussolini and affianced to a daughter of the King of Italy. He visited the United States as a guest of Cardinal Spellman and met the President and J. Pierpont Morgan. Cardinal Mindszenty of Hungary was the official agent of this great change but the rise of Hitler halted his plans. When Hitler attacked Russia, Hungarian lords predicted that Russia would be conquered in six weeks. War was declared against Russia, the Allies, and the United States. Land and factory workers were shipped East to fight for Hitler and Horthy.

When, however, in 1943 Stalingrad was liberated and the Russian armies began to advance West, Horthy fled. Soviet troops occupied Hungary and a provisional national government was set up in 1946, representing all parties including the Communist.

The new Socialist Hungarian government started on land reform. Since 12,000 landholders owned more than half the land, the government proposed that one-third of the agricultural land be given to 642,999 peasants, most of them landless or with plots too small for profitable cultivation.

Hungarian socialism started under severe handicaps: it lacked trained and experienced leadership; many of its leaders were still misled by the age-old desire to supplant the magnates and with no vision of the rise of the peasants and laborers; some wanted to exploit labor in the name of socialism; the Jewish element was suppressed and Austria, the West, and the Catholic church were warning against the Soviet Union and its designs.

Hungary became a socialist nation. The Land Reform Act of 1945 was "by far the greatest and most dramatic change in East Europe at the time." It involved 8 million acres or 35 percent of Hungary. Of this 60 percent went to peasants; 26 percent became state forest preserves; 11,000 acres were given to hospitals, rest homes, and schools. In all 3,500,000 people were given land. In 1946, the largest industries and the large banks were placed under state control. There was much opposition but the Communist Party gradually gained and now turned to socialism in Education, small businesses and agriculture. Against the bitter opposition of the Church, the state took over the schools in 1948, with compensation for property losses to the Church. A three-year plan to balance industry was adopted in 1947. This plan raised the Hungarian standard of living higher than ever before in history; industrial production in 1950 as compared with 1938 was doubled. Agricultural production recovered from the post-war depression.

The opposition to this advance of socialism increased within and outside Hungary. The United States determined on the "containment" of further socialist development. The Marshall plan of 1947 combined subsidy for capitalists and boycott of socialist nations. The North Atlantic military pact was formed in 1949, and in 1946, Truman started his great spy system, the Central Intelligence Agency, with "unlimited authorith to spend virtually unlimited amounts of money for wholly unlimited purposes." It spent over a billion dollars a year and hired a hundred thousand people.

38-6-101

Meantime the United States gave the Hungarian magnates, the lesser nobles and the Catholic Church every reason to expect its active interference to change their government by arms and soldiers. Eisenhower and Dulles had promised active "liberation" in their campaign speeches. Leaders of rich corporations who had investments in Hungary and had lost them started a wide campaign of propaganda on Hungarian soil, and boasted of results. A well-known German spy organization placed its facilities at the disposal of the United States. In 1951 Congress appropriated $100,000,000 for the "liberation of the eastern nations of Europe" -- an act which the Soviet Union called "without precedent in the relations among states" and a "crass intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of other countries."

In the United States a "Crusade for Freedom" was started and received from public gifts at least $60 million. Standard Oil, Ford Motors, and United States Steel were among the contributors. Other organizations were formed and in conjunction with the Government, they dropped, 1954 to 1956, on eastern Europe from West Germany, 500 million leaflets, four and a half million balloons, and in addition twelve million newspapers a month. They maintained fourteen newspaper bureaus from Stockholm to Athens and twenty-nine radio stations. An organ of the U. S. Chamber of Commerce says:

"No government official will admit it, but we are training men to be spies, saboteurs, specialists in the tougher forms of psychological warfare...they learn to blow up bridges, railroad trains and war plants, are taught to use all types of weapons, both U. S. and foreign... They learn secret methods of communication so they can get back what they learn. They merge into hostile populations and spread disquieting rumors, help to frame Russian stooges so that their own superiors will lose confidence in them."

The opposition of the Catholic hierarchy was bitter. In October, Cardinal Mindszenty refused to recognize the republic. He resisted land reform and state education. He declared that Darwin ought to have been burned at the stake.

The advance toward socialism in Hungary continued. The death rate was cut in half. A five-year plan of economic development was adopted. Illiteracy was drastically reduced. There were 60 percent of the children in school in 1938; in 1955 nearly 100 percent were in school a minimum of eight years. The 26,000 teachers rose to 40,000. Capital invested in housing, schools, health and welfare increased from 1165 million florints in 1950 to 2597 in 1952. At the same time the increased arming of the West, the devastation of Greece, the Korean War and the hundreds of American military bases induced Hungary to raise her military expenditure from 4 percent of her income in 1947-48 to 36 percent in 1952. From mass unemployment in 1930, the production of goods had doubled by 1955.

This rapid social change brought dissatisfaction, exacerbated by foreign propaganda. The peasants resisted as peasants did in France and Russia, being fundamentally capitalists and not socialists. The workers, tired of sacrificing to large industry, demanded more housing and consumer's goods. The ruling Party leaders were not as good or experienced as those in the Soviet Union and tried force rather than persuasion; they suffered in public esteem because many were Jews. Yet they yielded to rising public opposition and readjustment began. Rakosi, builder of Hungarian socialism, who had been jailed and tortured, and was now old and ill, resigned and admitted his mistakes. Reform was so evident that the Western world was pushed to renewed effort to overthrow socialism in Hungary. Not only from without came pressure, but within appeared efforts to displace socialism by separatism. Writers and students made demands; none of these repudiated the fundamental socialism. But here the outside influences got to work. On October 23, came the clash. A socialist meeting of 200,000 insisted on a "socialist democracy" and not a "bourgeois democracy." Now, later at night, came evidence of disciplined disorder, anti-semitism, and force. Armed groups suddenly appeared and seized public places. The armed uprising was at hand and in vain the Party leaders and even the church appealed for peace and reason.

What happened in Hungary in October, 1956? Some Hungarians say: "The Horthy and gendarme officers who had long bided their time on our western frontiers had become very active.... gangs of criminals, released from jail,.... helped the counter-revolutionaries in their intentions... well organized armed bands brutally murdered hundreds of Communists, ordinary workers, peasants, intellectuals and progressives who fell into their hands." The leaders called in Soviet troops to save Socialism. War and offers to surrender socialism appeared. The West went mad, They demanded all. The United States and the Soviet Union took stands. Eisenhower gave Hungarian revolt $20 million while the Soviet Union offered to withdraw troops from Budapest on condition that external forces do not interfere in Hungary. But Nagy, the socialist leader, surrendered. He gave up the demand for socialism. He released Mindszenty and the Cardinal immediately asserted his headship of Hungary. White Terror burst again in Budapest. The Catholics demanded the abolition of land reform and state education. Mindszenty demanded restoration of private property and repelled the socialist party leaders who were surrendering almost all.

The Soviet Union faced a perfect dilemma: if it kept hands off, the great magnates, the small landholders, professional men and employers; the investors using American funds and a large number of white-collar workers and Jew-baiters armed by American money and backed by the Catholic Church, would easily have overthrown the Hungarian government then in power. That government, as inefficient and inexperienced as it may have been, without a shadow of doubt represented the overwhelming mass of the Hungarian masses, long voiceless, ignorant, poverty stricken, and diseased. If before such an onslaught Hungary fell to Fascism, then all that terrific effort which had just overthrown Hitler would have been in vain; all of that struggle for socialism which lasted from 1917 to 1945, against the most powerful nations of the world, would have gone down the drain. The Third World War would have begun. It was the Crisis of the Twentieth Century. To the glory of the future of mankind, the Soviet Union rose to the occasion and won for Hungary, freedom to build socialism in its own time and in its own way.

Who was it that fled from "oppression"? First was a magnate who owned a hundred thousand acres. Second was Mindszenty who issued proclamations from the American embassy. Of the near 200,000 refugees who poured into Austria, a high authority told an American official that 70,000 were "criminals and adventurers" and less than 35,000 "freedom fighters."

The "freedom" they wanted was, as their pictures clearly indicated, freedom for exploitation of the mass of peasants and workers; freedom to spend money and enjoy life and freedom from any compulsion to sacrifice for the good of mankind.

As western Europe began to escape feudal serfdom, Hungary, by land entail and grants of estates and privileges was keeping the noses of peasants in the rich mud of the great Hungarian plain. In the miserable villages built on nobles' soil, the idlers loafed and got drunk. European peasants were bad off, but Hungarian peasants were miserable.

Hungary found Germany a counter-weight to the masses of her Slavonic subjects. Without help of the Germans, the Hungarian lords could not have maintained their feudal rule.

Hungary therefore fought on two fronts, against the Turks and the Hapsburgs, but victories over the Hapsburgs were victories for Hungarian feudalism, not for peasants. They took place three times, and on each occasion the big landlords gained some special privileges in exchange for concessions to the throne.

In ~~1787~~ 1687, the Hungarian Crown was made hereditary in the male line of the Hapsburgs and the privileges of fidei commissa was granted the Magyar peers, which gave a landholder power over the distribution of his estate even after his death.

In 1723 the Hapsburg succession was extended to the female line and the right of entail extended.

Without help of the Austrians, the Hungarian lords could not have maintained their feudal rule. Hungary thus found Germans a counter-weight to the masses of her Slavonic subjects.

In the seventeenth century came the revolt under the Rakoczys which lasted from 1600 to 1711, ranged Hungary against the Hapsburgs and led to separation. But Austria triumphed in 1711 and the last Rakoczy fled to Turkey and died.

During the eighteenth century great lords formed 5 percent of the population and owned 85 percent of land. Ninety-nine percent of Hungarian people owned two percent of Hungary. The privileged castes increased. In Austria there was one noble to every 300 people; in Poland one to every 68; but in Hungary one to every 20.

Magnates and nobles were not taxed, and the lords had a monopoly of industry. Sheep began to replace men.

The French Revolution hastened Hungarian nationalism as did the reforms of Maria Theresa and her son. The Hungarian nobles, however, halted many of these reforms, and the Hapsburg power increased after the Napoleonic wars.

41-2-106

In 1848, liberalism and Marxism swept over Europe, but the class struggle materialized only partially in Hungary. Moderate nobles under Szechenyi aimed at development along western lines. Radical nobles under Louis Kossuth sought independence from the Hapsburgs.

Szechenyi said: "Nine million serfs and soldiers bear all our burdens." Both he and Kossuth were called "reds" and their books burned.

The nobles yielded and the Hapsburgs assented. An independent government was formed including Kossuth. All the ministers were nobles and it had no army. The Hapsburgs used the nobles against the serfs and the nationalities against each other. Emperor Ferdinand abdicated and Francis Joseph succeeded. He called in the Czar and the serfs died by hundreds of thousands; thirteen generals were executed, ten thousand soldiers hanged. Russian and Austrian armies ravaged Hungary. ~~Kossuth went to England and America for help.~~

In 1859 a poet led the fight for a federation of Serbs, Rumanians, Hungarians, and Slovaks. The magnates stole the revolution with a cry for "liberty" for the nobles, while Emperor and Czar crushed the peasants. The emperor's brother tried to set up a kingdom in Mexico during our Civil War, but Juarez and Lincoln balked the plan.

In 1896, a land worker accused of stirring up revolt said: "Come with me in the Spring and hoe for sixteen hours for twelve cents a day; eat dry bread and rotten bacon, sleep in a hole dug with his own hoe for six hours. We work even longer in summer. On the putzsas four families, 20 to 25 people living in one room. I have seen men collapsing on the street from starvation. Such things are not exactly calculated to make one enthusiastic about the Fatherland. Do our lords think we shall starve to death without a word?" ~~Six out of ten babies died before the first year.~~

The Dual Monarchy of Austria and Hungary in 1867 after the victory of Prussia was an alliance between Germans and Hungarian nobility which ranged Hungary against the Allies in the First and Second World Wars. During the twentieth century peasants and workers writhed; 150,000 of them fled to America to become the worst exploited labor of the coal and iron mines. In 1905 and 1906, one hundred thousand serfs and laborers struck in Hungary. The landlords invoked martial law, set soldiers to work on the farms and tried to import Chinese coolies.

A nephew of the Austrian Emperor was killed in Yugoslavia and this started the First World War. Two million Hungarians were mobilized and driven to the front by Austrian and German troops.

41-2-168

With peace came revolution in Hungary. The whole organization of the country had collapsed and Count Karolyi proclaimed a republic. Of Hungary's nine million population, half were peasants and three million of these landless. Predominantly agricultural, it was still semi-feudal. Landholding classes struggled to retain control. Karolyi said: "Only under the Russian shield can a Slavonic Europe feel safe." He wanted to reconstruct Hungary on a basis of ties to Slavs, replacing oligarchy with a federation of Slavic nationalities.

(see p. 4)

Karolyi began with land reform and divided his own huge estates. The nobles, incensed, denounced Karolyi and conspired to allow the Communists to take charge of the government in order to secure the sympathy of the Allies.

~~In March~~, Karolyi resigned and the Hungarian Soviet Republic was born under Bela Kun and lasted four months. Hungarian nobles with Rumanian soldiers and western allied help drove out the Communist regime before it could start. The foreign invaders damaged property and removed tools. Budapest was taken by the Rumanians and ~~in 1920~~, Horthy, an admiral without a fleet, headed a kingless kingdom in Hungary from 1919 to 1944. He was backed by the Hungarian nobility, 980 of whom owned a third of Hungary. The White Terror began, Jews were tortured and killed. The Hapsburgs twice tried to return but Horthy stopped them.

Meanwhile on June 20, the victorious Allies made their treaty of peace. Hungary lost 72 percent of her territory and 64 percent of her inhabitants.

In September, 1921, Hungary was admitted to the League of Nations.

With the depression, came distress to Hungary. Millions in money were stolen; mayors of seventeen cities were convicted of theft. The Hungarian nobility joined Hitler, whom the Austrian monarchy had spawned and Hitler annexed Austria to Germany. Attempts were made to form a Federation of Catholic states under the Hapsburgs.

Meantime, a conspiracy to restore the Hapsburgs was started. The heir Otto became of age in 1930 and was proclaimed legal pretender to the throne of Austria, Hungary and other places. He was supported by Mussolini and the Pope and was affianced to a daughter of the King of Italy.

In Hungary the Horthy prime ministers doubled the military police, destroyed newspaper plants, and burned books.

The landed aristocracy, consisting largely of second and third generation Austrians, thought Hungary should provide them with bread and butter. Systematic anti-Semitism was organized, and the "Numerus Clausus" kept Jews out of universities.

In Hungary, 2,242 persons owned more land than the other four million. The Horthy regime opposed land reform, and the Social-Democratic Party was not allowed any activities among the four million landless farm laborers.

Hereditary xxx and class distinctions persisted. Great landholders paid less tax than the small landholders per acre, and the workers in factory and on the land paid proportionately 22 percent more tax than the rich. Only 25 percent of the rural population had a right to vote. Those voting against the government were liable to punishment.

Always in Hungarian history this division into three classes instead of two must be kept in mind: the Hungarian parliament had houses of nobles and commons; but the Nobles were great magnates and the commons were lesser nobles. The mass of laborers and serfs were not represented~~xxxxxxxx~~. Until 1830 the aristocracy spoke Latin, following the Church. Only the peasants spoke Hungarian and Hungarian was not taught in the schools.

Horthy consorted with the Axis. Hungary joined the anti-Comintern and resigned from the League of Nations. Jews were eliminated from political and economic life. Hungarian troops followed the Germans in invading Yugoslavia.

Then Hitler attacked Russia. Hungarian lords predicted that Russia would be conquered in six weeks. They talked about Bolshevik bestiality and the "Christian" crusade of Hitler. War was declared against Russia, the Allies, and the United States. Land and factory workers were shipped East to fight for Hitler and Horthy.

When, however, in 1943, the Russian armies began to advance West, Horthy fled. Soviet troops occupied Hungary and a provisional national government was set up in 1946, representing all parties including Communist.

In 1946, the new Hungarian government started on land reform. Since 12,000 landholders owned more than half the land, the government proposed that one-third of the agricultural land be given to 642,000 peasants, most of them landless or owners of tiny plots. This land reform would have stripped the Catholic Church of much of its property, ~~xxxxxxx~~ as it owned 1,128,000 acres of the best land and was the largest landholder in the country. The Church fought this distribution of land with all its power and fought for compulsory Catholic education. Catholic judges refused to implement the law.

When Hitler fell, the United States agreed with the Vatican ~~primacy~~ policy of prompt restoration of the Hapsburg monarchy in a joint Vatican-American fight against Soviet Russia. Conditions were favorable in Hungary, where a Catholic Cardinal Primate was ~~ex~~ legally vested with feudal privileges, and appointed directly by the Pope. Because of his power to crown the Hungarian kings, he stood second only to the king himself.

Joseph Pehm, known as Joseph Mindszenty, had joined the Hapsburg movement ~~and in 1924,~~ was made Cardinal. He refused to recognise the Hungarian republic, and made contacts with Hungarian Royalists abroad, working through the American legation at Budapest. He informed American intelligence of his plans, claiming his right to become head of the Hungarian state, from which position he could restore the Hapsburgs. Otto had visited the United States before the Second World War. He was received by President Roosevelt, visited Cardinal Spellman, and talked with J. Pierpont Morgan.

After the World War, Mindszenty wrote to President Truman asking for military intervention to put an end to the Hungarian republic. He then came to the United States as guest of Cardinal Spellman. ~~He made acquaintance with oldy monarchists like Tibor Eckhardt.~~ He met the ex-Empress Zita ~~in Ottowa~~ and Otto ~~in Chicago~~. He brought back a list of ministers for the restored Hapsburg monarchy.

Otto, Zita, Spellman and Mindszenty worked out detailed plans on the assumption that the United States would intervene at the right moment. Mindszenty authorized Otto to represent Catholic Hungary in America despite the fact that there was a Hungarian minister in Washington. Mindszenty worked with Prince Paul of Esterhazy, one of the richest men in Hungary, representing the monarchists. The American Department of State co-operated.

For a long time, the Hungarian government avoided arresting Mr Mindszenty, but it acted in November, 1948. The Cardinal was charged with treasonable conspiracy, and sentenced to life imprisonment. Arch-bishop Grosz replaced Mindszenty and was arrested in 1951 and sent to jail for fifteen years.

In 1951 Congress amended the Mutual Security Act so as to use $100,000,000 "for any persons residing in or escaping from Hungary" or other Communist countries, in order to form them into military forces "to move in the direction of the eventual liberation of the eastern nations of Europe." The Soviet Union called this act "without precedent in the relations among states" and a "crass intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of other countries."

Senator Mansfield says that in addition to this the Central Intelligence Agency of the federal government was spending over $500,000,000 a year and employing eight to thirty thousand people. Time reports that the CIA is "engaged in a wide range of covert activities, espionage, aid to resistance movements and perhaps sabotage."

In the campaign of 1956, Dulles promised that if the Republicans won they would stir up resistance movements behind the Iron Curtain. Eisenhower emphasized to the American Legion in New York.

What happened in Hungary in October, 1957? Hungarians say: "The Horthy and gendarme officers who had long bided their time on our western frontiers had become very active...gangs of criminals, released from jail...helped the counter-revolutionarie in their intentions...well organized armed bands brutally murdered hundreds of Communists, ordinary workers, peasants, intellectuals and progressives who fell into their hands."

There was revolt in Hungary as there had been for a thousand years but it was not the simple revolt of oppressed against oppressor. In the Fall of 1956 Fascists fought against Communists, Jews fought against Fascists; magnates fought against nobles; nobles divided between leading serfs and laborers and joining magnates; the Catholic Church fought for magnates against peasants. It was a phantasmagoria of confusion.

The defeated fled across the border: among the first was a magnate who owned 100,000 acres of land; Mindszenty took refuge with the United States. Into Austria poured 170,000 refugees, among whom were 35,000 "criminals and adventurers" as the President of the Save the Children Federation testified. Less than 35,000 were real "freedom fighters" and the freedom they sought was freedom from hunger and disease.

What was the duty of the Soviet Union? It hesitated. At long last this first ~~Communist~~ Socialist state had reached a phase where, secure from attack from abroad, it was able to support in comfort, although not in luxury, its growing population, with its children in school and its youth in college or learning a trade. Now at last the sterner discipline of its dictatorship could be loosened and that freedom of thought and taste which foreign aggression had held back for fifty years, could give place to new criticism and experiment. At this moment reaction led by the United States burst in Hungary.

As Shepilov said: "The victory of reaction in Hungary would have created a fascist state in the center of Europe which would have become a springboard for the international reactionary forces ~~and to take revenge on a European scale.~~"

Thereupon the Soviet Union in defense of socialism in Europe and Asia put down the Hungarian revolt and again the Hungarians reel forward. They have never had such trained, devoted, and self-sacrificing leadership as served the Soviet Union. They may yet achieve it.

Health was greatly, crime reduced, widespread flowering, agriculture progress and homes built 1952

AN APPEAL AND PLAN FOR A REVIVAL OF THE PEOPLE'S PARTY OF 1892.

1956 is the year of opportunity. Never since 1860 has there been such a need for a new party,- such cause for discontent and alarm. The paramount issue of today is the anti-communist drive, which, based on wholly fictitious assumptions, is aiming to destroy democracy both at home and everywhere else in the world.

This drive is based on the assumption that Russia plans military conquest of the entire world. Yet the Russian leaders have absolutely no motive for such a move, because they are on salary and all they could gain by foreign conquest would be higher wages. But where would such wages come from if their own and the conquered country had been destroyed by nuclear bombs? Moreover, the Russians are confident that a demonstration of their economic superiority through actual results will win the world to their ideas without war. CAN WE TRUST OUR DESTINY TO LEADERS WHO BELIEVE THE ANTI-COMMUNIST PROPAGANDA?

Yet on such absurdities as Russian military aggression is based the cold war, the expenditure of scores of billions of dollars and the ~~disrobe~~ attack on our liberties at home.

Again, Soviet Russia has never started a war or seized territory except in self-defense. It attacked Poland in 1939 to secure defensive territory without which Leningrad would have fallen to Hitler in 1941, and which the Finns had refused to sell. In 1939 it took from Poland practically only the territory east of the Curzon line, which had been granted to it by the Treaty of Versailles but which Poland had seized by war. Russia controls its western neighbors because before World War II the capitalist nations had taken control of them in order to attack Russia. Esthonia, Larvia, and Lithuania were seized as a defensive measure and because they had once been part of Russia. The Kurile Islands were taken as a prize of war and because they had once belomged to Russia.

As to China being an aggressor nation, it entered the Korean war only after extreme provocations, including threats to deprive her industries of the use of the Yalu dams.

At home, Anti-Communism is being used to crush liberal leaders and organizations by establishing precedents for transforming the United States into a Fascist dictatorship.

Abroad, under the banner of Anti-communism, the United States has become the best friend of Fascism and the most dangsrous enemy of democracy on earth. In Latin-American ~~countries~~ it has consistently promoted dictatorships and overthrown democracies, notably in Guatemala, where it backed the destruction of an agragrian democracy. It forced on Greece a Fascism as bad as Hitler's at a cost of $2,000,000,000. to American taxpayers, and it has helped Franco to keep his hated hold on Spain, while punishing loyal Americans for opposing him.

The entire world is looking to the American voters to free them from the exploitations of the United States.

Anti-communism has fastened upon the American youth UMT in its most vicious form, namely, conscription for foreign wars.

In addition to its anti-communist drive Special Privilege is making a gigantic raid on the public savings and the public welfare by intensified profiteering, by scandalous depletion of the U.S.treasury through tax write-offs, by a systematic drive to liquidate the small-farm industry, and by withholding appropriations for preventing forest fires, fllods, and food contamination, and for providing essential education.

But the supreme issue and menace today is the fact that so many party leaders and Presidential possibilities openly advocate nuclear war, and that both Democrats and Republicans joined in giving President Eisenhower the sole decision as to whether to drop stom bomba on China.

These bi-partisan leaders have influenced the American people to surrender the right to decide whether and when a nuclear war should be launched and whether our boys should be conscripted, ostensibly to combat Communism but actually to promote commercial exploiting interests in avoidable wars in Indo-China, Korea, or elsewhere.

The great abuses of today stem from Special Privilege through its control of both major parties. To correct them it would be necessary to seize control of one of those parties or to form a new party. Since the party control by Special Privilege comes from its wealth it would be madness for the poorly financed liberals to try to wrest control of either old party. Moreover, because of party loyalties and party antagonisms, it would be impossible to gather all the liberals into either old party. Hence the only hope of reform is to gather the full liberal strength into a new party, controlled by leaders who too altruistic to be bought and too courageous to be frightened.

No third party in American Hostory has been a failure when it had a really fundamental issue. The Anri-slavery parties brought about the Republican Party and the Prohibition Party goaded the politicians into giving the nation Prohibition before it was ready for it. The People's Party alarmed the Dempcratic Party into decl-ring for Free Silver before the country had been educated up to it. The LaFollette Party and the Progressive Party were flashes in the pan because their demands were not fundamental enough.

The issues outlined above would give a new party vitality enough tp persist until it achieved its aims.

Since there would be a bewildering divergence of views as to the exact nature of the new party, the most practical way of uniting all liberals would be to resurrect the People's Party.

Both logic and historical continuity suggest such a course, because that Party was winning the nation wihtout outstanding leadership until basely betrayed by Bryan in 1900, and because it stool for such fundamental ~~principles~~* issues.

The following would be the logical steps toward launching the new party in 1956:

I. THE PLATFORM.

(1) Peace. Since every war in History has been an effort to extend or to resist exploitation, the only hope of peace is to rid the world of the means of exploitation. This, we pledge our party to do as rapidly and as thoroughtly as consistent with sound economic principles.

(2) We pledge Government ownership and control of the Federal Reserve Bank and Government issuance of all money and control of credit.

(3) The immediate repeal of all cold-war legislation and the immediate release of Morton Sobell and all other prisoners* cold-war prisoners.
(4) Small Government banks where requested by the community.
(5) Progressive lowering of interest rates.
(6) Free and unlimited coinage of silver at 16 to 1.
(7) Government ownership and control of all publicutilities and monopolies.
(8) All revenue to be raised by graduated income tax and excise taxes on luxuries.
(9) Socialized medicine such as has proved so satisfactory in Britain.
(10) Negroes to be protected by Federal intervention when necessary.
(11) Immediate repeal of the Hartley* Taft-Hartley Act.
(12) The question of Parity to be left to a vote of the farmers.
(13) Preventable floods to be declared a form of murder and preventive measures to be taken accordingly.
(14) Forest fires can and must be prevented by dousing from airplanes.
(15) Appriate sufficent funds to abolish gangsterism.
(16) make election day a legal holiday.
(17) Lunatic asylum for all who advocate nuclear war.

II. ORGANIZATION.

The party can be organized by a volunteer Executive Committee, which should organize a National Committee by corresponding with
(a) Leftist Labor Leaders;
(b) Leftist Farmer leaders;
(c) The Methodist and other church Federations for Social Action;
(d) The American Rally, if it is still functioning;
(e) Liberal Magazines;
(f) Liberal educators, writers, and leaders;

III. THE CAMPAIGN.

(a) Fuse, if possible, with the American Labor Party, and the American Rally in support of Senator Langer;
(b) Organize write-in campaign where too late to get on the official ballot;
(c) Orgainze clubs for 1958 and 1960, in communities, counties, districts, states, colleges, etc..
These clubs should study books like Empire of Oil, High Treason, etc., and hold discussions and arrange public meetings.
They could and should affiliate with similar clubs in Britain.

The People's Party #### was as American and as spontaneous as the Declaration of Independence and as free from foreign ideology. To revive it would be a forward step toward achieving those ideals.

Anf Nkrumah is a great man. One of the towering figures of the modern world. Let none doubt this. As a statesman, De Gaule, Churchill, Adenauer, and Dulles rank beneath him. As an administrator, his accomplishment in the years since he sat as a despised black prisoner of a haughty England to yesterday when he became the first president of independent Ghana has been almost unbelievable. A retinue of ancient haughty chiefs have been brought to heeel includung the great Asantahene of Ashanta, a knight of the British Empire whose fathers conquered British armise five times in their vain quest of the Golden Stool. Nkrumah has out maneuversed a group of university trained African leaders who tried in vain to use or drive away this low-born peasnt who in their ver y faces organized a basic democracy among illiterate peasants and laborers an built a nation under their eyes which triumphed today in peace and prosperoty; with new industry, new housing, a new harbor larger than the Hamburg which once berthed the ships of the world; with new housing, the beginning of art and literature based on literature and art -incredibly old; all this amid white Britons whose contempt turned into respect and admiration even as they found themselves displaced by black men in every walk of life, rulership, administration, beautiful homes, schools and social precedence. But more than this: queitly, with no advrtisement, and little comprehension Nkrumah has accomplishmed a transformation of political life whic has puzzled the world since democracy was reborn i the Nineteenth century. That which becam in Britain, near sacred monarchy with democratically chosen premiership; in France , a Presidency , vaugue and respectable but with little power and a prime minister uncertain of tenutre; in the United States , a Powerful president headed one way, a stubboern house of repesentatives headed another and a senate owned by Big Business, headed a thrid or headed nowhere -- all this contradiction which has killed Democracy in the western world, has been logiclly set at ease by Nkrumah of Ghana in his new Constitution of in which the Predidency and Prime minister are merged in one person. This is the greatest political feat of the Twentieth Century

39-12-43

But the great battle of Nkrhmah is that against the entrenched trade and industrial monopolies of the modenr world. Already in Ghana is the great Lever Brothers industrial empire uneder its various names of. It has a tremendous hold on all Africa; there are Swiss, Dutch and German companies with a vast retail trade and capital from the whole Western world, esoecially the United Stat Britain and West Germany is seeking profitable investment in Ghana. Against this Africa began to fight begrore Nkrumah came to the fore. The Gold Coast farmers begn cocoa raising and fought the plantation plans of the Cadburys. A nation-wide strike forced the international cocoa-buying consortium to yield to the British government during the Second World War and cocoa became a governmet monopily. The Government tried to cheat the farmers but the new Nkrumah regime made gocoa a socialist devel pment which it remains today. A vast plan to make the great Volta river a source of power for manufacture and lighting is now a matter of bargaining between Nkrumah and the investors. Britain thot it had the matter tied up and then America a made its bid; now to the horror of the Western world , the Soviet Union is offering capital and technical help with China in the background.. Nkrumah keeps his international friendships but also he keeps his hands free. He builds his socialist state. he has opeened diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union and hina and Khrshushev and he will exchamge visits soon.

34-12-44

Meantime comes the war in Congo; for War it is. The huge Belgian corpora with British and American capital whivh were making huge profit from coper unanium and a dozen otner materials in the Congo with cheap labor, little taxation and f ee land and materials ae not like to surrender tneir profit merely because political controll changes; they will "defnd" their local representatives by force of arms as long as possible; they will attempt to bribe native leaders as in the copper belt of Katanga and they will build their hopes on the United Nations if possible. But here Nkrumah outwitted t em He rushed Ghana troops into the Congo;he gave leadership to the Asian-African group in the Unitd Nation, while the Sovirt Union kept this from becoing a race war by offering aid of every kind to the Africans. Already the Western capitalists are in retrat but they are far from surrendering. They know that if Congo passes under African control, the day of white rule in Africa is done and black West Africa will face white South Africa for the final decision

C A 7

39-12-45

I sit and see these fatal days in Accra. Above the planes flying low and loud are rushing southeast to Congo. Here I sit in a curiously miraculous land: the vegetation becomes animal in its living manifestations; the tall trees sudenly bloom in marvellous color at the top; vines write and grow and crawl and live ; the grasses blossom. I am told that in ceratain parts, the earth yawns and climbs, and snows and unplumbed depths appear and talk to man. All things grow and speak to each other and to us; it ix to an incredible extent a livin land , a land of life where planta are animals and animals human and human beings rocks and deserts which never yield

KWAME NKRUMAH, A Word of Introduction

Since the convening of the Fifteenth General Assembly of the United Nations, there can be no doubt that Kwame Nkrumah is the Voice of Africa. That is that more nearly than any other living man he expresses the thought and the ideals of the dark continent and that this continent is stepping to the forefront in world affairs.

Africa in the second half of the Twentieth Century has attained unprecedented unity. In the ancient world, Africa was Nubia and Egypt. In the Greek era, Africa was Ethiopia on both sides of the Red Sea. In Roman times, Africa was Carthage and the North African hinterland. With the rise of Mohammedanism Africa became the Sudan and the center of power passed to the great black empires of the Mellestine, the Songhai and the Hausa, and their anteanaps. Then began the battle between West African culture and Sudan imperialism. African power and interest moved southward and eventually became the long march of the Bantus across the budding cultures of East Africa and over the realm of Zimbabwe and the rule of the Monomatapa. From here the use of iron spread to the world.

The slave trade to America disturbed and transformed the continent so that in the Nineteenth Century it seemed probable that the Negroes of the West Indies and the United States transplanted to a new world from their fatherland were destined to lead the Africans back into the world. Estevanico, Toussaint, Dessalines, Petion, Banneker and Douglass blased the way, but the industrial revolution reduced the whole dark world to the domination of Europe in the Nineteenth Century and in the Twentieth Century the fight between colonial empires for the loot of Africa and Asia tore the world apart, and lifted partially the veil over the submerged peoples of the world. There came a new stirring of old centers of culture and in Africa Kwame Nkrumah came to the fore.

He was a black West African peasant of the Akan tribe. He was born in the British colony of the Gold Coast, on the Gulf of Guinea, West Africa in 1912. He was raised in the cultural patterns of his tribe and thus could think, speak and act as an African. He was educated in his own family and clan and then briefly in mission schools and finally in the secondary Government school at Achimota. He came to the United States for his secondary training at Lincoln University and the University of Pennsylvania. Returning to Britain he studied at the University of London, [redacted].

I met him first in 1945 at the Fifth Pan-African Congress whose busy secretary he was. He was an earnest young man rather shabby in dress with few words and deep sincerity. After this Congress he tried to organize the growing number of African students in London and then was called to West Africa by the black intelligentsia to organize a popular movement. His employees eventually were dissatisfied with his work and tried to dismiss him, but he persisted, organized the young people, was persecuted, and jailed by the British but emerged as an elected member of the colonial parliament. He became leader of the largest popular party and last year he was elected President of the independent Republic of Ghana.

He has declared himself in his autobiography an evangelical Christian and a socialist. He started to build a state. He built roads and established schools and cared for the public health. He established a fine democratic government and in 1958 held andAll-Africa Congress which was in fact the Sixth Pan-African Congress to unite Africa. Gradually the world and Africa has begun to recognize Nkrumah's leadership. He stood beside Egypt against Britain and France and married an Egyptian woman. He took sides with Tunis and Morocco and defended Algeria. He has joined firm hands with Guinea. He was first to send troops to help the new Republic of Congo. He has refrained from joining either the capitalist or communist block but he recognizes the communist states and is willing to work with them in peace and progress. He would welcome China to the United Nations. He desires the help of capital from socialist countries or from private sources so long as there are no strings attached.

When yesterday he addressed the United Nations Assembly the world listened and the delegates rose en masse to cheer him. He has been consulted on this visit by the President of the United States, Prime Minister of Britain, the Soviet Union, Cuba, Egypt and India. Only the American Secretary of State has criticised him and this is to his credit.

These are the words of his address to the United Nations Assembly. Read them carefully and know what Africa demands today.

SYLVIA PANKHURST

by W. E. B. Du Bois

I heard of the Pankhurst family in 1911 when I was attending a Races Congress in London. It ought to have been and was in many respects a great occasion bringing together many men of eminence and representatives of nearly all the races of the world. But it was too near the First World War to have the effect it deserved.

But to be in London in the summer of 1911 was a great opportunity and one thing which attracted us all was the great fight for women's suffrage being carried on by Emmeline Pankhurst. She had been arrested on her way to the House of Commons with a petition. A few months later she was put in Holloway jail and again later she was arrested for assault. She undertook a lecture tour in America and on her return she and her daughter Sylvia led a window breaking campaign for women's suffrage. In March 1912 she was sentenced to nine months in prison and up to the opening of the war she was fighting and being arrested.

I never met her, but after the First World War when I became interested in the Pan African movement I called upon her daughter Sylvia to help me in various ways: to get a hearing before Parliament, to get publicity in England and to get acquainted with persons of influence. I realized then and later that the great work of Sylvia Pankhurst was to introduce black Ethiopia to white England, to give the martyred Emperor of Ethiopia a place of refuge during his exile and to make the British people realize that black folk had more and more to be recognized as human beings with the rights of women and men.

My personal acquaintance with Sylvia Pankhurst was not great. I met her briefly several times , talked and corresponded with her and she took me to the House of Commons. I read regularly her periodical and argued over various points in African progress.

I have heard of her death with great sorrow and I am sure that the people of Ethiopia realize how staunch and brave a friend they have lost.

JANE ADDAMS

by W. E. B. Du Bois

I knew Jane Addams. I have several times been a guest in Hull House, Chicago and I have joined Miss Addams as a speaker. Especially I remember once in Philadelphia where we talked to 5,000 people. I was at Hull House when Madame Breshovsky, sometimes called the mother of the Russian Revolution, was a guest, and when Miss Hull made a gracious gesture over the smoking of cigarettes.

Twice Jane Addams contributed to the Crisis of which I was editor for a quarter of a century. In January, 1911 she wrote:

"I always find it very difficult to write upon the great race problem which we have in America. I think, on the whole, that the most satisfactory books on the subject are written by people outside of America." This is certainly true of two books, "White Capital and Black Labor," by the Governor of Jamaica, and William Archer's book entitled "Afro-America." Although the latter is inconclusive, it at least gives one the impression that the man who has written it has seen clearly into the situation, and that, I suppose, is what it is very difficult for any American to do.

"One thing, however, is clear to all of us, that not only in the South, but everywhere in America, a strong race antagonism is asserting itself, which has various modes of lawless and insolent expression. The contemptuous attitude of the so-called superior race toward the inferior results in a social segregation of each race, and puts one race group thus segregated quite outside the influences of social control represented by the other. Those inherited resources of the race embodied in custom and kindly intercourse which make much more for social restraint than does legal enactment itself are thus made operative only upon the group which has inherited them, and the newer group which needs them most is practically left without. Thus in every large city we have a colony of colored people who have not been brought under social control, and a majority of the white people in the same community are tacitly endeavoring to keep from them those restraints which can be communicated only through social intercourse."

In November, 1912, she wrote again about the "Progressive Party and the Negro":

"By the simple device of appointing to federal offices colored men in the sections where there is no Republican party, these men elect themselves delegates to the national conventions and naturally repay their party by voting as their officeholding interests require. Certainly self-government is not being promoted by such political recognition on the part of the Republicans of the North any more than it is by the disenfranchising action on the part of the Democrats of the South. The Progressive convention took neither point of view and challenged at one and at the same time the traditional shibboleths of both parties.

41-3-160

"When I asked myself most searchingly whether my Abolitionist father would have remained in any political convention in which colored men had been treated slightingly, I recalled an incident of my girlhood which was illuminating and somewhat comforting. I had given my father an explanation of a stupid decision whereby I had succeeded in bungling the plans of a large family party, and I ended my apology with the honest statement that I had tried to act upon what I thought his judgment would have been. His expression of amused bewilderment changed to one of understanding as he replied: 'That probably accounts for your confusion of mind. You fell into the easy mistake of substituting loyalty and dependence upon another's judgment for the very best use of your own faculties. I should be sorry to think that you were always going to complicate moral situations, already sufficiently difficult, by trying to work out another's point of view. You will do much better if you look the situation fairly in the face with the best light you have.'"

I know too how Jane Addams suffered when she ventured to criticize the United States when she told how American generals got their soldiers drunk before sending them into battle. And how in other ways she showed Americans as war-mongering and nigger-hating. Yet the memory of this great social worker has not been forgotten. It survives still in America as symptom of pioneer work in social uplift.

FLORENCE

Probably no other one place in the world has so many things of beauty done by human hands as Florence; there is Giotto's tower; the masterpieces of Michael the Angel, from Dawn & Night to the frown of David; there is Brueleschi's dome and Botticelli's Love and Spring; Raphael8s women and Titian's Beauty; Murillo's virgins and Ruben's War; and hundred's of other bits ~~of Beauty~~ buildings & monuments

In a sense one can trace the history of man by following the mad climb of the sodden masses from dirt to glory; from seizure of land to theft of food and shelter; murder and maiming. with now the uplift of one armed monster, one cunning deceiver, a mass of related families, a clan of aristocracy or the fatl fall of a tribe. In various ways the human picture changes, rises and drops. But ever as far as man has reached today, the majotiy of human beings are poor, ignorant, sick and the majority climb on them to comfort wealth and happiness. Most men still say that this is inevitable, that only thus can civilization progress. The Western world, Britain, France and North America for the most part believe this. But the East of Europe, most of Asia and increasingly Africa say No. . The Mass must rise, the aristocracy must yield, civilization is measured by the progress of the people

THE PEACE MOVEMENT IN AMERICA

There is today no national Peace movement in the United States. There are many leading citizens who believe in peace as an ideal; indeed the majority of the people of the United States want peace and know the desperate cost of war In the nineteenth century America led in peace movements and in this century had several endowments for work for peace. But American business men made huge profits from furnishing arms, food and labor during the First World War and dominated the production and trade of the world during the next twenty years. When Roosevelt wished to save the British empire from Hitler and Mussolini, United States business organizations had to be bribed to cooperate because they feared Socialism. They refused to allow the United States to join the Soviet Union against Hitler until Hitler attacked Russia. Then joining the Soviet Union they permitted the United States to give tardy help, while the Soviet Union crushed the armies of the Fascists. All America then expected peace and cooperation with the Soviet Union. But Roosevelt died and the military leaders and Big Business interests united to crush Communism with the newly discovered Atom bomb. The Soviet Union did not receive the reparations for the costs of war which she had earned; the United States refused her the loans which they granted other nations and demanded repayment of her war loans to the Soviet Union.

Relations worsened from 1945 to 1949. Then a national Peace Movement was organized in the United States, called the National Council of Arts and Sciences. It was composed of the majority of the best known citizens in artistic and scientific circles, and they secured cooperation from the leading persons of the Soiet Union and the modern European world. Then the United States government, now controlled by military leaders and big Business interests which now monopolized the press. These powerful persons represented the Soviet leaders as criminal conspirators and our peace leaders as traitors to their country or deceived. They persuade foreign immigrants from Socialist nations to demonstrate in New York and pray in the streets. Many Americans withdrew their support for peace, and many foreign vititors , like Picasso and Bernal were refused visas. Our invited guests were not allowed to travel outside New York, or to speak publicly, and even Shostakovich was refused permission to give a concert at Yale University. The national Council of Arts and Sciences was forced in to bankruptcy and was dissolved This was our last national Peace Movement. Later I attended the great Peace Congress in Paris and the All Soviet Congress in Moscow. Returning to the United States, I read the Stockholm Appeal and led an organization to inform Americans of what the rest of the World was doing for peace. I and my fellow officials of this Peace Information Bureau were thereupon ordered by the government to register as "Agents of a foreign Power". We refused and were indicted. We were threatened with five years imprisonment and five thousand dollars fine. We appealed to the world. We colected $30,000 to pay the costs of our legal defense and finally secured not a verdict but simply a decision that our guilt was unproven . The case was therefor thrown out of court. Since then no peace movement has been formed. Even when I was granted the International Peace prize, no meeting could be organized for its pub presentation. There are advocates of peace in America but no open, organized mov movement, except the Communist Party, and that is illegal.

Americans are intelligent, good-hearted people. But for 16 years have been subject to a propaganda from a monopolized press which has used every method of science , literature and art to paint Communists as criminals and Commnunsm as a crime against Civilization. The average American today honestly believes Socialism and its aim, Communism as worse than war. They are therefo willing to train their youth for war and to spend more for past, present and future wars than for alleviating Poverty, curing ~~illne~~ diseases and training their children. The whole nation is frightened to death.

The only way to convince Americans that Communists want peace is to show them the high ideals and marvellous accomplishments of Communist nations. They must be converted by what they see and hear to a realization of the terrible mistake they are making.

A GLIMSE OF WESTERN EUROPE (1)

After a year in Communistic lands like the Soviet Union, China, East Germany and Czechoslovakia; and six months or more in nations, where socialism was widely practised and its further development not denied, like Sweden, Belgium, Holland and Ghana, I come for a month to that part of Europe where capitalism is still supreme in practice, despite a wide belief and even effort toward socialized life: that is, a week in Italy , a week in Switzerland, a week in Paris and one in London. These are nations which I have long known by visits, reading and study. In the last sixty-eight years I have visited them off and on and in this pregnant era of world history, I have known much of what they were thinking and doing. As a student I went through Italy from the lakes to Naples doing sights and galleries and seeing people; again in 1926, I glanced at the Italy of Mussolini; and now in 1960, I look down on the Forum, so strangely small and ragged, closed in by a raging , growing city; I stand in the Colloseum and am startled to think how few Romans could crowd in to view its sights. Somehow St. Peters looked tawdry, despite my memory of its world wide activity; I walked miles beside and beneath decorations that did not impress me until suddenly I came upon Michealangelo's ceiling, with God, angels, men and devils. I lingered long beneath this dim masterpiece of genius.

Florence is typical Italy; calm and quiet; the once mighty Arno, a dwindling stream, almost a brook; the Cathredral thought out in colored marble with a dome and Giotto's tower; and with the great works of Michaelangelo: Dawn, Night and David. Over all this dun-colored city, with its sense of beautiful line, was the sense of the impossibility of the mass of men; poverty, ignorance, and death was their end, and for this stood the Chrch with pity, alms, but no hope save death. After death rose the church to promise long rest. Built on this mass of men rose the Hero, the Well-born, the warrior, who supported the Artisan as he climbed toward Art. This alone lives today in georgeous perfection of form and color; but still the ignorant people, work, starve and die in war. There is a vast Rubens depicting the eternity of war, its murder, cruelty and filth; and for this Italy still stands. We ride by lovely vilas, tree-guarded, beflowered, silent and beautiful, often inhabited with starving aristocrats of the highest rank, or displacd by rich Americans. Tourists are the greatest industry of Florence and with then it comes gambling, guzzling, stuffing and bad manners, covered with gold. Whither is this quiet beauty of land and past going? What is its end and wish? I cannot guess, can Italy?

and dressed in Paris style

But Italy, obedient to the will of its longtime masters: Britain, France and Germany runs true to 19th century form and fears the Soviet Union despises China, ignores Africa, and looks om America with tolerant contempt softened by memory of of the wealth of Italian Americans

~~Then a day in Pisa~~

Italy has developed the individual genius, ~~until~~ back men believe that ability is and must be exceptional and seldom, and rage against the Russian and Chinese idea that human ability is normal if once the doors of poverty are opened. The Renaissance left the world believing that only the few deserve Life and that the privileged Few have the right to feed on the guts of the many. On this lie the civilization of Western Europe and North America still base their belief and make their last armed stand. The final game battle, the Last. To your tents, O Asia and Africa!

Rome is a mighty memory, with a world-wide Religious organization which governs governments and has vast psychological influence on men everywhere; it is too the center of Italian politics and political power; it is a center of commerce and trade. It is crowded, breathless, nervous. Florence is heritage and family; art and tourists. The restless workers dominate Milan and Turin. I did not see south Italy and sicily, but church know how poverty rules there and crime

It is singular how in Florence and elsewhere in Italy Beauty is monopolized and even hidden; art is owned and kept from vulgar gaze. Sale is forced continually by death and loss of income; the influence of art especially in music and architecture seeps through and down but ~~ixxix~~ this is apraised as almost against Nature. Beauty should belong to Exceptional Few. The upward push of the mass is danger and degradation and yet this is history. This steady rebellion from below. This emergence of strength and ability from the mass is vulgar, but inextinguishable. Civilization is to the West essentially exclusive, something apart and to be kept apart lest it be lessened and lost to the owners of wealth, but the poverty of the mass is the goal of human culture. Only the Select are the real leders of mankind; yet no sooner do the Select achieve power than they imitate each other, countnance no deviation and frown on individual difference. There are singular contradictions current: Love, Hate, whores, virgins; pregnant, steriel; slim and fat;; homo-sexuals and women lovers; naked and over-dressed -- all these contradictions crowd on each other and co-exist.

Life is the age-old, ceaseless upsurge of the lowest masses of men toward attainment of equality with the highest that man has ever reached. Against this is the bitter, vicious recoil from even the thought of the rise of the dregas of mankind, for this surely is the death of the best, the failure of civilization. Such rise is moreover impossible the lowest cannot rise; yet it is the only path to culture, for up out of the mass comes ever the future, the best attainable. The upward push continually halts and holds. In England a middle class lifts itself half-way toward the aristocracy and becomes in itself a way of life. In Italy the peasant Artisan becomes the world artist and serves the great families who rule the earth. Yet who knows what has been lost in the sifting? How many Michaelangelos, and Da Vincis have been ignored and died in filthy jails and gitters or been murdered in battle? In America the wild wealth of a nation has gone into the hands of white workers who climbed on the bcks of black slaves and stole the lands and materials of red Indiansand now can pose as the best-paid workers in the world, into whose organized unions, chinks, niggers and not even dagos cannot enter. Even when such persons become rich, their aim is not only to do no work themselvs, but to force others to do the work which they themselves ought to do, while they idle sit in boredom for lack of something worth doing , or lose themselves and children in debauchery and indulgence which killed the civilization they are defendin ng against blck men and yellow

39-46-215

Men today hate and fear the Soviet Union and China because these lands are really raising great masses of men whom Nordics have been treared to despise, to a level which will let them look Englishmen, French and Germans full in the face and outdo them?. Most of the Wset cannot conceive a civilization which include the vast majotiy of mankind; they hate the thought of it. Their religion rests on saints whose righteousness feeds on great crowds of sinners. They tach that mankind in essence is nasty, degraded, impossible fit only for hell. Thus the real war today between East and West is between believers and fighters for a white heaven on earth, and an earthly Hell for eastern Europeans, Huns and Balkanese, Chinese, Indians and negroes of every shade. Can an English aristocrat or rich shopkeper; a German soldier or scientist; a French exquisite, writer or thinker; an American millionaire, or trade union leader or an Italian descendant of Medici or their like -- can any of these even consider the poor, ignorant and sick folk who toil and cringe for their comfort and boasting called history, that this canaille will ever inherit their earth?

THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO

W. E. B. Du Bois

In the fall of 1896, I went to the University of Pennsylvania as "Assistant Instructor" in Sociology. It all happened this way: Philadelphia, then and still one of the worst governed of America's badly governed cities, was having one of its periodic spasms of reform. A thorough study of causes was called for. Not but what the underlying cause was evident to most white Philadelphians: the corrupt, semi-criminal vote of the Negro Seventh Ward. Everyone agreed that here lay the cancer; but would it not be well to give scientific sanction to the known causes by an investigation, with imprimateur of the University? It certainly would, answered Samuel McCune Lindsay of the Department of Sociology. And he put his finger on me for the task.

If Lindsay had been a smaller man and had been induced to follow the usual American pattern of treating Negroes, he would have asked me to assist him as his clerk in this study. Probably I would have accepted having nothing better in sight for work in sociology. But Lindsay regarded me as a scholar in my own right and probably proposed to make me an instructor. Evidently the faculty demurred at having a colored instructor. But since I had a Harvard Ph.D., and had published a recognized work in history, the University could hardly offer me a fellowship. A compromise was hit on and I was nominated to the unusual status of "assistant" instructor. Even at that there must have been some opposition, for the invitation was not particularly cordial. I was offered a salary of $900 for a period limited to one year. I was given no real academic standing, no office at the University, ~~no official recognition of any kind, no~~

~~name was eventually omitted from the catalogue;~~ I had no contact with students, and very little with members of the faculty, even in my own department.

I did not hesitate an instant but reported for duty with a complete plan of work and outline of methods and aims and even proposed schedules to be filled out. My general plan was promptly accepted and I started to work, consulting Lindsay regularly but never meeting the faculty.

The Provost of the University furnished the following credentials:

"In connection with the College Settlement, the Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania have undertaken the study of the social condition of the Colored People of the Seventh Ward of Philadelphia. The University has entered upon this work as a part of its duty and wishes to make the investigation as thorough and exact as possible. We want to know precisely how this class of people live; what occupation they follow; from what occupations they are excluded; how many of their children go to school; and to ascertain every fact which will throw light upon this social problem; and then having this information and these accurate statistics before us, to see to what extent and in what way, proper remedies may be applied. Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois is the investigator on behalf of the University, and I write to bespeak for him your cordial reception and earnest co-operation."

41-3-235

The two years at Wilberforce had been my uneasy apprenticeship, and with my advent into the University of Pennsylvania, I began a more clearly planned career which had an unusual measure of success, but was in the end pushed aside by forces which, if not entirely beyond my control, were yet of great weight.

The opportunity opened at the University of Pennsylvania seemed just what I wanted. I had offered to teach social science at Wilberforce (where I had been teaching) outside of my overloaded program, but I was not allowed. (nevertheless) My vision was becoming clearer. The Negro problem was in my mind a matter of systematic investigation and intelligent understanding. The world was thinking wrong about race, because it did not know. The ultimate evil was stupidity. The cure for it was knowledge based on scientific (study).

At the University of Pennsylvania I ignored the pitiful stipend. It made no difference to me that I was put down as an "assistant instructor" and even at that, that my name never actually got into the catalogue; it goes without saying that I did no instructing save once to pilot a pack of idiots through the Negro slums.

Of the theory back of the plan of this study of Negroes I neither knew nor cared. I saw only here a chance to study an historical group of black folk and to show exactly what their place was in the community. I did it despite extraordinary difficulties both within and without the group. Whites said: Why study the obvious? Blacks said: Are we animals to be dissected and by an unknown Negro at that? Yet, I made a study of the Philadelphia Negro so thorough that it has withstood the criticism of sixty years.

I counted my task here as simple and clear-cut; I proposed to find out what was the matter with this area and why. I started with no "research methods" and I asked little advice as to procedure. The problem lay before me. Study it. I studied it personally and not by Proxy. I sent out no canvassers. I went myself. Personally I visited and talked with five thousand persons. What I could, I set down in orderly sequence on schedules which I made out and submitted to the University for criticism. Other information I stored in my memory or wrote out as memoranda. I went through the Philadelphia libraries for data, gained access in many instances to private libraries of colored folk and got individual information. I mapped the district, classifying it by condition; I compiled two centuries of the history of the Negro in Philadelphia and in the Seventh Ward.

It would have been a fine thing if after this difficult, successful piece of work, the University of Pennsylvania had at least offered me a temporary instructorship in the college or in the Wharton School. Harvard had never dreamed of such a thing: a half century later one of Harvard's professors said of a gifted Negro student: "We'd give him a position if he were not a Negro!"

Eventually this brilliant man after serving in UNESCO successfully, committed suicide. What these institutions could not understand was that what I wanted was not a position in a white college, but a chance to teach Negro students on a high scientific level.

41-3-237

(White Harvard) classmates of lower academic rank than I, became full professors at Pennsylvania and Chicago. Here in my case an academic accolade from a great American university would have given impetus to my life work which I was already determined to make in a Negro institution in the South. The thing that galled was that such an idea never even occurred to this institution whose head was a high official of the Sugar Trust. But I did not mention this rebuff. I did not let myself think of it. But then, as now, I know an insult when I see it.

At the end of that study, I announced with a certain pride my plan of studying the complete Negro problem in the United States. I spoke at the forty-second meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences in Philadelphia, November 19, 1897, and my subject was "The Study of the Negro Problems." I began by asserting that in the development of sociological study there was at least one positive answer which years of research and speculation had been able to return, and that was : "The phenomena of society are worth the most careful and systematic study, and whether or not this study may eventually lead to a systematic body of knowledge deserving the name of science, it cannot in any case fail to give the world a mass of truth worth the knowing." I then defined and tried to follow the development of the Negro problem not as one problem, but "rather a plexus of social problems, some new, some old, some simple, some complex; and these problems have their one bond of unity in the fact that they group themselves about those Africans whom two centuries of slave-trading brought into the land."

I insisted on the necessity of carefully studying these problems and said: "The American Negro deserves study for the great end of advancing the cause of No such opportunity to watch and measure the history and development of a great race of men ever presented itself to the scholars of a modern nation. If they miss this opportunity -- if they do the work in a slip-shod, unsystematic manner -- if they dally with the truth to humor the whims of the day, they do far more than hurt the good name of the American people; they hurt the cause of scientific truth the world over, they voluntarily decrease human knowledge of a universe of which we are ignorant enough, and they degrade the highend of truth-seeking in a day when they need more and more to dwell upon its sanctity."

Finally I tried to lay down a plan for the study, postulating only: that the Negro "is a member of the human race, and as one who, in the light of history and experience is capable to a degree of improvement and culture, is entitled to have his interests considered according to his numbers in all conclusions astto the common weal."

Dividing the prospective scientific study of the Negro into two parts: the social group and his peculiar social environment, I proposed to study the social group by historical investigation, statistical measurement and sociological interpretation. Particularly with regard to anthropology, I said:

41-3-239

"That there are differences between the white and black races is certain, but just what those differences are is known to none with an approach to accuracy. Yet here in America is the most remarkable opportunity ever offered of studying these differences, of noting influences of climate and physical environment, and particularly of studying the effect of amalgamating two of the most diverse races in the world -- another subject which rests under acloud of ignorance."

In concluding, I said:

"It is to the credit of the University of Pennsylvania that she has been the first to recognize her duty in this respect and in so far as restricted means and opportunity hallowed, has attempted to study the Negro problems in a single definite locality. This work needs to be extended to other groups, and carried out with larger systems; and here it would seem is the opportunity of the Southern Negro college. We hear much of higher Negro education, and yet all candid people know there does not exist today in the center of Negro population a single first-class fully equipped institution, devoted to the higher education of Negroes; not more than three Negro institutions in the South deserve the name of 'college' at all; and yet what is a Negro college but a vast college settlement for the study of a particular set of peculiarly baffling problems?

"What more effective or suitable agency could be found in which to focus the scientific efforts of the great universities of North and East, than an institution situated in the very heart of these social problems, and made the center of careful historical and statistical research? Without doubt the first effective step toward the solving of the Negro question will be the endowment of a Negro college which is not merely a teaching body, but a center of sociological research, in close connection and co-operation with Harvard, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and University of Pennsylvania.

41-3-240

"Finally the necessity must again be emphasized of keeping clearly before students the object of all science, amid the turmoil and intense feeling that clouds the discussion of a burning social question. We live in a day when in spite of the brilliant accomplishments of a remarkable century, there is current much flippant criticism of scientific work; when the truth-seeker is too often pictured as devoid of human sympathy, and careless of human ideals. We are still prone in spite of all our culture to sneer at the heroism of the laboratory while we cheer the swagger of the street broil. At such times true lovers of humanity can only hold higher the pure ideals of science, and continue to insist that if we would solve a problem we must study it, and there is but one coward on earth and that is the coward that dare not know."

From the University of Pennsylvania I went to Atlanta University in 1896 and stayed thirteen years until 1910.

The main significance of my work at Atlanta University, during the years 1897 to 1910 was the development at an American institution of learning, of a program of study on the problems affecting the American Negroes, covering a progressively widening and deepening effort designed to stretch over the span of a century. This program was grafted on an attempt by George Bradford of Boston, o one of the trustees, to open for Atlanta University a field of usefulness for city Negroes comparable to what Hampton and Tuskegee were doing for rural districts s in agriculture and industry. At the Hampton and Tuskegee Conferences, there came together annually and in increasing numbers, workers, experts and observers to encourage by speeches and interchange of experience the Negro farmers and laborers of adjoining areas. Visitors, white and colored, from North and South, joined to advise and learn. Mr. Bradford's idea was to establish at Atlanta a similar conference, devoted especially to problems of city Negroes. The first conference, emphasizing particularly Negro health problems, was held in 1896. Immediately the University looked about for a man to teach history and political science, and take charge of future conferences. I was chosen.

When I took charge of the Atlanta Conference, I did not pause to consider how far my developed plans agreed or disagreed with the ideas of the already launched project. It made little essential difference, since only one conference had been held and a second planned. These followed the Hampton and Tuskegee model of being primarily meetings of inspiration, directed toward specific efforts at social reform and aimed at propaganda for social uplift in certain preconceived lines. This program at Atlanta, I sought to swing as on a pivot to one of scientific investigation into social conditions, primarily for scientific ends: I put no special emphasis on special reform effort, but increasing and widening emphasis on the collection of a basic body of fact concerning the social condition of American Negroes, endeavoring to reduce the condition to exact measurement whenever or wherever occasion permitted. As time passed, it happened that many uplift efforts were in fact based on our studies: the kindergarten system of the city of Atlanta, white as well as black; the Negro Business League, and various projects to better health and combat crime. We came to be however, as I had intended, increasingly, a source of general information and a basis for further study, rather than an organ of social reform.

The proverbial visitor from Mars would have assumed as elemental a study in America of American Negroes -- as physical specimens; as biological growths; as a field of investigation in economic development from slave to free labor; as a psychological laboratory in human reaction toward caste and discrimination; as an unique case of physical and cultural intermingling. These and a dozen other subjects of scientific interest, would have struck the man from Mars as eager lines of investigation for American social scientists. He would have been astounded to learn that the only institution in America in 1900 with any such program of study was Atlanta University, where ona budget of $5000 a year, including salaries, cost of publication, investigation and annual meetings, we were essaying this pioneer work.

My program for the succession of conference studies was modified by many considerations: cost, availability of suitable data, tested methods of investigation; moreover I could not plunge too soon into such controversial subjects as politics or miscegenation. Within these limitations, I finished a ten-year cycle study as follows:

1896, Mortality among Negroes in Cities

1897, Social and Physical Condition of Negroes in Cities

1898, Some Efforts of Negroes for Social Betterment

1899, The Negro in Business

1900, The College-Bred Negro

1901, The Negro Common School

1902, The Negro Artisan

1903, The Negro Church

1904, Notes on Negro Crime

1905, A Select Bibliography of the American Negro

I then assayed for the second decade a broader program, more logical, more inclusive, and designed to bring the whole subject matter into a better integrated whole. But continued lack of funds, and outside diversions (like the request of the Carnegie Institution of 1907 for a study of cooperation) kept even the second decade from the complete logic of arrangement which I desired; finally, my leaving Atlanta in 1910 and at last ~~the~~ the severing of my connection with the conference in 1914, left ~~the~~ the full form of my program still unfinished. I did, however publish the following eight studies:

41-3-243

1906, Health and Physique of the Negro American

1907, Economic Cooperation among Negro Americans

1908, The Negro American Family

1909, Efforts for Social Betterment among Negro Americans

1910, The College-Bred Negro American

1911, The Common School and the Negro American

1912, The Negro American Artisan

1914, Morals and Manners among Negro Americans

With the publication of 1914, my connection with Atlanta ceased for twenty years. Although studies and publications were prepared by others at the University in 1915 and 1918, the war finally stopped the enterprise.

What I was laboriously but steadily approaching in this effort was a recurring cycle of ten studies in succeeding decades; with repetition of each subject or some modification of it in each decade, upon a progressively broader and more exact basis and with better method; until gradually a foundation of carefully ascertained fact would build a basis of knowledge, broad and sound enough to be called scientific in the best sense of that term.

Just what form this dream would eventually have taken, I do not know. So far as actually forecast, it had assumed in 1914, some such form as this:

1. Population; Distribution and Growth
2. Biology; Health and Physique
3. Socialisation: Family, Group and Class
4. Cultural Patterns: Morals and Manners
5. Education
6. Religion and the Church
7. Crime
8. Law and Government
9. Literature and Art
10. Summary and Bibliography

I proposed as I have said, to repeat each of these every ten years, basing the studies on ever broader and more carefully gathered data. Eventually I hoped to keep all the inquiries going simultaneously, only emphasizing and reporting on one particular subject each year. This would have allowed some necessary shifting or combination of subjects as time and developments might suggest; and adjustments to new scientific advance in fields like anthropology and psychology. The plan would have called in time for a large and well-paid staff of experts and a study of method and testing of results such as no group of Americans were engaged in at the time; beginning with a definite, circumscribed group, but ending with the human race.

The program however was weak on its economic side. It did not stress enough the philosophy of Marx and Engels and was of course far too soon for Lenin. The program ought to have been - and as I think would have been if I had kep on this work - the Economic development of the American Negro slave; on this central thread all the other subjects would have been strung. But this I had no chance to essay.

Social scientists at the time were thinking in terms of theory and vast and eternal laws, but I had a concrete group of loving beings artificially set off by themselves and capable of almost laboratory experiment. I laid down an ambitious program for a hundred years of study. I proposed to take up annually in each decade the main aspects of the group life of Negroes with as thorough study and measurement as possible, and repeat the same program in the succeeding decade with additions, changes and better methods. In this way, I proposed gradually to broaden and intensify the study, sharpen the tools of investigation and perfect our methods of work, so that we would have an increasing body of scientifically ascertained fact, instead of the vague mass of the so-called Negro problems. And through this laboratory experiment I hoped to make the laws of social living clearer, surer, and more definite.

Some of this was accomplished, but of course only an approximation of the idea. For thirteen years we poured forth a series of studies, limited, incomplete, only partially conclusive, and yet so much better done than any other attempt of the sort in the nation that they gained attention throughout the world. In all we published a total of 2,172 pages which formed a current encyclopedia on the American Negro problems.

These studies with all their imperfections were widely distributed in the libraries of the world and used by scholars. It may be said without undue boasting that between 1896 and 1920 there was no study of the race problem in America made which did not depend in some degree upon the investigations made at Atlanta University; often they were widely quoted and commended.

I had heartening letters from persons of eminence and character. William James wrote in 1907: "I have just looked through the last installment of your studies on the American Negro. I wish the portraits might have been better printed. But it is splendid scientific work." Frank Taussig of Harvard wrote the same year: "In my judgement no better work is being done in the country, and no better opportunity is afforded for financial support on the part of those who wish to further the understanding of the Negro problem." Booker Washington, who spoke at our conference on on the Negro artisan in 1911, said: "The whole country should be grateful to this institution for the painstaking and systematic manner in which it has developed from year to year a series of facts which are proving most vital and helpful to the interests of our nation." Professor E.R.A. Seligman wrote: "I take great pleasure in testifying to my very high appreciation of the studies on the Negro proglem which you have been editing for the past few years. They are essentially scholarly and that means sober and temperate, and they are covering a field which is almost untilled and which is not apt to be cultivated by others." Jane Addams attended our conference in 1908 and commended our work.

Many periodicals mentioned our work:

London Spectator, 1900:

This work is being done with much intelligence, discrimination and assiduity at the instance and under the inspiration of Atlanta University.

School Review, 1902:

The work of this conference is constructive and merits hearty support.

Outlook, 1903:

No student of the race problem, no person who would either think or speak upon it intelligently, can afford to be ignorant of the facts brought out in the Atlanta series of sociological studies of the conditions and the progress of the Negro.

Publications of the Southern History Association, 1904:

The work done under the direction of the Atlanta Conference is entitled to the respectful and thoughtful consideration of every man interested in any aspect of the life of the American Negro.

South Atlantic Quarterly, 1904:

They constitute, so far as the reviewer can learn, the most important body of direct evidence ever published as to moral and religious conditions of our colored people.

N.Y. Evening Post, 1905:

The only scientific studies of the Negro question being made today are those carried on by Atlanta University.

It must be remembered that the significance of these studies lay not so much in what they were actually able to accomplish, as in the fact that at the time of their publication Atlanta University was the only institution in the world carrying on a systematic study of the Negro and his development, and putting the result in a form available for the sbholars of the world.

In 1909 I tried to start an "Encyclopedia Africana" and secured as members of the board of advisers the following distinguished scholars:

41-3-246

Sir Harry Johnston, K.C.B., England
Prof. W.M. Flinders Petrie, D.C.L., England
William Archer, Esq., England
Miss Alice Werner, England
Dr. Francis Hoggan, England
Prof. Giuseppi Sergi, Italy
Dr. Karl Weule, Germany
Dr. J. Deniker, France
Major R.M. Daniel, Bechuanaland, Africa
Prof. A. B. Hart, L.L.D., Harvard
Prof. William James, L.L.D., Harvard
Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, L.L.D., Harvard
President G. Stanley Hall, L.L.D., Clark
Prof. A. F. Chamberlain, Ph.D., Clark
Prof. Franz Boas, Ph.D., Columbia

Sixty-two Negro scholars were on the Editorial Board, including:

Kelley Miller, A.M., (Howard)
H.O. Tanner, France
Richard T. Greener, A.B., Harvard
Charles W. Chesnutt
John R. Lynch, U.S. Army
W. S. Scarborough, L.L.D., Oberlin

and many others. I never was able to raise funds to carry this enterprise further forward.

In 1900 came a significant occurence which not until lately have I set in its proper place in my life. I had been for over nine years studying the American Negro Problem. The result had been significant because of its unusual nature and not for its positive accomplishment. I wanted to set down its aim and method in some outstanding way which would bring my work to the notice of the thinking world. The great World Fair at Paris was being planned and I thought I might put my findings into plans, charts and figures, so one might see what we were trying to accomplish. I got a couple of my best students and put a series of facts into charts: the size and growth of the Negro American group; its division by age and sex; its distribution, education and occupations; its books and periodicals. We made a most interesting set of drawings, limned on pasteboard cards about a yard square and mounted on a number of movable standards. The details of finishing these fifty or more charts, in colors, with accuracy, was terribly difficult with little money, limited time and not too much encouragement. I was threatened with nervous prostration before I was done and had little money left to buy passage to Paris, nor was there a cabin left for sale. But the exhibit would fail unless I was there. So at the last moment I bought passage in the steerage and went over and installed the work. It was an immediate success. It occupied a small room, perhaps twenty feet square but the room was always full. The American press, white and colored was full of commendation and in the end, the end, the exhibit received a Grand Prize, and I, as its author, a Gold Medal.

About the same time, I approached the United States Commissioner of Labor. For several years I had been able to do now and then certain small studies for the Bureau of Labor, which had been accepted and paid for. It began with a proposal to Carroll D. Wright in 1897 for a study of the Negro in a Virginia town in 1898, which Mr. Wright authorised me to make on my own responsibility, promising only to print it if he like it. He did like it. This was followed by a major study of the Negro in the Black Belt in 1899 and among Negroes in Georgia in 1901, and I then approached the Bureau with a new proposal.

I asked United States Commissioner of Labor, Neill, in 1906, to authorize a study of a Black Belt community. I wanted to take Lowndes County, Alabama, in a former slave state with a large majority of Negroes, and make a social and economic study from the earliest times when documents were available, down to the present; supplemented by studies of official records and a present house-to-house canvass of Negroes. I plied Commissioner Neill with plans and specifications until at last he authorized the study. Helped by Monroe Work, of Tuskegee Institute, and R. R. Wright, now a bishop of the A.M.E. Church, and a dozen or more local employees, I settled at the Calhoun School and began the study.

It was carried on with all sorts of difficulties, including financing which was finally arranged by loans from the University, and with the greeting of some of my agents with shotguns in certain parts of the county; but it was ~~eventually finished by hand with no~~

eventually finished. The difficult schedules were tabulated and I made chronological maps of the division of the land; I considered the distribution of labor; the relation of landlord and tenant; the political organization and the family life and the distribution of the population. The report was finished by hand with no copy, and rushed to Washington. It was criticised and I spent some weeks there in person, revising and perfecting it. It was finally accepted by the government, and $2,000 paid for it, most of which went back to the University in repayment of funds which they had kindly furnished me to carry on the work. But the study was not published. I knew the symptoms of this sort of treatment: in 1898, S. S. McClure had sent me to south Georgia to make a study of social situations there. He paid for the report but never published the manuscript and he afterward did the same thing in the case of Sir Harry Johnston.

I finally approached the Bureau and tried to find out when it would be published and was told that the Bureau had decided not to publish the manuscript, since it "touched on political matters." I was astonished and disappointed, but after a year I went back to them again and asked if they would allow me to have the manuscript since they were not going to use it. They told me it had been destroyed!

It was of course crazy for me to dream that America, in the dawn of the Twentieth Century with Colonial Imperialism, based on the suppression of colored folk, at its zenith, would encourage, much less adequately finance, such a program at a Negro college under Negro scholars. My faith in its success was based on the firm belief that race prejudice was based on widespread ignorance. My long-term remedy was Truth: carefully gathered scientific proof that neither color nor race determined the limits of a man's capacity or desert. I was not at the time sufficiently Freudian to understand how little human action is based on reason; nor did I know Karl Marx well enough to appreciate the economic foundations of human history.

I was therefore astonished and infinitely disappointed, gradually to realize that our work in the Atlanta conferences was not getting support; that, far from being able to command increased revenue for better methods of investigation and wider fields, it was with increasing difficulty that the aging and overworked President, with his deep earnestness and untiring devotion to principle, could collect enough to maintain even our normal activities. The conference had not been without a measure of success. Our reports were widely read and commented upon. On the other hand, so far as the American world of science and letters was concerned, we never "belonged"; we remained unrecognized in learned societies and academic groups. We rated merely as Negroes studying Negroes, and after all what had Negroes to do with America or Science? Gradually and with deep disappointment I began to realize, as early as 1906, that my program for studying the Negro problems must soon end, unless it received unforeseen support.

By the second decade of the Twentieth Century, a legal caste system based on race and color, had been openly grafted on the democratic constitution of the United States. This explains why, in 1910, I gave up my position at Atlanta University and became Director of Publications and Research for the newly formed National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of which I was one of the incorporators in 1911.

From 1910 to 1934 I gave up almost entirely my attempt at making a scientific study of the Negro problems in America and devoted myself to propaganda in oder to convince Americans, black and white, that they must make a serious ethical effort to correct the wrong interest in the Negro problems and try to stop lynching and mob violence, encourage education, enforce the laws and make new laws. From 1910 to 1934 I carried on this work in cooperation with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and as editor of a small monthly magazine called the Crisis which eventually reached a circulation of 100,000.

The Crisis, however, depended upon subscriptions for support and when the great depression fell upon the land the working people, especially the Negroes, were unable to support the Crisis further. I therefore resigned the editorship of the little magazine and turned again back to my attempt at scientific work in solution of race problems. I was induced to do this because my close friend John Hope had become President of a new Atlanta University which was a graduate school connected with several undergraduate colleges. It was endowed by the General Education Board and it seemed probable tha there could now arise in the South an institution of learning under the control of colored teachers which could have become a center of a new sociology of race problems.

In one aspect of the Negro problem in America, my program had limited success; that was its relation to the white working class. The Negroes were working folk — farmers, laborers, proters and servants. They belonged in the main to the "Have-nots" as over against the "Haves." Yet they were not regarded as an integral part of the American workers and I as a student of their plight and their efforts was continually treating them as a separate class instead of grouping them with the mass of workers. This was not because of any failure on my part to conceive of the Negroes as primarily workers whose chief interest lay in the working class. The fault lay at the door of the powerful forces in the state which had separated the working class into antagonistic groups hating and fearing each other more than they fea ed their exploiters. In slavery days the poor whites hated and feared the black slaves. These slaves deprived the free white workers of land and livelihood; drove them to the hills and barrens or to the slums of cities; they were largely disfranchised and managed to make a living by fawning on slaveowners, becoming slave over-seers or bearing arms to keep black slaves from revolt. They protested bitterly against this condition.

To these poor whites, emancipation seemed not an opportunity for Negroes to rise to the status of free white workers, but rather the chance of white labor to climb on the backs of Negroes. The freedmen therefore was not only exploited by former slaveowners but even more by the up-struggling whites; and when white workers got the vote --blacks were disfranchised . A cast legislation put the Negro legally u der the feet of the white workers, limiting his work, his wages, his dwelling place and his personal freedom. In the eyes of the Negro the white worker became his chief enemy; he led the lynch mobs, insulted him on the streets and took the food out of his mouth.

The mass of the Northern working class opposed slavery and wanted slaves emancipated. But they were largely foreign emigrants and many like the Irish met the competition of free Negro workers on arrival and fought for work in pitched battles. The newer emigrants were warned against Negro cheap competing labor and did not regard these dark strangers as fellow workmen. Employers threw white and black into competing groups. So that the National Labor Union representing the best of American labor, despite its brave repudiation of color discrimination was unable in 1869 to secure admission of Negro workers into unions. Negroes rebuffed, tried to form their own unions but had to start with the demand for political power. For this they depended onthe Republican party and that party reduced them to serfdom in 1876. The Northern Unions in tight craft organizations so segregated the Negro worker that in 1902, the older trades like miners, longshoremen and cigarmakers admitted Negroes; but the newer and better paid trades, like blacksmiths, smelters, engineers, metal workers, boilermakers, electric workers, glassmakers, oil workers, textile workers and a host of similar unions admitted in the new century few or no Negroes. When, therefore, I essayed to study the Negro worker, I had no meeting ground with the white laboring class. I invited the secretary of the Georgia Federation of Labor to our conference and he spoke but his hearers knew that his federation discriminated against Negroes. We studied Negro employees in Southern factories. We corresponded with all the unions in the nation but with small result. The American working class remained split by the color line. My study therefore became a study not of a working class but of a small part of one and the relations of these groups became more important than relations between worker and employer.

41-3-253

In 1934 John Hope and I set out to revive the old Atlanta University conferences and studiesof the Negro Problems. Hope sought unsuccessfully to obtain funds for this enterprise. After his death I tried to see if some co-operative plan might supply funds. Frederick Keppell of the Carnegie Foundation gave us money for preliminary work in 1940 and 1941. I called the "First Phylon Conference" in April 1941. A good cross section of Negro leaders in education attended. Reports were made from each state on the economic conditions of Negroes. I tried to sum up the current conditions in this statement:

I. a. If thirteen millionpeople starve to death, it is because they are stupid.

b. Many American Negroes today are virtually starving.

II. a. There is no such thing as lack of useful,needful work.

b. There is wide and dangerous lack of adequate wage and income for certain individuals.

III. a. Facing these paradoxes the world is changing its economic organization today to meet them and is planning further change.

b. We as a minority group must plan also, not in opposition but in intelligent accord with this general world planning.

IV. a. We must especially beware of propaganda and distortion as to the present economic conditions and changes in the world.

1. We must not assume that business enterprise and economic welfare are synonomous terms and assume that because a business is profitable it is for that reason beneficial to the race or nation.

2. We must not assume that because racial organization cannot hire thirteen million Negroes, it cannot and should not hire thirteen thousand or more.

3. Because, as a minority group, we must in the main conform to the national economic patterns, is no proof that we cannot by intelligent action influence these patterns to our advantage.

V. a. Finally, we must get at the facts by the latest scientific technique.

b. We must gather, study, test, and interpret these facts.

c. We must remember that the starvation of Negroes in the United States benefits nobody; that full employment at a living wage for all Negroes as well as allwhites is at once the greatest patriotism and the greatest defense against war and evil.

~~Atlanta University did not have funds to undertake any movement for investigation and publication.~~ I visited Negro institutions from Virginia to Texas in order to see what co-operation I could start.

I became convinced of several things: first, the role of the government-supported land grant colleges in the development of Negro education was going to be large and progressively increasing. Second, these land grant colleges needed a program for social science studies which is at present undeveloped.

Third, rapid changes are now taking place in the Negro ethnic group and even more momentous ones impend. The 2nd World War has upset conventional economy, exacerbated racial consciesness and already led to bitter clashes. The developments after the war are bound to add to these difficulties. There is one and only one fundamental and definitive way to meet this situation and that is to begin a systematic study of the essential facts of the present condition of the Negro race and to establish a way of continuing and making more complete and effective such a study. Then in the event the nation can turn its attention and energies to remedial measures, it will not be necessary to waste time in belated efforts to get at the essential truth.

Careful and exact knowledge of conditions and changes then are imperative and ought to be in process of gathering now in order to be available during and after the war. Fourth, this should not be the conventional type of "social study" --an instantaneous photograph of a sample group; but should be planned so as eventually to approach the stature of a total study of a complete situation, continuously photographed, and re-photographed, measured and re-measured; so that our knowledge of the vast and momentous social experiment in race relations now making in the United States, would attain a completeness and authority that would be unquestioned and unquestionable and available in the post war world which will surely need this sort of information. I believe that here is a chance not only to serve the Negro race and America, but also to serve the world and social science in an unique way. Fifth, the Negro Land-Grant Colleges, distributed usually one to a state and manned by pr sidents chosen by boards of Southern whites, would in many respects be ideal centers of social studies in each state, on matters touching the condition in each state of the people for whom the school exists and for whose advancement the school was established. Each of these schools has proclaimed its aim to be the promotion of industry and lifting the social status of Negroes. Any such program needs exact knowledge of facts for its foundation.

Sixth, such studies to be effective must be well done and in accord with the latest scientific technique. They must not sink to mere propaganda nor white-washing. Most of the land grant colleges are not at present equipped with personnel or funds for this work; a few are. All need expert advice and guidance, to integrate, synchronize and direct this work, and help in the proper interpretation of its results. Seventh, here is where the Negro private institution of higher learning could well cooperate with the states and call to aid the advice of other universities, north and south.

Three Negro universities seem best fitted for this work of guidance and integration: Howard, which holds to the federal government a position analagous to that of the land grant colleges to the states; Fisk, which has among Negroes the best equipped department of social sciences in the South; Atlanta, where the first attempt was made in America to carry on a scientific study of the Negro problems.

My first step toward realizing this project was to seek to sell the idea to the Negro land grant colleges. I talked the plan over with President Banks of Prairie View, who was a former student of mine; who, as I knew, had long had some such collaboration in mind, and who had the best social science department among Negro land grant colleges. He was enthusiastically in favor. I then secured permission to present the scheme to the annual conference of the presidents of Negro land grant colleges at Chicago, November, 1941.

In 1935, the Federal Government was giving $18,000,000 annually to land grant colleges in Southern states, which had colleges separated by race. Negroes forming over a fifth of the population of these states received only about five per cent of this money. For some time the Negro colleges had been pressing for a larger share, but the reply had been that such work as research in agriculture or chemistry was being carried on in the white colleges and that it was not necessary to duplicate this work in Negro institutions. It occurred to me that a careful program of race studies planned for the Negro colleges might be the basis for a demand for a much larger share of Federal funds. I therefore addressed the organization of Negro Land Grant College Presidents in October, 1941. I said:

"With a comparatively small group like that of the American Negro, in a country of great economic efficiency like America, and spurred by every high incentive, there is no real reason why cultivated brains among us may not guide the great mass of our folk to desired economic and cultural ends. This, of course, depends on the extent to which these potential leaders have the will to sacrifice their talent to this end; and also on the actual knowlege which they possess to guide the mass toward real progress and not back to out-worn reaction.

"The problem before us is this: to put fourteen million people to work so that they may receive an income which will insure a civilized standard of living; to make it possible for them to preserve their health; to keep crime down to a minimum and to educate their children; with the eventual object of giving this group sufficient leisure to advance by means of talented persons among them in science and art and cultural patterns. And with the further idea that in so far as these objects are successful, the group will become nearer to actual equality with their fellow Americans and to civilized people the world over, and will thus remove from color prejudice a very real reason for its perpetuation.

"How can the college help the community earn a living? First, it can train students for existent needs, for which the community now pays. Sometimes educational philosophers talk as though this were the one end of the college; and a situation could be easily imagined where that might be pretty nearly true; where you have settled normal culture and an arrangement of work which is suitable for that culture; and relatively stable economic organization. Under these circumstances if a college trained men efficiently for these jobs and at the same time supplied a broad cultural outlook toward the future it would come near doing its main work.

"The college today, however, must do more --far more--than prepare men for jobs at present in demand and socially needful. The college must anticipate the future needs of the community and prepare education to meet them.

"Unless the college goes further than training for current jobs and goes out to meet and cooperate with the community in such a way that the man awaiting and prepared to do a necessary future work for the community can be employed now according to his capacity; unless this is done, the college program is fatally handicapped and the community expanision is crippled. The same thing applies to work which although needed is not now available for Negroes and may not be during the present generation. In that case a careful survey of the possibilities among fourteen million people might give an opportunity to create such jobs within our own group or by cooperation with others. This even more than the other case, involves a broad study of the economic conditions among Negroes and possibilities of their organizations. It would call not simply for the efforts of one college with its immediate community or its state, but the cooperative efforts of the Negro educational institutions of the South.

"This leads us to the fact that if the college is to make real and advantageous approach to its community, either its local or its general community, it must be helped by a careful, broad and continuous study of the social and economic set-up of that community; that is, we must know as we do not know today, the existing occupations of Negroes; not in the vague and general and necessarily inaccurate report of the decennial census, but by minute and complete survey and study of counties, towns and cities where the Negro po pulation is resident. We must take such a beginning as Charles Johnson's regional study of Southern counties, extend the data to 1940 and then complete it and carry it on continuously from year to year. We must have a group to group and person to person knowledge person knowledge of the condition of the laboring masses, of their opportunities and hindrances. And this kind of study ought to be made in accordance with the latest scientific techniques and on a national basis. There is no reason why a study like that of Allison Davis, "The Deep South", should not be made over the whole South so that we could paint with descriptions, facts and figures, the real social condition of the American Negro. The interpretation of this knowledge and its interaction with past history and current trends must be the continuously and critically examined conclusions of the best trained students of the social sciences. We must not depend on the narrow experience and conventional standards of business men; we must not resort to untried panaceas or emotional utopias. This study must be increasingly a matter of science, carried out to its inexorable and tested conclusions.

"We need in sociology, a race regionalism which will narrow and concentrate on our Negroes the general regional studies of the South. Instead of the occasional snapshot of social conditions which was the social study of yesterday, we must aim at a continuous moving picture of ever increasing range and accuracy.

"A national planning institute must annually gather up and compare and interpret this great body of facts. There must be provided for this work, sufficient research. And finally through a central office, there must be wide and carefully edited publication of results.

"It is not only illogical but it is an indictment of the Negro college that the chief studies of the Negro's condition today are not being done by Negroes and Negro colleges. The center of gravity as well as the truth of investigation should be brought back to the control of an association of Negro colleges; and this not for the purpose of creating aNegro science or purely racial facts; but in order to make sure that the whole undistorted picture is there and that the complete interpretation is made by those most competent to do it, throught their own lives and training.

"Under the leadership of these same colleges, the communities must proceed to act, explore, experiment and build. They must organise their spending power to the last dollar, realising that a carefully and intelligently spent dollar is a more powerful ballot than a vote for a coroner. Advantage must be taken of decentralised cheap power like the TVA to push a new era of home manufactures and producers' cooperation. The churches can branch into real social work; they might oganise free legal defense for every accused Negro; the secret orders can further transform their regalias, rituals, and parades into orphanages and student aid. We can have cooperative medicine and dentistry and field hospitals to replace private practice. We have an enormously fertile field for economic experiment here on the threshold of a new industrial era. All it needs is scientific study, personal character and coordinated intelligence guided by the colleges. It is for the inception and carrying out of this program that I am appealing to you today."

I proposed that this body agree to the following general plan:

1. A continuous and intensive study of the Negroes of each Southern state by each of the Negro Land Grant Colleges.

2. Preparation for ability to do this scientifically by strengthening the division of Social Sciences in each institution (History, Political Science, Psychology, Anthropology, Sociology, Economics) and provision of time and funds for study and research.

3. Inauguration of a general program of subjects and methods of research, with annual conferences, at which experts and representatives of other colleges should be present. Periodical integration, interpretation and publication of results.

I suggested the following detailed program for each Land Grant College:

1. A division of the "Social Sciences," teaching History, Anthropology, Sociology, Economics, Psychology, Political Sciences.

2. The integration of this teaching into one closely articulated study of

A. History

History of Europe
History of Asia
History of Africa
History of America
History of the United States
History of the Negro people in:
Africa
South and Central America
United States
In each state.

B. Social Sciences

Social Institutions	)	(Modern world
Anthropology	)	(United States
Economic Organization	)	(among Americans
Government	)	(among Negroes
Psychological reactions	)	(among Negroes in this State

3. A study of the facts concerning the Negroes of the state by counties, subdivisions of counties, villages, towns, cities, wards, blocks and households. The study to be carried on by professors, instuctors, fellows, social workers, volunteers and affiliated organizations.

The study to includes number of individuals, family groups, character of homes, location of homes; occupation of persons, incomes, expenditures, age, marital relations, education, property and recreation.

4. The scope of this study will include the observation and measurement of all facts and situations which have to do with the status of the Negro population in the state; becoming as funds and facilities increase, more and more intensive and compschensive, until at last it virtually means a checking of every Negro family in the state including their activities, institutions and organisations.

5. The study will use all available data as the basis of its work, including the federal census of 1940, all state censuses, all reports of the state, the county and its subdivisions, concerning education, occupation, dependency and delinquincy.

SPECIAL STUDIES OF

6. All organizations of Negroes or working with or for Negroes: details of work, including churches, lodges, cemeteries, clubs, etc; their property and budgets.

7. All business conducted by Negroes and among Negroes; character, amount, approximate money value.

8. Commercialized recreations, movies, billiard rooms, gambling, prostitution, etc.

9. Public recreation; parks, playgrounds, etc., number, upkeep.

10. The participation of Negroes in government as voters and officials; tax-payers, property holders; officials and administrative methods.

METHODS, INTERPRETATION AND PUBLICATION

11. The methods and scope of these studies to be outlined by an annual conference, with each college represented and outside experts.

12. The resulting studies to be collected, interpreted and made public for an annual state meeting and for appublic museum and laboratory of the social sciences with maps, charts, models.

13. All the college reports to be brought together, studied, tabulated, analyzed and interpreted and integrated into an annual joint report.

THE NORTHERN NEGRO

14. Arrangements to be entered into with private Negro instituions to join with departments of the social sciences in Northern colleges to make similar studies of northern Negroes.

RESULTANT BODY OF KNOWLEDGE

15. This body of knowledge, continuously added to, checked and reviewed; improved in method and object; tabulated, interpreted, and integrated, to be used as the basis of raising the standard of living and cultural pattern of American Negroes through education, work, law, and social action.

RESULTANT WORK FOR SOCIAL UPLIFT

16. For every social problem, institutional failure, or individual maladjustment made evident, located and measured, organizations will then attempt to discover or promote in the locality and state, remedies in EDUCATION: special kinds and specific methods; private, industrial, grup, state and national efforts.

SOCIAL UPLIFT WORK: by hiring thoroughly trained social workers; by group effort; by voluntary effort.

HEALTH: by physicians and dentists; by group medical care; by hospitalization; syphilis; by childbirth and child welfare efforts.

RECREATION: music, a folk theatre, playgrounds, library facilities, sports.

17. But of all these efforts, the college and community should concentrate their first and chief attention upon the problems of earning a living among Negroes, since these are fundamental to practically all other efforts. Attention should be paid especially to work now available, to openings for earning a living which may be made available, and for general economic re-organization, such as is involved in consumers' and producers' cooperation; whereby not only intelligent saving can be made in the expenditure of income, but that new occupations, especially in home industries and small manufactures, can be established among Negroes.

18. Every attempt should be made to use existing institutions and organizations among Negroes, for undertaking efforts at social reform as outlined above: churches, fraternal lodges, women's clubs, schools, and in many cases, private businesses, can be used for increasing employment, finding new employment, furnishing legal defense, furnishing direct relief, improving health, organising recreation, furnishing student aid and promoting consumers' and producers' cooperation.

41-3-263

FIRST STEPS

19. An immediate attempt on the part of the college in each state to reorganize their budgets so as to provide a gradually increasing minimum of funds for this program:

A. For teaching the Social Sciences.

B. For giving trained teachers, time and funds for investigation.

C. For providing, at the earliest moment, for the employment of social workers and fellows for investigation and social uplift.

D. For a publication fund.

E. For laying down a present program with plans for future expansion.

20. Minimum requirements for initiating the programs:

1. One or two teachers of History.
2. One or two teachers of Anthropology and Sociology.
3. One teacher of Economics.
4. One teacher of Psychology, with laboratory.
5. A teaching Fellow with some time and funds for field work.
6. A Social Worker with whole time for investigation and advice.

41-3-264

The Presidents of the Negro Land Grant Colleges received this proposal with favor and adopted this general plan, June 12, 1942:

To initiate a series of cooperative studies of the social condition of the American Negro and more especially of his economic situation during and after this war.

For this purpose they propose to use in their institutions the division of the Social Sciences including history, anthropology, sociology, economics, political science, psychology, and other cognate subjects so as to give their students unified knowledge of social conditions and modern trends.

In addition to this they propose to recommend the use of one or more of their qualified instructors, with sufficient time and funds for a series of social studies, whose subject, methods and scope shall be determined after conferences with executives and investigators in other institutions, and with outside experts in the social sciences, including students of conditions among the white population. This proposal is subject to the approval of the governing boards in the various states.

The ultimate object of such conferences and studies shall be to accumulate a body of knowledge, intensively pursued according to the best scientific methods, continuously added to, checked and reviewed; improved in method and object; tabulated, interpreted and integrated to be used as the basis of raising the standard of living and cultural pattern of American Negroes through education, work, law and social action.

We propose that the results of these studies by each college in its own state or section of state, shall be brought together, periodically compared, edited and published annually in some convenient form for the use of students legislators and social reformers.

For these purposes of conference, investigation and publication we propose to set aside in our annual budget such sums as may be approved by the various state authorities.

This was signed by the Presidents of 20 Negro Land Grant Colleges and eventually by the Presidents of Atlanta, Fisk and Howard. Representatives of War Production Board, the American Council of Education, the North Carolina Institute for Research in Social Science commended the plan as did School and Society and the Journal of Higher Education.

The Journal of Negro Education said in an article:

"Briefly, Dr. W.E. B. Du Bois' proposal, agreed upon by the Presidents of the Land Grant Colleges, assumes first a core of social studies in each of our Negro colleges and graduate schools. It assumes that by internal administrative and staff effort these may be internally unified and coordinated for a joint, continuous attack upon the problem of the study of the Negro population in the area surrounding each college. It assumes that, pouring into a central headquarters, yet to be designated, for review and analysis by a central board, yet to be chosen, there would be a continuous flow of raw data and completed studies. It assumes central coordination, synthesis and report of these studies. It assumes that by this great increase in knowledge, sound and rich and full, we would have materials wholly convincing as to the needs of local, regional, and national Negro populations. It assumes that with this knowledgewe could so increase our wisdom as to be able both to make Negro higher education very much better than it is in all aspects and we would have the facts at last on which to base valid requests for support from foundations, individuals, and local, state, and national governments. By knowing what the problems are we would know also how to arrange them in priorities and further , much better than we know now, how to attack them each in turn with some expectation of success.

41-3-2606

The plan was finally implemented by this vote of the Conference of Negro Land Grant College Presidents on October 28, 1942:

1. That Dr. W.E. B. Du Bois be designated the official coordinator of the proposed sociological studies to be instituted by the various land grant colleges.
2. That each President appoint from his faculty a liason officer to serve as the agent for continued implementation of the project. This officer to report progress and seek further cooperation from the administration and faculty: preferably, though not necessarily, he should be a social scientist.
3. That each President agree to try to find funds in the college budget to permit attendance of liaison officer at a methodological conference to be called by Dr. Du Bois at a convenient time and place, after appropriate correspondence should have further clarified various issues.

4. That the Executive Committee at this meeting address itself to possible ways and means of further financing said study, conference or other aspectsof the program.

The 26th Atlanta University Conference met at Robert Hall, Morehouse College, Atlanta, April 19 and 20, 1943. It became the first conference of the Negro Land Grant Colleges, for coordinating aprogram of cooperative social studies. Among those present were:

41-3-267

E. Franklin Frazier, Library of Congress

Charles S. Johnson, Fisk University

Howard W. Odum, University of North Carolina

E. B. Reuter, University of Iowa

T. Lynn Smith, Louisiana State University

Edgar T. Thompson, Duke University

Donald Young, Social Service Research Council

Thirty four persons attended, representing thirty institutions. The sessionms lasted two days and consisted of exhibits, reports, addresses and conferences.

By special invitation , there were present at the conference, eight well-known sociologists, from leading American institutions. These persons, after observation and consultation, have written the following opinions on the possiblities of this agreement. The names are arranged in order of academic seniority.

Howard Washington Odum, Kenan Professor of Sociology, and Director of the Institute for Research in Social Science, University of North Carolina:

"It seems to me that in two or threeways a strong, integrated program for research in the land grant colleges would constitute an important step forward. In the first place, the area in which they work is still virgin and important, and their laboratories are adequate for genuine research and experimentation. They have a fine opportunity to combine the social studies with the physical sciences and to implement them in practical programs."

Edward Byron Reuter, Professor of Sociology and Chairman of the Department; College of Commerce, University of Iowa:

"The plan for cooperative studies to be carried on by the Negro Land Grant Colleges seems to me to be a very wise development and one that may lead to increasingly important results. It will make possible a pooling of resources -- of time, staff, and funds --to discover and make known information that now gets too little public notice."

41-3-268

Edward Franklin Frazier, Professor of Sociology and Head of Department, Howard University; Consultant in Negro bibliography, Library of Congress:

"To my mind, the Conference was significant because it represented the broadening and deepening of the stream of a great tradition which owes much to you. Moreover, the Conference was a distinct success in that it brought together and stimulated men and women who have generally been forced to work in isolation. Even if no other conferences were held, I am sure that many of those who attended this one would return to their work with a feeling that they were engaged in a worthwhile endeavor and that they had the support and appreciation of their fellow workers.

Charles Spurgeon Johnson, Director of the Department of Social Science, Fisk University; Trustee of the Julius Rosenwald Fund; Chairman of the Race Relations Committee of the American Missionary Association:

"The fact that so large a number of persons were present without direct financial aid from an outside source pointed to a reserve of interest that might be counted on to carry along a coordinated movement among the colleges. Not to be overlooked, however, is the prestige of an established and admired scholar in this field who has served as an effective catalyzing agent."

Donald Ramsey Young, Research Secretary of the Social Science Research Council:

"I have no doubt whatever concerning the value of your objective. There is need for the encouragement and guidance of social and economic research at the Land Grant Colleges, both in terms of the benefits which should be derived therefrom by the institutions and their faculties and also in terms of the practical social utility of the anticipated results."

41-3-269

Edgar Tristram Thompson, Associate Professor of Sociology, Duke University: "I feel that you have a good idea and that you deserve support in your efforts to carry it out. I appreciate your including me among the invited sociologists and I feel that my efforts to contribute to the conference have taught me something."

William Earle Cole, Professor of Sociology and Head of the Department, University of Tennessee; Acting Chairman of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation:

"I think you are starting something which is very fundamental and which should go a long way in improving not only the Negroes of the South but other peoples as well. I was greatly impressed with what the Negro colleges have been doing and the prospects for the future."

Thomas Lynn Smith, Professor of Sociology and Head of the Department, University of Louisiana:

"I think well of your plan for promoting research work on the part of the social science personnel at the land grant colleges for Negroes.

"The advice of sociologists at institutions for whites should be sought from time to time as the work goes along; but not the extent that there is any tendency at any institution for the white man to determine, even by suggestion, what shall be done by the Negro."

A second Conference was planned for the Spring of 1944, and I wrote in July 1943:

"This whole plan will comeup for discussion and modification in the Second Land Grant College Conference in the Spring of 1944. The main consideration is this: The economic situation of the Negro during and after the present war is a matter of critical and vital importance. There is going to be increased race friction and finally want and unemployment in the midst of violent social change. At such time we want accurate and carefully made social measurements, tested techniques and the machinery for further investigation. There will be neither time nor disposition during times of turmoil to initiate new and calm investigation. If now we begin this nationwide study of economic and social conditions, it can be continuously pursued through storm and stress and after the post-war calm form a priceless guide to social survival and lasting peace."

41-3-270

Many other commendations came from across the nation, from white and black. Especially was the new cooperation among Negro institutions noted with Atlanta University as the acknowledged head and center of work.

Then at the moment of triumph of this carefully thought out and carefully planned scheme, came catastrophe. Without notice to me of any kind, I was retired from my professorship and headship of the department of Sociology at Atlanta University.

This was not merely a personal disaster. It was removing from leadership the one person who because of age and long experience; because of works published and a wide acquaintanceship based on the relation of teacher and student, happened to be the person to whom the presidents of Negro Land Grant Colleges and other Negroes of influence were willing to entrust this cooperative venture. President Clement of Atlanta University had quarrelled with the Land Grant Colleges a few years past. So that many of them did not like him personally. Most of the others did not know him but they did know Atanta University and they knew me. They were willing to put this plan into thse hands but they would not consent to cooperate with President Clement. There were doubtless at other Negro institutions persons capable of doing this job, but they were not as well known and in any case my selection gained unusual agreement and Atlanta University unprecedented prestige as the center of this venture.

My sudden retirement then savored of a deliberate plot, although this cannot be proven. The retirement age at Atlanta University was sixty-five. But I was sixty-five when President Hope called me to the University. Nothing was said between us about the conditions of eventual retirement--due to my usual neglect of financial considerati ns and because my good health gave me not thought of stopping work at any near time. Hope must have mentioned the matter to Florence Reed, treasurer, but they reached no decision that I knew of. Later I opposed Miss Reed's election as president to succeed Hope; and the new plan gained me wide acclaim. Even the General Education Board which handled Rockefeller funds favored my plan. President Clement while supporting the plan was not enthusiastic. As a new young unknown president, perhaps he saw my reputation overshadowing him. Letters came to me; visitors asked for me and no doubt Miss Reed encouraged his jealousy. I was conscious that this might occur and tried to be careful. On all my plans I consulted him. All invitations went out in his name. His delays and small objections seemed petty and I said so. Perhaps I was too brusque and not diplomatic enough in this and did not take into account his inexperience and lack of understanding. Doubtless too he had no desire to stop the development of the plan, but had no idea that I was at least for the time being so necessary for its firm establishment.

Neither Miss Reed nor President Clement said a word to me about retirement; but at the meeting of the Board of Trustees in 1944, Miss Reed proposed that I be retired. President Clement seconded the motion and apparently with little or no objection the Board passed the vote. Presumably most of the members assumed that the matter had been discussed with me and had my agreement. No pension was mentioned.

41-3-272

At any rate without a word of warning I found myself at the age of 76, without employment and with less than five thousand dollars of savings. Not only was a great plan of scientific work killed at birth, but my own life was thrown into confusion. I felt the world tottering beneath my feet and I fought back in despair. Finally the trustees gave me a year's full salary in lieu of my never having been given notice of retirement. Also after offering me a pension of $100 a month, they finally granted me $1800 a year for five years and $1200 a year thereafter.

A word from the poet Sara Teasdale expressed my mood:

"When I can look life in the eyes,
Grown calm and very coldly wise,
Life will have given me the Truth
And taken in exchange -- my youth."

41-3-273

My youth? I laughed grimly. It was not my youth that I was losing; it was my old age; and old age was worthless in the United States.

There were some earnest attempts to carry the proposed program on. It was transferred to Howard University, with E. Franklin Frazier in charge. An excellent conference was held in 1945. But Frazier was not given funds for continuing the project and the Land Grant Colleges gradually ceased to cooperate. The whole scheme died within a year or two. It has never been revived.

The result of this action was disastrous; not merely to me but to the American Negro. Up unitl this time the Negro himself had led in the study and interpretation of the condition of his race in the United States. Beginning with 1914, with accelerated speed the study of the Negro passed into the hands of whites and increasingly Southern whites. There were colored sociologists and historians but they worked without coordinated plan, without adequate funds or under superiors who were not interested. Finally many Negro writers found it profitable to write that Business and the Government demanded and not the whole truth. Until in the last decade 1949 to 1959 with increasing unanimity, the thesis has been defended in a thousand books and papers that the Civil War was not a struggle to preserve and spread the slavery of black workers, but a holy crusade to maintain the superior civilisation of white folk and today current historians can treat American history and take no account of American Negroes and their activities in the Twentieth century.

There was another loss in the giving up of this plan, which I have never mentioned. Here was an unprecedented chance for an experiment in Sociology; for measuring and classifying human action, on a scale never before attempted; it would be reasonably sure of adequate funds and the best of trained cooperation and nationwide if not worl-wide criticism. On such a base a real science of Sociology could have been built. The opportunity was surrendered and the whole science of Sociology has suffered. Indeed today there is no recognized field of Sociology; almost no one calls himself a Sociologist and few institutions grant a degree in sociology. I even had projected a path of scientific approach: I was going to plot out beside the world of physical law, a science of Sociology which measured "the limits of chance in human action." If this field proved narrow or non-existent, world law was proven. If not the resultant "chance" was what men had always regarded as "Free Will." Meantime as students of human action hesitated and waited, Psychology measured nervous reaction; Physics merging with Chemistry rose to enormous accomplishment and helped by vast provision of mathematics, recast our whole conception of the universe. Finally Biology revealed new realms of what we now can mae as nothing but Chance beyond the area of conscious mind. Sociology has been by-passed, and reduced to Social Work.

THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

39-46-21

In the fall of 1896, I went to the University of Pennsylvania as "Assistant Instructor" in Sociology. It all happened this way: Philadelphia, then and still one of the worst governed of America's badly governed cities, was having one of its periodic spasms of reform. A thorough study of causes was called for. Not bnt what the underlying cause was evident to most whites Philadelphians: the corrupt, semi-criminal vote of the Negro Seventh Ward. Everyone agreed that here lay the cancer; but would it not be well to give scientific sanction to the known causes by an investigation, with imprimateur of the University? It certainly would, answered Samuel McCune Lindsay of the Department of Sociology. And he put his finger on me for the task.

If Lindsay had been a smaller man and had been induced to follow the usual American pattern of treating Negroes, he would have asked me to assist him as his clerk in this study. Probably I would have accepted having nothing better in sight for work in sociology. But Lindsay regarded me as a scholar in my own right and probably proposed to make me an instructor. Evidently the faculty demurred at having a colored instructor. But since I had a Harvard Ph.D., and had published a recognized work in history, the University could hardly offer me a fellowship. A compromise was hit on and I was nominated to the unusual status of "assistant" instructor. Even at that there must have been some opposition, for the invitation was not particularly cordial. I was offered a salary of $900 for a period limited to one year. I was given no real academic standing, no office at the University, no official recognition of any kind; my ~~name was eventually omitted from the catalogue;~~ I had no contact with students, and very little with members of the faculty, even in my own department.

I did not hesitate an instant but reported for duty with a complete plan of work and outline of methods and aims and even proposed schedules to be filled out. My general plan was promptly accepted and I started to work, consulting Lindsay regularly but never meeting the faculty.

The Provost of the University furnished the following credentials:

"In connection with the College Settlement, the Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania have undertaken the study of the social condition of the Colored People of the Seventh Ward of Philadelphia. The University has entered upon this work as a part of its duty and wishes to make the investigation as thorough and exact as possible. We want to know precisely how this class of people live; what occupation they follow; from what occupations they are excluded; how many of their children go to school; and to ascertain every fact which will throw light upon this social problem; and then having this information and these accurate statistics before us, to see to what extent and in what way, proper remedies may be applied. Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois is the investigator on behalf of the University, and I write to bespeak for him your cordial reception and earnest co-operation."

39-46-22

The two years at Wilberforce had been my uneasy apprenticeship, and with my advent into the University of Pennsylvania, I began a more clearly planned career which had an unusual measure of success, but was in the end pushed aside by forces which, if not entirely beyond my control, were yet of great weight.

The opportunity opened at the University of Pennsylvania seemed just what I wanted. I had offered to teach social science at Wilberforce (where I had been teaching) outside of my overloaded program, but I was not allowed. (nevertheless) My vision was becoming clearer. The Negro problem was in my mind a matter of systematic investigation and intelligent understanding. The world was thinking wrong about race, because it did not know. The ultimate evil was stupidity. The cure for it was knowledge based on scientific study.

At the University of Pennsylvania I ignored the pitiful stipend. It made no difference to me that I was put down as an "assistant instructor" and even at that, that my name never actually got into the catalogue; it goes without saying that I did no instructing save once to pilot a pack of idiots through the Negro slums.

Of the theory back of the plan of this study of Negroes I neither knew nor cared. I saw only here a chance to study an historical group of black folk and to show exactly what their place was in the community. I did it despite extraordinary difficulties both within and without the group. Whites said: Why study the obvious? Blacks said: Are we animals to be dissected and by an unknown Negro at that? Yet, I made a study of the Philadelphia Negro so thorough that it has withstood the criticism of sixty years.

I counted my task here as simple and clear-cut; I proposed to find out what was the matter with this areaand why. I started with no "research methods" and I asked little advice as to procedure. Theproblem lay before me. Study it. I studied it personally and not by Proxy. I sent out no canvassers. I went myself. Personally I visited and talked with five thousand persons. What I could, I set down in orderly sequence on schedules which I made out and submitted to the University for criticism. Other information I stored in my memory or wrote out as memoranda. I went through the Philadelphia libraries for data, gained access in many instances to private libraries of colored folk and got individual information. I mapped the district, classifying it by condition; I compiled two centuries of the history of the Negro in Philadelphia and in the Seventh Ward.

It would have been a fine thing if after this difficult, successful piece of work, the University of Pennsylvania had at least offered me a temporary instructorship in the college or in the Wharton School. Harvard had never dreamed of such a thing: a half century later one of Harvard's professors said of a gifted Negro student: "We'd give him a position if he were not a Negro!" ~~White~~

Eventually this brilliant man after serving in UNESCO successfully, committed suicide. What these institutions could not understand was that what I wanted was not a position in a white college, but a chance to teach Negro students on a high scientific level.

classmates of lower academic rank than I, became full professors at Pennsylvania and Chicago. Here in my case an academic accolade from a great American university would have given impetus to my life work which I was already determined to make in a Negro institution in the South. The thing that galled was that such an idea never even occurred to this institution whose head was a high official of the Sugar Trust. But I did not mention this rebuff. I did not let myself think of it. But then, as now, I know an insult when I see it.

39-46-25

At the end of that study, I announced with a certain pride my plan of studying the complete Negro problem in the United States. I spoke at the forty-second meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences in Philadelphia, November 19, 1897, and my subject was "The Study of the Negro Problems." I began by asserting that in the development of sociological study there was at least one positive answer which years of research and speculation had been able to return, and that was : "The phenomena of society are worth the most careful and systematic study, and whether or not this study may eventually lead to a systematic body of knowledge deserving the name of science, it cannot in any case fail to give the world a mass of truth worth the knowing." I then defined and tried to follow the development of the Negro problem not as one problem, but "rather a plexus of social problems, some new, some old, some simple, some complex; and these problems have their one bond of unity in the fact that they group themselves about those Africans whom two centuries of slave-trading brought into the land."

I insisted on the necessity of carefully studying these problems and said: "The American Negro deserves study for the great end of advancing the cause of No such opportunity to watch and measure the history and development of a great race of men ever presented itself to the scholars of a modern nation. If they miss this opportunity -- if they do the work in a slip-shod, unsystematic manner -- if they dally with the truth to humor the whims of the day, they do far more than hurt the good name of the American people; they hurt the cause of scientific truth the world over, they voluntarily decrease human knowledge of a universe of which we are ignorant enough, and they degrade the high end of truth-seeking in a day when they need more and more to dwell upon its sanctity."

39-46-26

Finally I tried to lay down a plan for the study, postulating only: that the Negro "is a member of the human race, and as one who, in the light of history and experience is capable to a degree of improvement and culture, is entitled to have his interests considered according to his numbers in all conclusions astto the common weal."

Dividing the prospective scientific study of the Negro into two parts: the social group and his peculiar social environment, I proposed to study the social group by historical investigation, statistical measurement and sociological interpretation. Particularly with regard to anthropology, I said;

"That there are differences between the white and black races is certain, but just what those differences are is known to none with an approach to accuracy. Yet here in America is the most remarkable opportunity ever offered of studying these differences, of noting influences of climate and physical environment, and particularly of studying the effect of amalgamating two of the most diverse races in the world -- another subject which rests under acloud of ignorance."

In concluding, I said:

"It is to the credit of the University of Pennsylvania that she has been the first to recognise her duty in this respect and in so far as restricted means and opportunity hälowed, has attempted to study the Negro problems in a single definite locality. This work needs to be extended to other groups, and carried out with larger system; and here it would seem is the opportunity of the Southern Negro college. We hear much of higher Negro education, and yet all candid people know there does not exist today in the center of Negro population a single first-class fully equipped institution, devoted to the higher education of Negroes; not more than three Negro institutions in the South deserve the name of 'college' at all; and yet what is a Negro college but a vast college settlement for the study of a particular set of peculiarly baffling problems?

"What more effective or suitable agency could be found in which to focus the scientific efforts of the great universities of North and East, than an institution situated in the very heart of these social problems, and made the center of careful historical and statistical research? Without doubt the first effective step toward the solving of the Negro question will be the endowment of a Negro college which is not merely a teaching body, but a center of sociological research, in close connection and co-operation with Harvard, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and University of Pennsylvania.

"Finally the necessity must again be emphasized of keeping clearly before students the object of all science, amid the turmoil and intense feeling that clouds the discussion of a burning social question. We live in a day when in spite of the brilliant accomplishments of a remarkable century, there is current much flippant criticism of scientific work; when the truth-seeker is too often pictured as devoid of human sympathy, and careless of human ideals. We are still prone in spite of all our culture to sneer at the heroism of the laboratory while we cheer the swagger of the street broil. At such times true lovers of humanity can only hold higher the pure ideals of science, and continue to insist that if we would solve a problem we must study it, and there is but one coward on earth and that is the coward that dare not know."

From the University of Pennsylvania I went to Atlanta University in 1896 and stayed thirteen years until 1910.

39-46-28

The main significance of my work at Atlanta University, during the years 1897 to 1910 was the development at an American institution of learning, of a program of study on the problems affecting the American Negroes, covering a progressively widening and deepening effort designed to stretch over the span of a century. This program was grafted on an attempt by George Bradford of Boston, o one of the trustees, to open for Atlanta University a field of usefulness for city Negroes comparable to what Hampton and Tuskegee were doing for rural districts s in agriculture and industry. At the Hampton and Tuskegee Conferences, there came together annually and in increasing numbers, workers, experts and observers to encourage by speeches and interchange of experience the Negro farmers and laborers of adjoining areas. Visitors, white and colored, from North and South, joined to advise and learn. Mr. Bradford's idea was to establish at Atlanta a similar conference, devoted especially to problems of city Negroes. The first conference, emphasizing particularly Negro health problems, was held in 1896. Immediately the University looked about for a man to teach history and political science, and take charge of future conferences. I was chosen.

When I took charge of the Atlanta Conference, I did not pause to consider how far my developed plans agreed or disagreed with the ideas of the already launched project. It made little essential difference, since only one conference had been held and a second planned. These followed the Hampton and Tuskegee model of being primarily meetings of inspiration, directed toward specific efforts at social reform and aimed at propaganda for social uplift in certain preconceived lines. This program at Atlanta, I sought to swing as on a pivot to one of scientific investigation into social conditions, primarily for scientific ends: I put no special emphasis on special reform effort, but increasing and widening emphasis on the collection of a basic body of fact concerning the social condition of American Negroes, endeavoring to reduce the condition to exact measurement whenever or wherever occasion permitted. As time passed, it happened that many uplift efforts were in fact based on our studies: the kindergarten system of the city of Atlanta, white as well as black; the Negro Business League, and various projects to better health and combat crime. We came to be however, as I had intended, increasingly, a source of general information and a basis for further study, rather than an organ of social reform.

The proverbial visitor from Mars would have assumed as elemental a study in America of American Negroes -- as physical specimens; as biological growths; as a field of investigation in economic development from slave to free labor; as a psychological laboratory in human reaction toward caste and discrimination; as an unique case of physical and cultural intermingling. These and a dozen other subjects of scientific interest, would have struck the man from Mars as eager lines of investigation for American social scientists. He would have been astounded to learn that the only institution in America in 1900 with any such program of study was Atlanta University, where ona budget of $5000 a year, including salaries, cost of publication, investigation and annual meetings, we were essaying this pioneer work.

My program for the succession of conference studies was modified by many considerations: cost, availability of suitable data, tested methods of investigation; moreover I could not plunge too soon into such controversial subjects as politics or miscegenation. Within these limitations, I finished a ten-year cycle study as follows:

1896, Mortality among Negroes in Cities

1897, Social and Physical Condition of Negroes in Cities

1898, Some Efforts of Negroes for Social Betterment

1899, The Negro in Business

1900, The College-Bred Negro

1901, The Negro Common School

1902, The Negro Artisan

1903, The Negro Church

1904, Notes on Negro Crime

1905, A Select Bibliography of the American Negro

I then assayed for the second decade a broader program, more logical, more inclusive, and designed to bring the whole subject matter into a better integrated whole. But continued lack of funds, and outside diversions (like the request of the Carnegie Institution of 1907 for a study of cooperation) kept even the second decade from the complete logic of arrangement which I desired; finally, my leaving Atlanta in 1910 and at last ~~the~~ the severing of my connection with the conference in 1914, left ~~the~~ the full form of my program still unfinished. I did, however publish the following eight studies:

39-46-30

1906, Health and Physique of the Negro American

With the publication of 1914, my connection with Atlanta ceased for twenty years. Although studies and publications were prepared by others at the University in 1915 and 1918, the war finally stopped the enterprise.

What I was laboriously but steadily approaching in this effort was a recurring cycle of ten studies in succeeding decades; with repetition of each subject or some modification of it in each decade, upon a progressively broader and more exact basis and with better method; until gradually a foundation of carefully ascertained fact would build a basis of knowledge, broad and sound enough to be called scientific in the best sense of that term.

Just what form this dream would eventually have taken, I do not know. So far as actually forecast, it had assumed in 1914, some such form as this:

1. Population, Distribution and Growth
2. Biology: Health and Physique
3. Socialization: Family, Group and Class
4. Cultural Patterns: Morals and Manners
5. Education
6. Religion and the Church
7. Crime
8. Law and Government
9. Literature and Art
10. Summary and Bibliography

39-46-31

I proposed as I have said, to repeat each of these every ten years, basing the studies on ever broader and more carefully gathered data. Eventually I hoped to keep all the inquiries going simultaneously, only emphasising and reporting on one particular subject each year. This would have allowed some necessary shifting or combination of subjects as time and developments might suggest; and adjustments to new scientific advance in fields like anthropology and psychology. The plan would have called in time for a large and well-paid staff of experts and a study of method and testing of results such as no group of Americans were engaged in at the time; beginning with a definite, circumscribed group, but ending with the human race.

The program however was weak on its economic side. It did not stress enough the philosophy of Marx and Engels and was of course far too soon for Lenin. The program ought to have been - and as I think would have been if I had kep on this work - the Economic development of the American Negro slave; on this central thread all the other subjects would have been strung. But this I had no chance to essay.

Social scientists at the time were thinking in terms of theory and vast and eternal laws, but I had a concrete group of loving beings artificially set off by themselves and capable of almost laboratory experiment. I laid down an ambitious program for a hundred years of study. I proposed to take up annually in each decade the main aspects of the group life of Negroes with as thorough study and measurement as possible.

and repeat the same program in the succeeding decade with additions, changes and better methods. In this way, I proposed gradually to broaden and intensify the study, sharpen the tools of investigation and perfect our methods of work, so that we would have an increasing body of scientifically ascertained fact, instead of the vague mass of the so-called Negro problems. And through this laboratory experiment I hoped to make the laws of social living clearer, surer, and more definite.

Some of this was accomplished, but of course only an approximation of the idea. For thirteen years we poured forth a series of studies, limited, incomplete, only partially conclusive, and yet so much better done than any other attempt of the sort in the nation that they gained attention throughout the world. In all we published a total of 2,172 pages which formed a current encyclopedia on the American Negro problems.

These studies with all their imperfections were widely distributed in the libraries of the world and used by scholars. It may be said without undue boasting that between 1896 and 1920 there was no study of the race problem in America made which did not depend in some degree upon the investigations made at Atlanta University; often they were widely quoted and commended.

I had heartening letters from persons of eminence and character. William James wrote in 1907: "I have just looked through the last installment of your studies on the American Negro. I wish the portraits might have been better printed. But it is splendid scientific work." Frank Taussig of Harvard wrote the same year: "In my judgement no better work is being done in the country, and no better opportunity is afforded for financial support on the part of those who wish to further the understanding of the Negro problem." Booker Washington, who spoke at our conference on on the Negro artisan in 1911, said: "The whole country should be grateful to this institution for the painstaking and systematic manner in which it has developed from year to year a series of facts which are proving most vital and helpful to the interests of our nation." Professor E.R.A. Seligman wrote: "I take great pleasure in testifying to my very high appreciation of the studies on the Negro proglem which you have been editing for the past few years. They are essentially scholarly and that means sober and temperate, and they are covering a field which is almost untilled and which is not apt to be cultivated by others." Jane Addams attended our conference in 1908 and commended our work.

Many periodicals mentioned our work:

London Spectator, 1900:

This work is being done with much intelligence, discrimination and assiduity at the instance and under the inspiration of Atlanta University.

School Review, 1902:

The work of this conference is constructive and merits hearty support.

Outlook, 1903:

No student of the race problem, no person who would either think or speak upon it intelligently, can afford to be ignorant of the facts brought out in the Atlanta series of sociological studies of the conditions and the progress of the Negro.

39-46-33

Publications of the Southern History Association, 1904:

The work done under the direction of the Atlanta Conference is entitled to the respectful and thoughtful consideration of every man interested in any aspect of the life of the American Negro.

South Atlantic Quarterly, 1904:

They constitute, so far as the reviewer can learn, the most important body of direct evidence ever published as to moral and religious conditions of our colored people.

N.Y. Evening Post, 1905:

The only scientific studies of the Negro question being made today are those carried on by Atlanta University.

It must be remembered that the significance of these studies lay not so much in what they were actually able to accomplish, as in the fact that at the time of their publication Atlanta University was the only institution in the world carrying on a systematic study of the Negro and his development, and putting the result in a form available for the scholars of the world.

In 1909 I tried to start an "Encyclopedia Africana" and secured as members of the board of advisers the following distinguished scholars:

Sir Harry Johnston, K.C.B., England
Prof. W.M. Flinders Petrie, D.C.L., England
William Archer, Esq., England
Miss Alice Werner, England
Dr. Francis Hoggan, England
Prof. Giuseppi Sergi, Italy
Dr. Karl Weule, Germany
Dr. J. Deniker, France
Major R.M. Daniel, Bechuanaland, Africa
Prof. A. B. Hart, L.L.D., Harvard
Prof. William James, L.L.D., Harvard
Prof. Hugo Munsterberg, L.L.D., Harvard
President G. Stanley Hall, L.L.D., Clark
Prof. A. F. Chamberlain, Ph.D., Clark
Prof. Franz Boas, Ph.D., Columbia

Sixty-two Negro scholars were on the Editorial Board, including:

Kelley Miller, A.M., (Howard)
H.O. Tanner, France
Richard T. Greener, A.B., Harvard
Charles W. Chesnutt
John R. Lynch, U.S. Army
W. S. Scarborough, L.L.D., Oberlin

and many others. I never was able to raise funds to carry this enterprise further forward.

In 1900 came a significant occurence which not until lately have I set in its proper place in my life. I had been for over nine years studying the American Negro Problem. The result had been significant because of its unusual nature and not for its positive accomplishment. I wanted to set down its aim and method in some outstanding way which would bring my work to the notice of the thinking world. The great World Fair at Paris was being planned and I thought I might put my findings into plans, charts and figures, so one might see what we were trying to accomplish. I got a couple of my best students and put a series of facts into charts: the size and growth of the Negro American group; its division by age and sex; its distribution, education and occupations; its books and periodicals. We made a most interesting set of drawings, limned on pasteboard cards about a yard square and mounted on a number of movable standards. The details of finishing these fifty or more charts, in colors, with accuracy, was terribly difficult with little money, limited time and not too much encouragement. I was threatened with nervous prostration before I was done and had little money left to buy passage to Paris, nor was there a cabin left for sale. But the exhibit would fail unless I was there. So at the last moment I bought passage in the steerage and went over and installed the work. It was an immediate success. It occupied a small room, perhaps twenty feet square but the room was always full. The American press, white and colored was full of commendation and in the end, the end, the exhibit received a Grand Prize, and I, as its author, a Gold Medal.

39-46-35

About the same time, I approached the United States Commissioner of Labor. For several years I had been able to do now and then certain small studies for the Bureau of Labor, which had been accepted and paid for. It began with a proposal to Carroll D. Wright in 1897 for a study of the Negro in a Virginia town in 1898, which Mr. Wright authorized me to make on my own responsibility, promising only to print it if he like it. He did like it. This was followed by a major study of the Negro in the Black Belt in 1899 and among Negroes in Georgia in 1901, and I thsn approached the Bureau with a new proposal.

I asked United States Commissioner of Labor, Neill, in 1906, to authorize a study of a Black Belt community. I wanted to take Lowndes County, Alabama, in a former slave state with a large majority of Negroes, and make a social and economic study from the earliest times when documents were available, down to the present; supplemented by studies of official records and a present house-to-house canvass of Negroes. I plied Commissioner Neill with plans and specifications until at last he authorized the study. Helped by Monroe Work, of Tuskegee Institute, and R. R. Wright, now a bishop of the A.M.E. Church, and a dozen or more local employees, I settled at the Calhoun School and began the study.

It was carried on with all sorts of difficulties, including financing which was finally arranged by loans from the University, and with the greeting of some of my agents with shotguns in certain parts of the county; but it was ~~eventually finished by hand with no~~

eventually finished. The difficult schedules were tabulated and I made chronological maps of the division of the land; I considered the distribution of labor; the relation of landlord and tenant; the political organization and the family life and the distribution of the population. The report was finished by hand with no copy, and rushed to Washington. It was criticized and I spent some weeks there in person, revising a nd perfecting it. It was finally accepted by the government, and $2,000 paid for it, most of which went back to the University in repayment of funds which they had kindly furnished me to carry on the work. But the study was not published. I knew the symptoms of this sort of treatment: in 1898, S.S. McClure had sent me to south Georgia to make a study of social situations there. He paid for the report but never published the manuscript and he afterward did the same thing in the case of Sir Harry Johnston.

I finally approached the Bureau and tried to find out when it would be published and was told that the Bureau had decided not to publish the manuscript, since it "touched on political matters." I was astonished and disappointed, but after a year I went back to them again and asked if they would allow me to have the manuscript since they were not going to use it. They told me it had been destroyed!

It was of course crazy for me to dream that America, in the dawn of the Twentieth Century with Colonial Imperialism, based on the suppression of colored folk, at its zenith, would encourage, much less adequately finance, such a program at a Negro college under Negro scholars. My faith in its success was based on the firm belief that race prejudice was based on widespread ignorance. My long-term remedy was Truth: carefully gathered scientific proof that neither color nor race determined the limits of a man's capacity or desert. I was not at the time sufficiently Freudian to understand how little human action is based on reason; nor did I know Karl Marx well enough to appreciate the economic foundations of human history.

I was therefore astonished and infinitely disappointed, gradually to realize that our work in the Atlanta conferences was not getting support; that, far from being able to command increased revenue for better methods of investigation and wider fields, it was with increasing difficulty that the aging and overworked President, with his deep earnestness and untiring devotion to principle, could collect enough to maintain even our normal activities. The conference had not been without a measure of success. Our reports were widely read and commented upon. On the other hand, so far as the American world of science and letters was concerned, we never "belonged"; we remained unrecognized in learned societies and academic groups. We rated merely as Negroes studying Negroes, and after all what had Negroes to do with America or Science? Gradually and with deep disappointment I began to realize, as early as 1906, that my program for studying the Negro problems must soon end, unless it received unforeseen support.

By the second decade of the Twentieth Century, a legal caste system based on race and color, had been openly grafted on the democratic constitution of the United States. This explains why, in 1910, I gave up my position at Atlanta University and became Director of Publications and Research for the newly formed National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of which I was one of the incorporators in 1911.

From 1910 to 1934 I gave up almost entirely my attempt at making a scientific study of the Negro problems in America and devoted myself to propaganda in oder to convince Americans, black and white, that they must make a serious ethical effort to correct the wrong interest in the Negro problems and try to stop lynching and mob violence, encourage education, enforce the laws and make new laws. From 1910 to 1934 I carried on this work in cooperation with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and as editor of a small monthly magazine called the Crisis which eventually reached a circulation of 100,000.

The Crisis, however, depended upon subscriptions for support and when the great depression fell upon the land the working people, especially the Negroes, were unable to support the Crisis further. I therefore resigned the editorship af the little magazine and turned again back to my attempt at scientific work in solution of race problems. I was induced to do this because my close friend John Hope had become President of a new Atlanta University which was a graduate school connected with several undergraduate colleges. It was endowed by the General Education Board and it seemed probable tha there could now arise in the South an institution of learning under the control of colored teachers which could have become a center of a new sociology of race problems.

In one aspect of the Negro problem in America, my program had limited success; that was its relation to the white working class. The Negroes were working folk -- farmers, laborers, proters and servants. They belonged in the main to the "Have-nots" as over against the "Haves." Yet they were not regarded as an integral part of the American workers and I as a student of their plight and their efforts was continually treating them as a separate class instead of grouping them with the mass of workers. This was not because of any failure on my part to conceive of the Negroes as primarily workers whose chief interest lay in the working class. The fault lay at the door of the powerful forces in the state which had separated the working class into antagonistic groups hating and fearing each other more than they fea ed their exploiters. In slavery days the poor whites hated and feared the black slaves. These slaves deprived the free white workers of land and livelihood; drove them to the hills and barrens or to the slums of cities; they were largely disfranchised and managed to make a living by fawning on slaveowners, becoming slave over-seers or bearing arms to keep black slaves from revolt. They protested bitterly against this condition.

To these poor whites, emancipation seemed not an opportunity for Negroes to rise to the status of free white workers, but rather the chance of white labor to climb on the backs of Negroes. The freedmen therefore was not only exploited by former slaveowners but even more by the up-struggling whites; and when white workers got the vote --blacks were disfranchised . A cast legislation put the Negro legally under the feet of the white workers, limiting his work, his wages, his dwelling place and his personal freedom. In the eyes of the Negro the white worker became his chief enemy; he led the lynch mobs, insulted him on the streets and took the food out of his mouth.

The mass of the Northern working class opposed slavery and wanted slaves emancipated. But they were largely foreign emigrants and many like the Irish met the competition of free Negro workers on arrival and fought for work in pitched battles. The newer emigrants were warned against Negro cheap competing labor and did not regard these dark strangers as fellow workmen. Employers threw white and black into competing groups. So that the National Labor Union representing the best of American labor, despite its brave repudiation of color discrimination was unable in 1869 to secure admission of Negro workers into unions. Negroes rebuffed, tried to form their own unions but had to start with the demand for political power. For this they depended onthe Republican party and that party reduced them to serfdom in 1876. The Northern Unions in tight craft organizations so segregated the Negro worker that in 1902, the older trades like miners, longshoremen and cigarmakers admitted Negroes; but the newer and better paid trades, like blacksmiths, smelters, engineers, metal workers, boilermakers, electric workers, glassmakers, oil workers, textile workers and a host of similar unions admitted in the new century few or no Negroes. When, therefore, I essayed to study the Negro worker, I had no meeting ground with the white laboring class. I invited the secretary of the Georgia Federation of Labor to our conference and he spoke but his hearers knew that his federation discriminated against Negroes. We studied Negro employees in Southern factories. We corresponded with all the unions in the nation but with small result. The American working class remained split by the color line. My study therefore became a study not of a working class but of a small part of one and the relations of these groups became more important than relations between worker and employer.

39-46-40

In 1934 John Hope and I set out to revive the old Atlanta University conferences and studiesof the Negro Problems. Hope sought unsuccessfully to obtain funds for this enterprise. After his death I tried to see if some co-operative plan might supply funds. Frederick Keppell of the Carnegie Foundation gave us money for preliminary work in 1940 and 1941. I called the "First Phylon Conference" in April 1941. A good cross section of Negro leaders in education attended. Reports were made from each state on the economic conditions of Negroes. I tried to sum up the current conditions in this statements

I. a. If thirteen millionpeople starve to death, it is because they are stupid.

b. Many American Negroes today are virtually starving.

II. a. There is no such thing as lack of useful,needful work.

b. There is wide and dangerous lack of adequate wage and income for certain individuals.

III. a. Facing these paradoxes the world is changing its economic organization today to meet them and is planning further change.

b. We as a minority group must plan also, not in opposition but in intelligent accord with this general world planning.

IV. a. We must especially beware of propaganda and distortion as to the present economic conditions and changes in the world.

1. We must not assume that business enterprise and economic welfare are synonomous terms and assume that because a business is profitable it is for that reason beneficial to the race or nation.

2. We must not assume that because racial organization cannot hire thirteen million Negroes, it cannot and should not hire thirteen thousand or more.

3. Because, as a minority group, we must in the main conform to the national economic patterns, is no proof that we cannot by intelligent action influence these patterns to our advantage.

39-46-41

V. a. Finally, we must get at the facts by the latest scientific technique.

b. We must gather, study, test, and interpret these facts.

c. We must remember that the starvation of Negroes in the United States benefits nobody; that full employment at a living wage for all Negroes as well as allwhites is at once the greatest patriotism and the greatest defense against war and evil.

~~Atlanta University did not have funds to undertake any movement for investigation and publication, so~~ I visited Negro institutions from Virginia to Texas in order to see what co-operation I could start.

I became convinced of several things: first, the role of the government-supported land grant colleges in the development of Negro education was going to be large and progressively increasing. Second, these land-grant colleges needed a program for social science studies which is at present undeveloped.

Third, rapid changes are now taking place in the Negro ethnic group and even more momentous ones impend. The 2nd World War has upset conventional economy, exacerbated racial consciosness and already led to bitter clashes. The developments after the war are bound to add to these difficulties. There is one and only one fundamental and definitive way to meet this situation and that is to begin a systematic study of the essential facts of the present condition of the Negro race and to establish a way of continuing and making more complete and effective such a study. Then in the event the nation can turn its attention and energies to remedial measures, it will not be necessary to waste time in belated efforts to get at the essential truth.

39-46-42

Careful and exact knowledge of conditions and changes then are imperative and ought to be in process of gathering now in order to be available during and after the war. Fourth, this should not be the conventional type of "social study" --an instantaneous photograph of a sample group; but should be planned so as eventually to approach the stature of a total study of a complete situation, continuously photographed, and re-photographed, measured and re-measured; so that our knowledge of the vast and momentous social experiment in race relations now making in the United States, would attain a completeness and authority that would be unquestioned and unquestionable and available in the post war world which will surely need this sort of information. I believe that here is a chance not only to serve the Negro race and America, but also to serve the world and social science in an unique way. Fifth, the Negro Land-Grant Colleges, distributed usually one to a state and manned by presidents chosen by boards of Southern whites, would in many respects be ideal centers of social studies in each state, on matters touching the condition in each state of the people for whom the school exists and for whose advancement the school was established. Each of these schools has proclaimed its aim to be the promotion of industry and lifting the social status of Negroes. Any such program needs exact knowledge of facts for its foundation.

Sixth, such studies to be effective must be well done and in accord with the latest scientific technique. They must not sink to mere propaganda nor white-washing. Most of the land grant colleges are not at present equipped with personnel or funds for this work; a few are. All need expert advice and guidance, to integrate, synchronize and direct this work, and help in the proper interpretation of its results. Seventh, here is where the Negro private institution of higher learning could well cooperate with the states and call to aid the advice of other universities, north and south.

Three Negro universities seem best fitted for this work of guidance and integration: Howard, which holds to the federal government a position analagous to that of the land grant colleges to the states; Fisk, which has among Negroes the best equipped department of social sciences in the South; Atlanta, where the first attempt was made in America to carry on a scientific study of the Negro problems.

My first step toward realizing this project was to seek to sell the idea to the Negro land grant colleges. I talked the plan over with President Banks of Prairie View, who was a former student of mine; who, as I knew, had long had some such collaboration in mind, and who had the best social science department among Negro land grant colleges. He was enthusiastically in favor. I then secured permission to present the scheme to the annual conference of the presidents of Negro land grant colleges at Chicago, November, 1941.

In 1935, the Federal Government was giving $18,000,000 annually to land grant colleges in Southern states which had colleges separated by race. Negroes forming over a fifth of the population of these states received only about five per cent of this money. For some time the Negro colleges had been pressing for a larger share, but the reply had been that such work as research in agriculture or chemistry was being carried on in the white colleges and that it was not necessary to duplicate this work in Negro institutions. It occurred to me that a careful program of race studies planned for the Negro colleges might be the basis for a demand for a much larger share of Federal funds. I therefore addressed the organization of Negro Land Grant College Presidents in October, 1941. I said

"With a comparatively small group like that of the American Negro, in a country of great economic efficiency like America, and spurred by every high incentive, there is no real reason why cultivated brains among us may not guide the great mass of our folk to desired economic and cultural ends. This, of course, depends on the extent to which these potential leaders have the will to sacrifice their talent to this end; and also on the actual knowlege which they possess to guide the mass toward real progress and not back to out-worn reaction.

"The problem before us is this: to put fourteen million people to work so that they may recive an income which will insure a civilized standard of living; to make it possible for them to preserve their health; to keep crime down to a minimum and to educate their children; with the eventual object of giving this group sufficient leisure to advance by means of talented persons among them in science and art and cultural patterns. And with the further idea that in so far as these objects are successful, the group will become nearer to actual equality with their fellow Americans and to civilized people the world over, and will thus remove from color prejudice a very real reason for its perpetuation.

"How can the college help the community earn a living? First, it can train students for existent needs, for which the community now pays. Sometimes educational philosophers talk as though this were the one end of the college; and a situation could be easily imagined where that might be pretty nearly true; where you have settled normal culture and an arrangement of work which is suitable for that culture; and relatively stable economic organization. Under these circumstances if a college trained men efficiently for these jobs and at the same time supplied a broad cultural outlook toward the future it would come near doing its main work.

"The college today, however, must do more --far more--than prepare men for jobs at present in demand and socially needful. The college must anticipate the future needs of the community and prepare education to meet them.

"Unless the college goes further than training for current jobs and goes out to meet and cooperate with the community in such a way that the man awaiting and prepared to do a necessary future work for the community can be employed now according to his capacity; unless this is done, the college program is fatally handicapped and the community expanision is crippled. The same thing applies to work which although needed is not now available for Negroes and may not be during the present generation. In that case a careful survey of the possibilities among fourteen million people might give an opportunity to create such jobs within our own group or by cooperation with others. This even more than the other case, involves a broad study of the economic conditions among Negroes and possibilities of their organisations. It would call not simply for the efforts of one college with its immediate community or its state, but the cooperative efforts of the Negro educational institutions of the South.

"This leads us to the fact that if the college is to make real and advantageous approach to its community, either its local or its general community, it must be helped by a careful, broad and continuous study of the social and economic set-up of that community; that is, we must know as we do not know today, the existing occupations of Negroes; not in the vague and general and necessarily inaccurate report of the decennial census, but by minute and complete survey and study of counties, towns and cities where the Negro po pulation is resident. We must take such a beginning as Charles Johnson's regional study of Southern counties, extend the data to 1940 and then complete it and carry it on continuously from year to year. We must have a group to group and person to person knowledge of the condition of the laboring masses, of their opportunities and hindrances. And this kind of study ought to be made in accordance with the latest scientific techniques and on a national basis. There is no reason why a study like that of Allison Davis, "The Deep South", should not be made over the whole South so that we could paint with descriptions, facts and figures, the real social condition of the American Negro. The interpretation of this knowledge and its interaction with past history and current trends must be the continuously and critically examined conclusions of the best trained students of the social sciences. We must not depend on the narrow experience and conventional standards of business men; we must not resort to untried panaceas or emotional utopias. This study must be increasingly a matter of science, carried out to its inexorable and tested conclusions.

"We need in sociology, a race regionalism which will narrow and concentrate on our Negroes the general regional studies of the South. Instead of the occasional snapshot of social conditions which was the social study of yesterday, we must aim at a continuous moving picture of ever increasing range and accuracy.

"A national planning institute must annually gather up and compare and interpret this great body of facts. There must be provided for this work, sufficient research. And finally through a central office, there must be wide and carefully edited publication of results.

"It is not only illogical but it is an indictment of the Negro college that the chief studies of the Negro's condition today are not being done by Negroes and Negro colleges. The center of gravity as well as the truth of investigation should be brought back to the control of an association of Negro colleges; and this not for the purpose of creating aNegro science or purely racial facts; but in order to make sure that the whole undistorted picture is there and that the complete interpretation is made by those most competent to do it, throught their own lives and training.

"Under the leadership of these same colleges, the communities must proceed to act, explore, experiment and build. They must organize their spending power to the last dollar, realizing that a carefully and intelligently spent dollar is a more powerful ballot than a vote for a coroner. Advantage must be taken of decentralized cheap power like the TVA to push a new era of home manufactures and producers' cooperation. The churches can branch into real social work; they might oganize free legal defense for every accused Negro; the secret orders can further transform their regalias, rituals, and parades into orphanages and student aid. We can have cooperative medicine and dentistry and field hospitals to replace private practice. We have an enormously fertile field for economic experiment; here on the threshold of a new industrial era. All it needs is scientific study, personal character and coordinated intelligence guided by the colleges. It is for the inception and carrying out of this program that I am appealing to you today."

I proposed that this body agree to the following general plan:

1. A continuous and intensive study of the Negroes of each Southern state by each of the Negro Land Grant Colleges.

2. Preparation for ability to do this scientifically by strengthening the division of Social Sciences in each institution (History, Political Science, Psychology, Anthropology, Sociology, Economics) and provision of time and funds for study and research.

3. Inauguration of a general program of subjects and methods of research, with annual conferences, at which experts and representatives of other colleges should be present. Periodical integration, interpretation and publication of results.

I suggested the following detailed program for each Land Grant College:

1. A division of the "Social Sciences," teaching History, Anthropology, Sociology, Economics, Psychology, Political Sciences.

2. The integration of this teaching into one closely articulated study of

A. History

History of Europe
History of Asia
History of Africa
History of America
History of the United States
History of the Negro people in:
    Africa
    South and Central America
    United States
    In each state.

B. Social Sciences

Social Institutions	)	(Modern world
Anthropology	)	(United States
Economic Organization	)	(among Americans
Government	)	(among Negroes
Psychological reactions	)	(among Negroes in this State

3. A study of the facts concerning the Negroes of the state by counties, subdivisions of counties, villages, towns, cities, wards, blocks and households. The study to be carried on by professors, instuctors, fellows, social workers, volunteers and affiliated organizations.

39-46-48

The study to include: number of individuals, family groups, character of homes, location of homes; occupation of persons, incomes, expenditures, age, marital relations, education, property and recreation.

4. The scope of this study will include the observation and measurement of all facts and situations which have to do with the status of the Negro population in the state; becoming as funds and facilities increase, more and more intensive and comprehensive, until at last it virtually means a checking of every Negro family in the state including their activities, institutions and organisations.

5. The study will use all available data as the basis of its work, including the federal census of 1940, all state censuses, all reports of the state, the county and its subdivisions, concerning education, occupation, dependency and delinquincy.

SPECIAL STUDIES OF

6. All organizations of Negroes or working with or for Negroes: details of work, including churches, lodges, cemeteries, clubs, etc; their property and budgets.

7. All business conducted by Negroes and among Negroes; character, amount, approximate money value.

8. Commercialized recreations, movies, billiard rooms, gambling, prostitution, etc.

39-46-49

9. Public recreation; parks, playgrounds, etc., number, upkeep.

10. The participation of Negroes in government as voters and officials; tax - payers, property holders; officials and administrative methods.

METHODS, INTERPRETATION AND PUBLICATION

11. The methods and scope of these studies to be outlined by an annual conference, with each college represented and outside experts.

12. The resulting studies to be collected, interpreted and made public for an annual state meeting and for appublic museum and laboratory of the social sciences with maps, charts, models.

13. All the college reports to be brought together, studied, tabulated, analyzed and interpreted and integrated into an annual joint report.

THE NORTHERN NEGRO

14. Arrangements to be entered into with private Negro instituions to join with departments of the social sciences in Northern colleges to make similar studies of northern Negroes.

RESULTANT BODY OF KNOWLEDGE

15. This body of knowledge, continuously added to, checked and reviewed; improved in method and object; tabulated, interpreted, and integrated, to be used as the basis of raising the standard of living and cultural pattern of American Negroes through education, work, law, and social action.

RESULTANT WORK FOR SOCIAL UPLIFT

16. For every social problem, institutional failure, or individual maladjustment made evident, located and measured, organizations will then attempt to discover or promote in the locality and state, remedies in EDUCATION: special kinds and specific methods; private, industrial, grup, state and national efforts.

SOCIAL UPLIFT WORK: by hiring thoroughly trained social workers; by group effort; by voluntary effort.

HEALTH: by physicians and dentists; by group medical care; by hospitalization; syphilis; by childbirth and child welfare efforts.

RECREATION: music, a folk theatre, playgrounds, library facilities, sports.

39-46-50

17. But of all these efforts, the college and community should concentrate their first and chief attention upon the problems of earning a living among Negroes, since these are fundamental to practically all other efforts. Attention should be paid especially to work now available, to openings for earning a living which may be made available, and for general economic re-organization, such as is involved in consumers' and producers' cooperation; whereby not only intelligent saving can be made in the expenditure of income, but that new occupations, especially in home industries and small manufactures, can be established among Negroes.

18. Every attempt should be made to use existing institutions and organizations among Negroes, for undertaking efforts at social reform as outlined above: churches, fraternal lodges, women's clubs, schools, and in many cases, private businesses, can be used for increasing employment, finding new employment, furnishing legal defense, furnishing direct relief, improving health, organizing recreation, furnishing student aid and promoting consumers' and producers' cooperation.

FIRST STEPS

19. An immediate attempt on the part of the college in each state to reorganize their budgets so as to provide a gradually increasing minimum of funds for this program:

A. For teaching the Social Sciences;

B. For giving trained teachers, time and funds for investigation.

C. For providing, at the earliest moment, for the employment of social workers and fellows for investigation and social uplift.

D. For a publication fund.

E. For laying down a present program with plans for future expansion.

20. Minimum requirements for initiating the program:

1. One or two teachers of History.
2. One of two teachers of Anthropology and Sociology.
3. One teacher of Economics.
4. One teacher of Psychology, with laboratory.
5. A teaching Fellow with some time and funds for field work.
6. A Social Worker with whole time for investigation and advice.

39-46-51

The Presidents of the Negro Land Grant Colleges received this proposal with favor and adopted this general plan, June 12, 1942:

To initiate a series of cooperative studies of the social condition of the American Negro and more especially of his economic situation during and after this war.

For this purpose they propose to use in their institutions the division of the Social Sciences including history, anthropology, sociology, economics, political science, psychology, and other cognate subjects so as to give their students unified knowledge of social conditions and modern trends.

In addition to this they propose to recommend the use of one or more of their qualified instructors, with sufficient time and funds for a series of social studies, whose subject, methods and scope shall be determined after conferences with executives and investigators in other institutions, and with outside experts in the social sciences, including students of conditions among the white population. This proposal is subject to the approval of the governing boards in the various states.

The ultimate object of such conferences and studies shall be to accumulate a body of knowledge, intensively pursued according to the best scientific methods, continuously added to, checked and reviewed; improved in method and object; tabulated, interpreted and integrated to be used as the basis of raising the standard of living and cultural pattern of American Negroes through education, work, law and social action.

We propose that the results of these studies by each college in its own state or section of state, shall be brought together, periodically compared, edited and published annually in some convenient form for the use of students legislators and social reformers.

For these purposes of conference, investigation and publication we propose to set aside in our annual budget such sums as may be approved by the various state authorities.

This was signed by the Presidents of 20 Negro Land Grant Colleges and eventually by the Presidents of Atlanta, Fisk and Howard. Representatives of War Production Board, the American Council of Education, the North Carolina Institute for Research in Social Science commended the plan as did School and Society and the Journal of Higher Education.

The Journal of Negro Education said in an article:

"Briefly, Dr. W.E. B. Du Bois' proposal, agreed upon by the Presidents of the Land Grant Colleges, assumes first a core of social studies in each of our Negro colleges and graduate schools. It assumes that by internal administrative and staff effort these may be internally unified and coordinated for a joint, continuous attack upon the problem of the study of the Negro population in the area surrounding each college. It assumes that, pouring into a central headquarters, yet to be designated, for review and analysis by a central board, yet to be chosen, there would be a continuous flow of raw data and completed studies. It assumes central coordination, synthesis and report of these studies. It assumes that by this great increase in knowledge, sound and rich and full, we would have materials wholly convincing as to the needs of local, regional, and national Negro populations. It assumes that with this knowledgewe could so increase our wisdom as to be able both to make Negro higher education very much better than it is in all aspects and we would have the facts at last on which to base valid requests for support from foundations, individuals, and local, state, and national governments. By knowing what the problems are we would know also how to arrange them in priorities and further , much better than we know now, how to attack them each in turn with some expectation of success.

39-46-53

The plan was finally implemented by this vote of the Conference of Negro Land Grant College Presidents on October 28, 1942:

1. That Dr. W.E. B. Du Bois be designated the official coordinator of the proposed sociological studies to be instituted by the various land grant colleges.
2. That each President appoint from his faculty a liason officer to serve as the agent for continued implementation of the project. This officer to report progress and seek further cooperation from the administration and faculty: preferably, though not necessarily, he should be a social scientist.
3. That each President agree to try to find funds in the college budget to permit attendance of liaison officer at a methodological conference to be called by Dr. Du Bois at a convenient time and place, after appropriate correspondence should have further clarified various issues.

4. That the Executive Committee at this meeting address itself to possible ways and means of further financing said study, conference or other aspectsof the program.

39-46-54

The 26th Atlanta University Conference met at Robert Hall, Morehouse College, Atlanta, April 19 and 20, 1943. It became the first conference of the Negro Land Grant Colleges, for coordinating aprogram of cooperative social studies. Among those present were:

E. Franklin Frazier, Library of Congress

Charles S. Johnson, Fisk University

Howard W. Odum, University of North Carolina

E. B. Reuter, University of Iowa

T. Lynn Smith, Louisiana State University

Edgar T. Thompson, Duke University

Donald Young, Social Service Research Council

Thirty four persons attended, representing thirty institutions. The sessionss lasted two days and consisted of exhibits, reports, addresses and conferences.

By special invitation , there were present at the conference, eight well-known sociologists, from leading American institutions. These persons, after observation and consultation, have written the following opinions on the possiblities of this agreement. The names are arranged in order of academic seniority.

Howard Washington Odum, Kenan Professor of Sociology, and Director of the Institute for Research in Social Science, University of North Carolina:

"It seems to me that in two or threeways a strong, integrated program for research in the land grant colleges would constitute an important step forward. In the first place, the area in which they work is still virgin and important, and their laboratories are adequate for genuine research and experimentation. They have a fine opportunity to combine the social studies with the physical sciences and to implement them in practical programs."

Edward Byron Reuter, Professor of Sociology and Chairman of the Department; College of Commerce, University of Iowa:

"The plan for cooperative studies to be carried on by the Negro Land Grant Colleges seems to me to be a very wise development and one that may lead to increasingly important results. It will make possible a pooling of resources -- of time, staff, and funds --to discover and make known information that now gets too little public notice."

Edward Franklin Frazier, Professor of Sociology and Head of Department, Howard University; Consultant in Negro bibliography, Library of Congress:

39-46-55

"To my mind, the Conference was significant because it represented the broadening and deepening of the stream of a great tradition which owes much to you. Moreover, the Conference was a distinct success in that it brought together and stimulated men and women who have generally been forced to work in isolation. Even if no other conferences were held, I am sure that many of those who attended this one would return to their work with a feeling that they were engaged in a worthwhile endeavor and that they had the support and appreciation of their fellow workers.

Charles Spurgeon Johnson, Director of the Department of Social Science, Fisk University; Trustee of the Julius Rosenwald Fund; Chairman of the Race Relations Committee of the American Missionary Association:

"The fact that so large a number of persons were present without direct financial aid from an outside source pointed to a reserve of interest that might be counted on to carry along a coordinated movement among the colleges. Not to be overlooked, however, is the prestige of an established and admired scholar in this field who has served as an effective catalyzing agent."

Donald Ramsey Young, Research Secretary of the Social Science Research Council:

"I have no doubt whatever concerning the value of your objective. There is need fpr the encouragement and guidance of social and economic research at the Land Grant Colleges, both in terms of the benefits which should be derived thereform by the institutions and their faculties and also in terms of the practical social utility of the anticipated results."

39-11-1

Edgar Tristram Thompson: Associate Professor of Sociology, Duke University: "I feel that you have a ood idea and that you deserve support in your efforts to carry it out. I appreciate your including me among the invited sociologists and I feel that my efforts to contribute to the conference have taught me something."

William Earle Cole, Professor of Sociology and Head of the Department, University of Tennessee; Acting Chairman of the Commission on Interracial Cooperation:

"I think you are starting somet ing which is very fundamental and which should go a long way in improving not only the Negroes of the South but other peoples as well. I was greatly impressed with what the Negro colleges have been doing and the prospects for the future."

Thomas Lynn Smith, Professor of Sociology and Head of the Department, University of Louisiana:

"I think well of your plan for promoting research work on the part of the social science personnel at the land grant colleges for Negroes.

"The advice of sociologists at institutions for whites should be sought from time to time as the work goes along; but not the extent that there is any tendency at any institution for the white man to determine, even by suggestion, what shall be done by the Negro."

A second Conference was planned for the Spring of 1944, and I wrote in July 1943:

"This whole plan will comeup for discussion and modification in the Second Land Grant College Conference in the Spring of 1944. The main consideration is this: The economic situation of the Negro during and after the present war is a matter of critical and vital importance. There is going to be increased race friction and finally want and unemployment in the midst of violent social change. At such time we want accurate and carefully made social measurements, tested techniques and the machinery for further investigation. There will be neither time nor disposition during times of turmoil to initiate new and calm investigation. If now we begin this nationwide study of economic and social conditions, it can be continuously pursued through storm and stress and after the post-war calm form a priceless guide to social survival and lasting peace."

39-11-2

Many other commendations came from across the nation, from white and black. Especially was the new cooperation among Negro institutions noted with Atlanta University as the acknowledged head and center of work.

Then at the moment of triumph of this carefully thought out and carefully planned scheme, came catastrophe. Without notice to me of any kind, I was retired from my professorship and headship of the department of Sociology at Atlanta University.

This was not merely a personal disaster. It was removing from leadership the one person who because of age and long experience; because of works published and a wide acquaintanceship based on the relation of teacher and student, happened to be the person to whom the presidents of Negro Land Grant Colleges and other Negroes of influence were willing to entrust this cooperative venture. President Clement of Atlanta University had quarrelled with the Land Grant Colleges a few years past. So that many of them did not like him personally. Most of the others did not know him but they did know Atanta University and they knew me. They were willing to put this plan into thse hands but they would not consent to co-operate with President Clement. There were doubtless at other Negro institutions persons capable of doing this job, but they were not as well known and in any case my selection gained unusual agreement and Atlanta University unprecedented prestige as the center of this venture.

My sudden retirement then savored of a deliberate plot, although this cannot be proven. The retirement age at Atlanta University was sixty-five. But I was sixty-five when President Hope called me to the University. Nothing was said between us about the conditions of eventual retirement--due to my usual neglect of financial considerati ns and because my good health gave me not thought of stopping work at any near time. Hope must have mentioned the matter to Florence Reed, treasurer, but they reached no decision that I knew of. Later I opposed Miss Reed's election as president to succeed Hope; and the new plan gained me wide acclaim. Even the General Education Board which handled Rockefeller funds favored my plan. President Clement while supporting the plan was not enthusiastic. As a new young unknown president, perhaps he saw my reputation overshadowing him. Letters came to me; visitors asked for me and no doubt Miss Reed encouraged his jealousy. I was conscious that this might occur and tried to be careful. On all my plans I consulted him. All invitations went out in his name. His delays and small objections seemed petty and I said so. Perhaps I was too brusque and not diplomatic enough in this and did not take into account his inexperience and lack of understanding. Doubtless too he had no desire to stop the development of the plan, but had no idea that I was at least for the time being so necessary for its firm establishment.

Neither Miss Reed nor President Clement said a word to me about retirement; but at the meeting of the Board of Trustees in 1944, Miss Reed proposed that I be retired. President Clement seconded the motion and apparently with little or no objection the Board passed the vote. Presumably most of the members assumed that the matter had been discussed with me and had my agreement. No pension was mentioned.

At any rate without a word of warning I found myself at the age of 76, without employment and with less than five thousand dollars of savings. Not only was a great plan of scientific work killed at birth, but my own life was thrown into confusion. I felt the world tottering beneath my feet and I fought back in despair. Finally the trustees gave me ayear's full salary in lieu of my never having been given notice of retirement. Also after offering me a pension of $100 a month, they finally granted me $1800 a year for five years and $1200 a year thereafter.

A word from the poet Sara Teasdale expressed my mood:

"When I can look life in the eyes,
Grown calm and very coldly wise,
Life will have given me the Truth
And taken in exchange -- my youth."

My youth? I laughed grimly. It was not my youth that I was losing; it was my old age; and old age was worthless in the United States.

There were some earnest attempts to carry the proposed program on. It was transferred to Howard University, with E. Franklin Frazier in charge. An excellent conference was held in 1945. But Frazier was not given funds for continuing the project and the Land Grant Colleges gradually ceased to cooperate. The whole scheme died within a year or two. It has never been revived.

The result of this action was disastrous; not merely to me but to the American Negro. Up unitl this time the Negro himself had led in the study and interpretation of the condition of his race in the United States. Beginning with 1914, with accelerated speed the study of the Negro passed into the hands of whites and increasingly Southern whites. There were colored sociologists and historieans but they worked without coordinated plan, without adequate funds or under superiors who were not interested. Finally many Negro writers found it profitable to write what Business and the Government demanded and not the whole truth. Until in the last decade 1949 to 1959 with increasing unanimity, the thesis has been defended in a thousand books and papers that the Civil War was not a struggle to preserve and spread the slavery of black workers, but a holy crusade to maintain the superior civilization of white folk and today current historians can treat American history and take no account of American Negroes and their activities in the Twentieth century.

There was another loss in the giving up of this plan, which I have never mentioned. Here was an unprecedented chance for an experiment in Sociology; for measuring and classifying human action, on a scale never before attempted; it would be reasonably sure of adequate funds and the best of trained cooperation and nationwide if not worl-wide criticism. On such a base a real science of Sociology could have been built. The opportunity was surrendered and the whole science of Sociology has suffered. Indeed today there is no recognized field of Sociology; almost no one calls himself a Sociologist and few institutions grant a degree in sociology. I even had projected a path of scientific approach: I was going to plot out beside the world of physical law, a science of Sociology which measured "the limits of chance in human action." If this field proved narrow or non-existent, world law was proven. If not the resultant "chance" was what men had always regarded as "Free Will." Meantime as students of human action hesitated and waited, Psychology measured nervous reaction; Physics merging with Chemistry rose to enormous accomplishment and helped by vast provision of mathematics, recast our whole conception of the universe. Finally Biology revealed new realms of what we now can mac as nothing but Chance beyond the area of conscious mind. Sociology has been by-passed, and reduced to Social Work.

THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

In the fall of 1896, I went to the University of Pennsylvania as "Assistant Instructor" in Sociology. It all happened this way: Philadelphia, then and still one of the worst governed of America's badly governed cities, was having one of its periodic spasms of reform. A thorough study of causes was called for. Not but what the underlying cause was evident to most white Philadelphians: the corrupt, semi-criminal vote of the Negro Seventh Ward. Everyone agreed that here lay the cancer; but would it not be well to give scientific sanction to the known causes by an investigation, with imprimatur of the University? It certainly would, answered Samuel McCune Lindsay of the Department of Sociology. And he put his finger on me for the task.

41-3-195

If Lindsay had been a smaller man and had been induced to follow the usual American pattern of treating Negroes, he would have asked me to assist him as his clerk in this study. Probably I would have accepted having nothing better in sight for work in sociology. But Lindsay regarded me as a scholar in my own right and probably proposed to make me an instructor. Evidently the faculty demurred at having a colored instructor. But since I had a Harvard Ph.D., and had published a recognized work in history, the University could hardly offer me a fellowship. A compromise was hit on and I was nominated to the unusual status of "assistant" instructor. Even at that there must have been some opposition, for the invitation was not particularly cordial. I was offered a salary of $900 for a period limited to one year. I was given no real academic standing, no office at the University, [redacted]

~~[illegible]~~; I had no contact with students, and very little with members of the faculty, even in my own department.

I did not hesitate an instant but reported for duty with a complete plan of work and outline of methods and aims and even proposed schedules to be filled out. My general plan was promptly accepted and I started to work, consulting Lindsay regularly but never meeting the faculty.

The Provost of the University furnished the following credentials:

"In connection with the College Settlement, the Trustees of the University of Pennsylvania have undertaken the study of the social condition of the Colored People of the Seventh Ward of Philadelphia. The University has entered upon this work as a part of its duty and wishes to make the investigation as thorough and exact as possible. We want to know precisely how this class of people live; what occupation they follow; from what occupations they are excluded; how many of their children go to school; and to ascertain every fact which will throw light upon this social problem; and then having this information and these accurate statistics before us, to see to what extent and in what way, proper remedies may be applied. Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois is the investigator on behalf of the University, and I write to bespeak for him your cordial reception and earnest co-operation."

41-3-190

The two years at Wilberforce had been my uneasy apprenticeship, and with my advent into the University of Pennsylvania, I began a more clearly planned career which had an unusual measure of success, but was in the end pushed aside by forces which, if not entirely beyond my control, were yet of great weight.

The opportunity opened at the University of Pennsylvania seemed just what I wanted. I had offered to teach social science at Wilberforce (where I had been teaching) outside of my overloaded program, but I was not allowed. (Nevertheless) My vision was becoming clearer. The Negro problem was in my mind a matter of systematic investigation and intelligent understanding. The world was thinking wrong about race, because it did not know. The ultimate evil was stupidity. The cure for it was knowledge based on scientific study.

At the University of Pennsylvania I ignored the pitiful stipend. It made no difference to me that I was put down as an "assistant instructor" and even [redacted], that my name never actually got into the catalogue; it goes without saying that I did no instructing save once to pilot a pack of idiots through the Negro slums.

Of the theory back of the plan of this study of Negroes I neither knew nor cared. I saw only here a chance to study an historical group of black folk and to show exactly what their place was in the community. I did it despite extraordinary difficulties both within and without the group. Whites said: Why study the obvious? Blacks said: Are we animals to be dissected and by an unknown Negro at that? Yet, I made a study of the Philadelphia Negro so thorough that it has withstood the criticism of sixty years.

I counted my task here as simple and clear-cut; I proposed to find out what was the matter with this areaand why. I started with no "research methods" and I asked little advice as to procedure. Theproblem lay before me. Study it. I studied it personally and not by Proxy. I sent out no canvassers. I went myself. Personally I visited and talked with five thousand persons. What I could, I set down in orderly sequence on schedules which I made out and submitted to the University for criticism. Other information I stored in my memory or wrote out as memoranda. I went through the Philadelphia libraries for data, gained access in many instances to private libraries of colored folk and got individual information. I mapped the district, classifying it by condition; I compiled two centuries of the history of the Negro in Philadelphia and in the Seventh Ward.

It would have been a fine thing if after this difficult, successful piece of work, the University of Pennsylvania had at least offered me a temporary instructorship in the college or in the Wharton School. Harvard had never dreamed of such a thing: a half century later one of Harvard's professors said of a gifted Negro student: "We'd give him a position if he were not a Negro!"

Eventually this brilliant man after serving in UNESCO successfully, committed suicide. What these institutions could not understand was that what I wanted was not a position in a white college, but a chance to teach Negro students on a high scientific level.

(White Harvard) classmates of lower academic rank than I, became full professors at Pennsylvania and Chicago. Here in my case an academic accolade from a great American university would have given impetus to my life work which I was already determined to make in a Negro institution in the South. The thing that galled was that such an idea never even occurred to this institution whose head was a high official of the Sugar Trust. But I did not mention this rebuff. I did not let myself think of it. But then, as now, I know an insult when I see it.

At the end of that study, I announced with a certain pride my plan of studying the complete Negro problem in the United States. I spoke at the forty-second meeting of the American Academy of Political and Social Sciences in Philadelphia, November 19, 1897, and my subject was "The Study of the Negro Problems." I began by asserting that in the development of sociological study there was at least one positive answer which years of research and speculation had been able to return, and that was : "The phenomena of society are worth the most careful and systematic study, and whether or not this study may eventually lead to a systematic body of knowledge deserving the name of science, it cannot in any case fail to give the world a mass of truth worth the knowing." I then defined and tried to follow the development of the Negro problem not as one problem, but "rather a plexus of social problems, some new, some old, some simple, some complex; and these problems have their one bond of unity in the fact that they group themselves about those Africans whom two centuries of slave-trading brought into the land."

I insisted on the necessity of carefully studying these problems and said: "The American Negro deserves study for the great end of advancing the cause of science. No such opportunity to watch and measure the history and development of a great race of men ever presented itself to the scholars of a modern nation. If they miss this opportunity -- if they do the work in a slip-shod, unsystematic manner -- if they dally with the truth to humor the whims of the day, they do far more than hurt the good name of the American people; they hurt the cause of scientific truth the world over, they voluntarily decrease human knowledge of a universe of which we are ignorant enough, and they degrade the high end of truth-seeking in a day when they need more and more to dwell upon its sanctity."

Finally I tried to lay down a plan for the study, postulating only: that the Negro "is a member of the human race, and as one who, in the light of history and experience is capable to a degree of improvement and culture, is entitled to have his interests considered according to his numbers in all conclusions as to the common weal."

Dividing the prospective scientific study of the Negro into two parts: the social group and his peculiar social environment, I proposed to study the social group by historical investigation, statistical measurement and sociological interpretation. Particularly with regard to anthropology, I said:

"That there are differences between the white and black races is certain, but just what those differences are is known to none with an approach to accuracy. Yet here in America is the most remarkable opportunity ever offered of studying these differences, of noting influences of climate and physical environment, and particularly of studying the effect of amalgamating two of the most diverse races in the world -- another subject which rests under a cloud of ignorance."

In concluding, I said:

"It is to the credit of the University of Pennsylvania that she has been the first to recognize her duty in this respect and in so far as restricted means and opportunity allowed, has attempted to study the Negro problems in a single definite locality. This work needs to be extended to other groups, and carried out with larger system; and here it would seem is the opportunity of the Southern Negro college. We hear much of higher Negro education, and yet all candid people know there does not exist today in the center of Negro population a single first-class fully equipped institution, devoted to the higher education of Negroes; not more than three Negro institutions in the South deserve the name of 'college' at all; and yet what is a Negro college but a vast college settlement for the study of a particular set of peculiarly baffling problems?

"What more effective or suitable agency could be found in which to focus the scientific efforts of the great universities of North and East, than an institution situated in the very heart of these social problems, and made the center of careful historical and statistical research? Without doubt the first effective step toward the solving of the Negro question will be the endowment of a Negro college which is not merely a teaching body, but a center of sociological research, in close connection and co-operation with Harvard, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and University of Pennsylvania.

"Finally the necessity must again be emphasized of keeping clearly before students the object of all science, amid the turmoil and intense feeling that clouds the discussion of a burning social question. We live in a day when in spite of the brilliant accomplishments of a remarkable century, there is current much flippant criticism of scientific work; when the truth-seeker is too often pictured as devoid of human sympathy, and careless of human ideals. We are still prone in spite of all our culture to sneer at the heroism of the laboratory while we cheer the swagger of the street broil. At such times true lovers of humanity can only hold higher the pure ideals of science, and continue to insist that if we would solve a problem we must study it, and there is but one coward on earth and that is the coward that dare not know."

From the University of Pennsylvania I went to Atlanta University in 1896 and stayed thirteen years until 1910.

The main significance of my work at Atlanta University, during the years 1897 to 1910 was the development at an American institution of learning, of a program of study on the problems affecting the American Negroes, covering a progressively widening and deepening effort designed to stretch over the span of a century. This program was grafted on an attempt by George Bradford of Boston, one of the trustees, to open for Atlanta University a field of usefulness for city Negroes comparable to what Hampton and Tuskegee were doing for rural districts in agriculture and industry. At the Hampton and Tuskegee Conferences, there came together annually and in increasing numbers, workers, experts and observers to encourage by speeches and interchange of experience the Negro farmers and laborers of adjoining areas. Visitors, white and colored, from North and South, joined to advise and learn. Mr. Bradford's idea was to establish at Atlanta a similar conference, devoted especially to problems of city Negroes. The first conference, emphasizing particularly Negro health problems, was held in 1896. Immediately the University looked about for a man to teach history and political science, and take charge of future conferences. I was chosen.

When I took charge of the Atlanta Conference, I did not pause to consider how far my developed plans agreed or disagreed with the ideas of the already launched project. It made little essential difference, since only one conference had been held and a second planned. These followed the Hampton and Tuskegee model of being primarily meetings of inspiration, directed toward specific efforts at social reform and aimed at propaganda for social uplift in certain preconceived lines. This program at Atlanta, I sought to swing as on a pivot to one of scientific investigation into social conditions, primarily for scientific ends; I put no special emphasis on special reform effort, but increasing and widening emphasis on the collection of a basic body of fact concerning the social condition of American Negroes, endeavoring to reduce the condition to exact measurement whenever or wherever occasion permitted. As time passed, it happened that many uplift efforts were in fact based on our studies: the kindergarten system of the city of Atlanta, white as well as black; the Negro Business League, and various projects to better health and combat crime. We came to be however, as I had intended, increasingly, a source of general information and a basis for further study, rather than an organ of social reform.

The proverbial visitor from Mars would have assumed as elemental a study in America of American Negroes -- as physical specimens; as biological growths; as a field of investigation in economic development from slave to free labor; as a psychological laboratory in human reaction toward caste and discrimination; as an unique case of physical and cultural intermingling. These and a dozen other subjects of scientific interest, would have struck the man from Mars as eager lines of investigation for American social scientists. He would have been astounded to learn that the only institution in America in 1900 with any such program of study was Atlanta University, where ona budget of $5000 a year, including salaries, cost of publication, investigation and annual meetings, we were essaying this pioneer work.

My program for the succession of conference studies was modified by many considerations: cost, availability of suitable data, tested methods of investigation; moreover I could not plunge too soon into such controversial subjects as politics or miscegenation. Within these limitations, I finished a ten-year cycle study as follows:

1896, Mortality among Negroes in Cities

1897, Social and Physical Condition of Negroes in Cities

1898, Some Efforts of Negroes for Social Betterment

1899, The Negro in Business

1900, The College-Bred Negro

1901, The Negro Common School

1902, The Negro Artisan

1903, The Negro Church

1904, Notes on Negro Crime

1905, A Select Bibliography of the American Negro

I then assayed for the second decade a broader program, more logical, more inclusive, and designed to bring the whole subject matter into a better integrated whole. But continued lack of funds, and outside diversions (like the request of the Carnegie Institution of 1907 for a study of cooperation) kept even the second decade from the complete logic of arrangement which I desired; finally, my leaving Atlanta in 1910 and at last the severing of my connection with the conference in 1914, left the full form of my program still unfinished. I did, however publish the following eight studies:

1906, Health and Physique of the Negro American

1907, Economic Cooperation among Negro Americans

1908, The Negro American Family

1909, Efforts for Social Betterment among Negro Americans

1910, The College-Bred Negro American

1911, The Common School and the Negro American

1912, The Negro American Artisan

1914, Morals and Manners among Negro Americans

41-3-204

With the publication of 1914, my connection with Atlanta ceased for twenty years. Although studies and publications were prepared by others at the University in 1915 and 1918, the war finally stopped the enterprise.

What I was laboriously but steadily approaching in this effort was a recurring cycle of ten studies in succeeding decades; with repetition of each subject or some modification of it in each decade, upon a progressively broader and more exact basis and with better method; until gradually a foundation of carefully ascertained fact would build a basis of knowledge, broad and sound enough to be called scientific in the best sense of that term.

Just what form this dream would eventually have taken, I do not know. So far as actually forecast, it had assumed in 1914, some such form as this:

1. Population; Distribution and Growth
2. Biology; Health and Physique
3. Socialization; Family, Group and Class
4. Cultural Patterns; Morals and Manners
5. Education
6. Religion and the Church
7. Crime
8. Law and Government
9. Literature and Art
10. Summary and Bibliography

I proposed as I have said, to repeat each of these every ten years, basing the studies on ever broader and more carefully gathered data. Eventually I hoped to keep all the inquiries going simultaneously, only emphasizing and reporting on one particular subject each year. This would have allowed some necessary shifting or combination of subjects as time and developments might suggest; and adjustments to new scientific advance in fields like anthropology and psychology. The plan would have called in time for a large and well-paid staff of experts and a study of method and testing of results such as no group of Americans were engaged in at the time; beginning with a definite, circumscribed group, but ending with the human race.

41-3-205

The program however was weak on its economic side. It did not stress enough the philosophy of Marx and Engels and was of course far too keen for Lenin. The program ought to have been - and as I think would have been if I had kept on this work - the Economic development of the American Negro slave; on this central thread all the other subjects would have been strung. But this I had no chance to essay.

Social scientists at the time were thinking in terms of theory and vast and eternal Laws, but I had a concrete group of living beings artificially set off by themselves and capable of almost laboratory experiment. I laid down an ambitious program for a hundred years of study. I proposed to take up annually in each decade the main aspects of the group life of Negroes with as thorough study and measurement as possible, and repeat the same program in the succeeding decade with additions, changes and better methods. In this way, I proposed gradually to broaden and intensify the study, sharpen the tools of investigation and perfect our methods of work, so that we would have an increasing body of scientifically ascertained fact, instead of the vague mass of the so-called Negro problems. And through this laboratory experiment I hoped to make the laws of social living clearer, surer, and more definite.

Some of this was accomplished, but of course only an approximation of the idea. For thirteen years we poured forth a series of studies, limited, incomplete, only partially conclusive, and yet so much better done than any other attempt of the sort in the nation that they gained attention throughout the world. In all we published a total of 2,172 pages which formed a current encyclopedia on the American Negro problems.

These studies with all their imperfections were widely distributed in the libraries of the world and used by scholars. It may be said without undue boasting that between 1896 and 1920 there was no study of the race problem in America made which did not depend in some degree upon the investigations made at Atlanta University; often they were widely quoted and commended.

I had heartening letters from persons of eminence and character. William James wrote in 1907: "I have just looked through the last installment of your studies on the American Negro. I wish the portraits might have been better printed. But it is splendid scientific work." Frank Taussig of Harvard wrote the same year: "In my judgement no better work is being done in the country, and no better opportunity is afforded for financial support on the part of those who wish to further the understanding of the Negro problem." Booker Washington, who spoke at our conference on on the Negro artisan in 1911, said: "The whole country should be grateful to this institution for the painstaking and systematic manner in which it has developed from year to year a series of facts which are proving most vital and helpful to the interests of our nation." Professor E.R.A. Seligman wrote: "I take great pleasure in testifying to my very high appreciation of the studies on the Negro proglem which you have been editing for the past few years. They are essentially scholarly and that means sober and temperate, and they are covering a field which is almost untilled and which is not apt to be cultivated by others." Jane Addams attended our conference in 1908 and commended our work.

Many periodicals mentioned our work:

London Spectator, 1900:

> This work is being done with much intelligence, discrimination and assiduity at the instance and under the inspiration of Atlanta University.

School Review, 1902:

> The work of this conference is constructive and merits hearty support.

Outlook, 1903:

> No student of the race problem, no person who would either think or speak upon it intelligently, can afford to be ignorant of the facts brought out in the Atlanta series of sociological studies of the conditions and the progress of the Negro.

Publications of the Southern History Association, 1904:

> The work done under the direction of the Atlanta Conference is entitled to the respectful and thoughtful consideration of every man interested in any aspect of the life of the American Negro.

South Atlantic Quarterly, 1904:

> They constitute, so far as the reviewer can learn, the most important body of direct evidence ever published as to moral and religious conditions of our colored people.

N.Y. Evening Post, 1905:

> The only scientific studies of the Negro question being made today are those carried on by Atlanta University.

It must be remembered that the significance of these studies lay not so much in what they were actually able to accomplish, as in the fact that at the time of their publication Atlanta University was the only institution in the world carrying on a systematic study of the American Negro and his development, and putting the result in a form available for the scholars of the world.

In 1900 came a significant occurence which not until lately have I set in its proper place in my life. I had been for over nine years studying the American Negro Problem. The result had been significant because of its unusual nature and not for its positive accomplishment. I wanted to set down its aim and method in some outstanding way which would bring my work to the notice of the thinking world. The great World Fair at Paris was being planned and I thought I might put my findings into plans, charts and figures, so one might see what we were trying to accomplish. I got a couple of my best students and put a series of facts into charts: the size and growth of the Negro American group; its division by age and sex; its distribution, education and occupations; its books and periodicals. We made a most interesting set of drawings, limned on pasteboard cards about a yard square and mounted on a number of movable standards. The details of finishing these fifty or more charts, in colors, with accuracy, was terribly difficult with little money, limited time and not too much encouragement. I was threatened with nervous prostration before I was done and had little money left to buy passage to Paris, nor was there a cabin left for sale. But the exhibit would fail unless I was there. So at the last moment I bought passage in the steerage and went over and installed the work. It was an immediate success. It occupied a small room, perhaps twenty feet square but the room was always full. The American press, white and colored was full of commendation and in the end, the end, the exhibit received a Grand Prize, and I, as its author, a Gold Medal.

About the same time, I approached the United States Commissioner of Labor. For several years I had been able to do now and then certain small studies for the Bureau of Labor, which had been accepted and paid for. It began with a proposal to Carroll D. Wright in 1897 for a study of the Negro in a Virginia town in 1898, which Mr. Wright authorized me to make on my own responsibility, promising only to print it if he like it. He did like it. This was followed by a major study of the Negro in the Black Belt in 1899 and among Negroes in Georgia in 1901, and I then approached the Bureau with a new proposal.

I asked United States Commissioner of Labor, Neill, in 1906, to authorize a study of a Black Belt community. I wanted to take Lowndes County, Alabama, in a former slave state with a large majority of Negroes, and make a social and economic study from the earliest times when documents were available, down to the present; supplemented by studies of official records and a present house-to-house canvass of Negroes. I plied Commissioner Neill with plans and specifications until at last he authorized the study. Helped by Monroe Work, of Tuskegee Institute, and R. R. Wright, now a bishop of the A.M.E. Church, and a dozen or more local employees, I settled at the Calhoun School and began the study.

It was carried on with all sorts of difficulties, including financing which was finally arranged by loans from the University, and with the greeting of some of my agents with shotguns in certain parts of the county; but it was eventually finished. The difficult schedules were tabulated and I made chronological maps of the division of the land; I considered the distribution of labor; the relation of landlord and tenant; the political organization and the family life and the distribution of the population. The report was finished by hand with no copy, and rushed to Washington. It was criticized and I spent some weeks there in person, revising a nd perfecting it. It was finally accepted by the government, and $2,000 paid for it, most of which went back to the University in repayment of funds which they had kindly furnished me to carry on the work. But the study was not published. I knew the symptoms of this sort of treatment: in 1898, S.S. McClure had sent me to south Georgia to make a study of social situations there. He paid for the report but never published the manuscript and he afterwarddid the same thing in the case of Sir Harry Johnston.

I finally approached the Bureau and tried to find out when it would be published and was told that the Bureau had decided not to publish the manuscript, since it "touched on political matters." I was astonished and disappointed, but after a year I went back to them again and asked if they would allow me to have the manuscript since they were not going to use it. They told me it had been destroyed!

It was of course crazy for me to dream that America, in the dawn of the Twentieth Century with Colonial Imperialism, based on the suppression of colored folk, at its zenith, would encourage, much less adequately finance, such a program at a Negro college under Negro scholars. My faith in its success was based on the firm belief that race prejudice was based on widespread ignorance. My long-term remedy was Truth: carefully gathered scientific proof that neither color nor race determined the limits of a man's capacity or desert. I was not at the time sufficiently Freudian to understand how little human action is based on reason; nor did I know Karl Marx well enough to appreciate the economic foundations of human history.

I was therefore astonished and infinitely disappointed, gradually to realize that our work in the Atlanta conferences was not getting support; that, far from being able to command increased revenue for better methods of investigation and wider fields, it was with increasing difficulty that the aging and overworked President, with his deep earnestness and untiring devotion to principle, could collect enough to maintain even our normal activities. The conference had not been without a measure of success. Our reports were widely read and commented upon. On the other hand, so far as the American world of science and letters was concerned, we never "belonged"; we remained unrecognized in learned societies and academic groups. We rated merely as Negroes studying Negroes, and after all what had Negroes to do with America or Science? Gradually and with deep disappointment I began to realize, as early as 1906, that my program for studying the Negro problems must soon end, unless it received unforeseen support.

By the second decade of the Twentieth Century, a legal caste system based on race and color, had been openly grafted on the democratic constitution of the United States. This explains why, in 1910, I gave up my position at Atlanta University and became Director of Publications and Research for the newly formed National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of which I was one of the incorporators in 1911.

From 1910 to 1934 I gave up almost entirely my attempt at making a scientific study of the Negro problems in America and devoted myself to propaganda in order to convince Americans, black and white, that they must make a serious ethical effort to correct the wrong interest in the Negro problems and try to stop lynching and mob violence, encourage education, enforce the laws and make new laws. From 1910 to 1934 I carried on this work in cooperation with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and as editor of a small monthly magazine called the Crisis which eventually reached a circulation of 100,000.

The Crisis, however, depended upon subscriptions for support and when the great depression fell upon the land the working people, especially the Negroes, were unable to support the Crisis further. I therefore resigned the editorship of the little magazine and turned again back to my attempt at scientific work in solution of race problems. I was induced to do this because my close friend John Hope had become President of a new Atlanta University which was a graduate school connected with several undergraduate colleges. It was endowed by the General Education Board and it seemed probable that there could now arise in the South an institution of learning under the control of colored teachers which could have become a center of a new sociology of race problems.

In one aspect of the Negro problem in America, my program had limited success; that was its relation to the white working class. The Negroes were working folk -- farmers, laborers, porters and servants. They belonged in the main to the "Have-nots" as over against the "Haves." Yet they were not regarded as an integral part of the American workers and I as a student of their plight and their efforts was continually treating them as a separate class instead of grouping them with the mass of workers. This was not because of any failure on my part to conceive of the Negroes as primarily workers whose chief interest lay in the working class. The fault lay at the door of the powerful forces in the state which had separated the working class into antagonistic groups hating and fearing each other more than they feared their exploiters. In slavery days the poor whites hated and feared the black slaves. These slaves deprived the free white workers of land and livelihood; drove them to the hills and barrens or to the slums of cities; they were largely disfranchised and managed to make a living by fawning on slaveowners, becoming slave over-seers or bearing arms to keep black slaves from revolt. They protested bitterly against this condition.

To these poor whites, emancipation seemed not an opportunity for Negroes to rise to the status of free white workers, but rather the chance of white labor to climb on the backs of Negroes. The freedmen therefore was not only exploited by former slaveowners but even more by the up-struggling whites; and when white workers got the vote --blacks were disfranchised . A cast legislation put the Negro legally under the feet of the white workers, limiting his work, his wages, his dwelling place and his personal freedom. In the eyes of the Negro the white worker became his chief enemy; he led the lynch mobs, insulted him on the streets and took the food out of his mouth.

The mass of the Northern working class opposed slavery and wanted slaves emancipated. But they were largely foreign emigrants and many like the Irish met the competition of free Negro workers on arrival and fought for work in pitched battles. The newer emigrants were warned against Negro cheap competing labor and did not regard these dark strangers as fellow workmen. Employers threw white and black into competing groups. So that the National Labor Union representing the best of American labor, despite its brave repudiation of color discrimination was unable in 1869 to secure admission of Negro workers into unions. Negroes rebuffed, tried to form their own unions but had to start with the demand for political power. For this they depended onthe Republican party and that party reduced them to serfdom in 1876. The Northern Unions in tight craft organizations so segregated the Negro worker that in 1902, the older trades like miners, longshoremen and cigarmakers admitted Negroes; but the newer and better paid trades, like blacksmiths, smelters, engineers, metal workers, boilermakers, electric workers, glassmakers, oil workers, textile workers and a host of similar unions admitted in the new century few or no Negroes. When, therefore, I essayed to study the Negro worker, I had no meeting ground with the white laboring class. I invited the secretary of the Georgia Federation of Labor to our conference and he spoke but his hearers knew that his federation discriminated against Negroes. We studied Negro employees in Southern factories. We corresponded with all the unions in the nation but with small result. The American working class remained split by the color line. My study therefore became a study not of a working class but of a small part of one and the relations of these groups became more important than relations between worker and employer.

In 1934 John Hope and I set out to revive the old Atlanta University conferences and studies of the Negro Problems. ~~Hope sought unsuccessfully to obtain funds for this enterprise~~. After his death I tried to see if some co-operative plan might supply funds. Frederick Keppell of the Carnegie Foundation gave us money for preliminary work in 1940 and 1941. I called the "First Phylon Conference" in April 1941. A good cross section of Negro leaders in education attended. Reports were made from each state on the economic conditions of Negroes. I tried to sum up the current conditions in this statement:

I. a. If thirteen million people starve to death, it is because they are stupid.

b. Many American Negroes today are virtually starving.

II. a. There is no such thing as lack of useful, needful work.

b. There is wide and dangerous lack of adequate wage and income for certain individuals.

III. a. Facing these paradoxes the world is changing its economic organization today to meet them and is planning further change.

b. We as a minority group must plan also, not in opposition but in intelligent accord with this general world planning.

IV. a. We must especially beware of propaganda and distortion as to the present economic conditions and changes in the world.

1. We must not assume that business enterprise and economic welfare are synonomous terms and assume that because a business is profitable it is for that reason beneficial to the race or nation.
2. We must not assume that because racial organization cannot hire thirteen million Negroes, it cannot and should not hire thirteen thousand or more.
3. Because, as a minority group, we must in the main conform to the national economic patterns, is no proof that we cannot by intelligent action influence these patterns to our advantage.

41-3-214

V. a. Finally, we must get at the facts by the latest scientific technique.

b. We must gather, study, test, and interpret these facts.

c. We must remember that the starvation of Negroes in the United States benefits nobody; that full employment at a living wage for all Negroes as well as all whites is at once the greatest patriotism and the greatest defense against war and evil.

[redacted] I visited Negro institutions from Virginia to Texas in order to see what co-operation I could start.

I became convinced of several things: first, the role of the government-supported land-grant colleges in the development of Negro education was going to be large and progressively increasing. Second, these land-grant colleges needed a program for social science studies which is at present undeveloped.

Third, rapid changes are now taking place in the Negro ethnic group and even more momentous ones impend. The war (2nd World War) has upset conventional economy, exacerbated racial consciosness and already led to bitter clashes. The developments after the war are bound to add to these difficulties. There is one and only one fundamental and definitive way to meet this situation and that is to begin a systematic study of the essential facts of the present condition of the Negro race and to establish a way of continuing and making more complete and effective such a study. Then in the event the nation can turn its attention and energies to remedial measures, it will not be necessary to waste time in belated efforts to get at the essential truth.

Careful and exact knowledge of conditions and changes then are imperative and ought to be in prosess of gathering now in order to be available during and after the war. Fourth, this should not be the conventional type of "social study" --an instantaneous photograph of a sample group; but should be planned so as eventually to approach the stature of a total study of a complete situation, continuously photographed, and re-photographed, measured and re-measured; so that our knowledge of the vast and momentous social experiment in race relations now making in the United States, would attain a completeness and authority that would be unquestioned and unquestionable and available in the post war world which will surely need this sort of information. I believe that here is a chance not only to serve the Negro race and America, but also to serve the world and social science in an unique way. Fifth, the Negro Land-Grant Colleges, distributed usually one to a state and manned by presidents chosen by boards of Southern whites, would in many respects be ideal centers of social studies in each state, on matters touching the condition in each state of the people for whom the school exists and for whose advancement the school was established. Each of these schools has proclaimed its aim to be the promotion of industry and lifting the social status of Negroes. Any such program needs exact knowledge of facts for its foundation.

Sixth, such studies to be effective must be well done and in accord with the latest scientific technique. They must not sink to mere propaganda nor white-washing. Most of the land-grant colleges are not at present equipped with personnel or funds for this work; a few are. All need expert advice and guidance, to integrate, synchronize and direct this work, and help in the proper interpretation of its results. Seventh, here is where the Negro private institution of higher learning could well cooperate with the states and call to aid the advice of other universities, north and south.

Three Negro universities seem best fitted for this work of guidance and integration: Howard, which holds to the federal government a position analagous to that of the land-grant colleges to the states; Fisk, which has among Negroes the best equipped department of social sciences in the South; Atlanta, where the first attempt was made in America to carry on a scientific study of the Negro problems.

My first step toward realizing this project was to seek to sell the idea to the Negro land-grant colleges. I talked the plan over with President Banks of Prairie View, who was a former student of mine; who, as I knew, had long had some such collaboration in mind, and who had the best social science department among Negro land-grant colleges. He was enthusiastically in favor. I then secured permission to present the scheme to the annual conference of the presidents of Negro land-grant colleges at Chicago, November, 1941.

In 1935, the Federal Government was giving $18,000,000 annually to land-grant colleges in Southern states which had colleges separated by race. Negroes forming over a fifth of the population of these states received only about five per cent of this money. For some time the Negro colleges had been pressing for a larger share, but the reply had been that such work as research in agriculture or chemistry was being carried on in the white colleges and that it was not necessary to duplicate this work in Negro institutions. It occurred to me that a careful program of race studies planned for the Negro colleges might be the basis for a demand for a much larger Negro share of Federal funds. I therefore addressed the organization of Negro Land-Grant College Presidents in October, 1941. I said:

"With a comparatively small group like that of the American Negro, in a country of great economic efficiency like America, and spurred by every high incentive, there is no real reason why cultivated brains among us may not guide the great mass of our folk to desired economic and cultural ends. This, of course, depends on the extent to which these potential leaders have the will to sacrifice their talent to this end; and also on the actual knowlege which they possess to guide the mass toward real progress and not back to out-worn reaction.

" The problem before us is this: to put fourteen million people to work so that they may recive an income which will insure a civilized standard of living; to make it possible for them to preserve their health; to keep crime down to a minimum and to educate their children; with the eventual object of giving this group sufficient leisure to advance by means of talented persons among them in science and art and cultural patterns. And with the further idea that in so far as these objects are successful, the group will become nearer to actual equality with their fellow Americans and to civilized people the world over, and will thus remove from color prejudice a very real reason for its perpetuation.

"How can the college help the community earn a living? First, it can train students for existent needs, for which the community now pays. Sometimes educational philosophers talk as though this were the one end of the college; and a situation could be easily imagined where that might be pretty nearly true; where you have settled normal culture and an arrangement of work which is suitable for that culture; and relatively stable economic organization. Under these circumstances

if a college trained men efficiently for these jobs and at the same time supplied a broad cultural outlook toward the future it would come near doing its main work.

"The college today, however, must do more --far more--than prepare men for jobs at present in demand and socially needful. The college must anticipate the futare needs of the community and prepare education to meet them.
